W. B. YEATS.

By Wilfrid Gibson.

EVEN if it were necessary for me on this occasion to make a strictly impartial and critical estimate of Mr. Yeats's poems, and to attempt to assess their ultimate value, I am afraid I should find great difficulty in doing so. How could I be expected to regard with a coldly objective and critical eye poems that, since I first read them in adolescence, have sung themselves through my blood and woven themselves into the very texture of my being! When Mr. Yeats's first volume was published, I was still too young to read it with appreciation, even if I had had the good fortune to come across it. I was, it is true, even then beginning to discover Poetry for myself; but it was not until several years later that I became aware, rather to my surprise, that young poets were still actually engaged in writing poems. Books were not easily come by: but once I had read "The Wanderings of Oisin" (Mr. Yeats now prints the hero's name "Usheen") the spell was laid upon me; and the lovely lines and exquisite cadences "haunted me like a passion." Then came "The Wind Among the Reeds"; and, though I found the symbolism of some of the lyrics a little baffling, and though I felt, even then, that poetry should need no notes of explanation, I walked the fells of Northumberland chanting—

> "The host is riding from Knocknarea
> And over the grave of Clooth-na-bare;
> Caolte tossing his burning hair
> And Niam calling Away, come away:
> Empty your heart of its mortal dream.
> The winds awaken, the leaves whirl round,
> Our cheeks are pale, our hair is unbound,
> Our breasts are heaving, our eyes are agleam,
> Our arms are waving, our lips are apart;
> And if any gaze on our rushing band,
> We come between him and the deed of his hand,
> We come between him and the hope of his heart.
> The host is rushing 'twixt night and day,
> And where is there hope or deed as fair?
> Caolte tossing his burning hair,
> And Niam calling Away, come away!"

and whispering to myself—

> "Had I the heaven's embroidered cloths,
> Enwrought with golden and silver light,
> The blue and the dim and the dark cloths
> Of night and light and the half light,
> I would spread the cloths under your feet:
> But I, being poor, have only my dreams;
> I have spread my dreams under your feet;
> Tread softly because you tread on my dreams."

Surely never can there have been published so slight a volume containing so many lyrics to set the heart of youth afire! And the enchantment holds. But, even if the passage of years had moderated my original enthusiasm, I am far from thinking that, in the matter of assessing the values of poetry, the cautious conclusions of middle-age are necessarily any truer or more valid than the generous enthusiasms of youth; and though, as we grow older, the intellect tends more and more to control our emotional reactions, it still seems to me that what I think about a work of art is not necessarily of more importance than what I feel about it. But this whole business of æsthetic appreciation is very difficult; and this is hardly the occasion for its discussion.

In this volume,* Mr. Yeats tells us, he has arranged in chronological order whatever lyrical and narrative poems best please him and his friends; and so we find in it the very flower of his work for the last thirty years; and, in reading it, we can trace the development of his powers as a writer of lyrics. I use the word "development" rather than "progress," because progress seems to imply improvement; while I merely wish to indicate that Mr. Yeats's later lyrics are different from his earlier, that his work has changed in character, rather than that there has been any improvement or deterioration in his art. "Progress" is always rather a foolish word to use in writing of art: and literature, as Mr. Abercrombie has so ably demonstrated to us in a recently published lecture, does not progress, in the usually accepted meaning of the word; it goes through various phases, it develops; and no stage of its development is necessarily of more, or less, importance than any other. And Mr. Yeats's art has developed even more certainly and more significantly than that of most poets. I can most briefly, and I think fairly, indicate this development by saying that in his earlier work he seemed to be the last of the Pre-Raphaelites; whereas he himself in a later lyric has expressed his desire to "dine at journey's end with Landor and with Donne." When he began to write, he would certainly seem to have been under the influence of William Morris: I don't fancy that Mr. Yeats himself would resent this supposition; and his work shows traces of other influences, from the French symbolists to the English metaphysical poets. By the way, it is really rather a remarkable achievement that I have been able to write so much about Mr. Yeats without ever so much as mentioning the blessed word "Celtic," and without any deliberate refraining, either! I feel that I do not know enough about the matter to say how much Celtic influence has counted in the development of his art. I have met Irishmen who say that his work is not Irish in any sense; but, to a mere Saxon who is proud to think that Mr. Yeats has used the English language as his vehicle of expression, and who yet realises that there is an element in his work that renders it essentially different from the work of any poet of pure English blood, it would seem that his work has a distinctively Irish flavour. But, with all this chatter of influences, I have no wish to minimise in any degree the strongly individual character of Mr. Yeats's genius. Mr. Yeats has always been Mr. Yeats from his earliest to his latest lyric; yet his has been the true originality of the poet legitimately born in the great tradition (a tradition, it is sometimes forgotten, of experiment and adventure) and not the specious and bastard originality of the mere eccentric. Still there have been moments when even Mr. Yeats's most ardent admirers have dreaded that his intellectual and mystical preoccupations might in the end sterilise his creative powers; and there are many poems that bear explicit witness that the fear has also haunted the poet himself. Mr. Yeats, in spite of his sympathy with peasants, or rather, I should say with peasant poets, has little of the democratic temper; his is an inherently aristocratic mind; and an uncompromising intellectual arrogance has done much to render some of his later work dry and bitter to the taste. So much is this so, indeed, that many of the warmest admirers of his earlier lyrics find little to their liking in his later poems; they say he has lost his magic. I count myself fortunate in being able to appreciate, not only the more sensuous beauty of the youthful lyrics, but also the fine astringent austerity of the more mature work; and to realise that, throughout, a singular, passionate and unwavering integrity has been at work on the creation of beauty that is not easily matched in the poetry of its, or any other, generation. For me, this poet has not failed. My youthful enthusiasm is confirmed by my more mature judgment; and for me at least both are equally sound, because both have their springs in an instinctive emotional response. Neither the poet nor the critic can afford to dispense with intellectual control, without which emotion would be spilled in the illimitable inane to no purpose; but emotion must be the mainspring of the critical as well as of the creative activity.

* "Selected Poems." By W. B. Yeats. 7s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

THE HEART OF CALANTIA.

By Mary Bradford Whiting.

IT was in the year 1828 that the heart of Calantia ceased to beat, and to read "Glenarvon" after the lapse of a century is to wonder how a novel so unattractive in form and so delirious in style can have created such a sensation.

That in this case, at any rate, Byron was more sinned against than sinning is the general opinion of those who have studied his story, and that Lady Caroline Lamb should own herself in the wrong was perhaps hardly to be expected; but that she should rush into print to tell the world of his cruelty was undignified in the extreme and calculated to cause her husband the greatest annoyance. The fullness of the details that she gave left no doubt as to the identity of the characters. Byron's personal appearance is minutely described, and her own feelings with regard to him are freely displayed to the world:

> "Was it possible to behold him unmoved? Oh, was it in woman's nature to hear him and not to cherish every word he uttered? And having heard him, was it in the human heart ever again to forget those accents which wakened every interest and quieted every apprehension? The day, the hour, the very moment of time was marked and destined. It was Glenarvon, it was that spirit of evil whom she beheld, and her soul trembled within her and felt its danger."

Of his character and habits she gives a lurid picture:

> "He gave up his days and nights to every fierce excess, and soon the high spirit of genius was darkened, the lofty feelings of honour were debased, and the frame and character sank equally dejected under the fatigue of vigils and revels in which reason and virtue had no share when he appeared most frank and unguarded, then he most deceived; falsehood and craft were stamped upon his countenance, written upon his brow, marked in his words, scarce concealed beneath the winning smile that sometimes played upon his lips."

The whole novel is in fact a piece of special pleading, and the only gleam of humour from beginning to end is to be found in the sturdy common sense of Admiral Mowbray, who treats Calantia's ravings with most refreshing indifference; having given a full account of her flight in the disguise of a page to the man she adored, and her subsequent ignominious return, she puts the following remarks into the mouth of the Admiral:

> "There is your aunt dying in one room, and everyone in fits or mad in different parts of the house. The whole thing will be known all over the country, and the worst of it is that when people talk they never know what they say, and add and add till it makes a terrible story. But come in, do, for if the world speak ill of you I will protect you; and as to my Lord Glenarvon there, why, it seems after all that he is a very good sort of fellow and had no mind to have you; which is what I hinted before you set out, and might have saved you a long walk if you would only have listened to reason."

It seems strange that Lady Caroline should have been capable ot putting such sensible remarks into the mouth of one of her characters, and at the same time have been absolutely impervious to reason herself, pursuing the man, who had plainly shown her that he was tired of her, with such importunities that at last he wrote her the brutally frank letter that is reproduced almost verbatim in "Glenarvon."

But it is perhaps in its references to her husband—Lord Avondale as he is called—that the novel has most of interest. Many unbalanced women have been carried off their feet by passion, but it is very seldom that in the midst of their infatuation they realise that they are rejecting the higher for the lower. Lady Caroline loved Byron madly, but she gives full justice to William Lamb's fine character, and praises his frankness, honour and integrity in the warmest terms.

Lord Byron.

Calantia dies of Glenarvon's cruelty, but he makes a mock of her tragic fate to his companions. His own doom is dramatic in the extreme for, worn out by dissipation, Death hurries him away, and as his spirit passes a voice is heard from beneath:

> "Hardened and impenitent sinner, the measure of your iniquity is full; the price of crime has been paid; here shall your spirit dwell for ever. You have dreamed away your life's joyous hour, nor made atonement for error, nor denied yourself aught that the fair earth presented you. You did not control the fiend in your bosom, or stifle him in his first growth; he now has mastered you and brought you here, and you did not bow the knee for mercy while time was given you: now mercy shall not be shown. Oh! cry upwards from those lower pits to the sinner who hardens himself against his Creator who basks in the ray of prosperous guilt, nor dreams that his hour like yours is at hand. Tell him how terrible a thing is death, how fearful at such an hour is remembrance of the past! Bid him repent, but he shall not hear you. God is just, and the spirit of evil infatuates before he destroys."

Lady Caroline could not, like Calantia, hope to make her false lover feel himself a murderer, for his desertion did not drive her into a picturesque decay, but into a tornado of wrath. She had intended to wring his breast with fear and shame, but when she found that he made fun of the novel and described it as a piece of extravagant nonsense, she was so infuriated that she resolved on a solemn act of revenge. Assembling a number of young girls at Brocket Hall, her country house, she dressed them in white robes and made them dance round a fire in which she had placed Byron's portrait and copies of his letters to her, while they sang a song which she had composed for the occasion:

> "Burn, fire, burn, while wondering boys exclaim,
> And gold and trinkets glitter in the flame;
> Ah! look not thus on me so grave and sad;
> Shake not your heads, nor say, 'the lady's mad!'"

That her husband could forgive such follies as these, caused him to be derided by some of his friends and condemned by others. But there is no doubt that William Lamb realised not only that self-control was impossible to her, but that she did really love him in spite of her mad conduct. On one occasion, we are told, she angered him so deeply that he left their London house, ordered his carriage and drove down to Brocket. In the middle of the night he heard a sound of weeping, and on opening his bedroom door he found her sobbing on the door-mat. Heartbroken by his displeasure, she had followed him down, but did not venture to approach him.

The hopeless ill-health of their only child was a grief to her as it was to her husband; but while he sought consolation in tender and unceasing devotion to "Freddy," she tried to stifle her regrets with ever wilder eccentricities. The butler one day was decorating the table for a dinner-party, and when he continued his preparation in spite of her commands she pushed the centre-piece aside and sprang on to the table, where she stood posing. The man flew to fetch his master and, instead of reproaching her, Lamb lifted her gently down, and with the murmured remonstrance, "Caroline! Caroline!" led her out into the garden and soothed her so patiently and tenderly that she soon recovered her balance and was able to receive her guests.

But such scenes as these were a terrible infliction for a man who had a responsible part to play in public affairs; a domestic wife was what he needed, and Fate had given him one who was dramatic in the extreme. A formal separation was urged by his family, and he so far agreed that the deed was actually prepared, but when it was brought for signature, he went upstairs to consult his wife on some final arrangement; after long delay, her brother, William Ponsonby, went to look for him, and found him seated beside her on a sofa while she fed him with bread and butter. The deed was carried away again unsigned, nor was any attempt made to execute it later; but though they met and corresponded up to the time of her death, her home was generally at Brocket, while Lamb's duties kept him in London or Dublin.

That Byron's influence was still strong upon her was shown by the strange incident in July, 1824. While driving out one day, she met a funeral cortège and, on asking whose it was, was told that the body of Lord Byron was being conveyed from London to Newstead.

The chance that thus brought them once more together was certainly a remarkable one, and it affected her strongly during the three years of life that yet remained to her; her bodily health decreased while her irritability of brain became more and more pronounced. Yet her love for her husband remained, and it is significant that her last touching letter to him begins and ends with the word "dearest":

Dec. 2nd, 1827.

"DEAREST WILLIAM,

"This is the first time I can write. I have suffered much and I hope patiently since I wrote last—all the county has been to see me. My dear brother has read to me and soothed me, and is coming back. I never met with such affection and kindness as from all persons of both our families; but what pleased me most was your dear letter saying you loved and forgave me, God bless you, dearest!"

"Whom do you suppose was the most distinguished man in mind and person, cultivation and refinement, that I have ever known?" she once asked a friend. "Lord Byron," was his not unnatural answer, and he was startled by her vehement reply: "No; my own husband, William Lamb!"

Even at a time when people thought it no indiscretion to rush into print on their private affairs, one would think that it must have been something of a shock to read the account which her husband wrote of her in the Literary Gazette, February 16th, 1828—little more than two months after her death. He speaks of her as wild and impatient of restraint, generous and kind, but moved by impulse, and then actually goes on to discuss her relations with Lord Byron:

"Much has been written and much said respecting the intimacy that subsisted between Lady Caroline and that remarkable person, but it is not amidst gossip that we are to look for truth."

He was evidently satisfied that she had been guilty of nothing worse than folly, but he fully recognises the extent of her infatuation:

"It was nearly three years before it was utterly broken off. Lady Caroline never entirely recovered it. Those who knew her well will painfully remember the bitterness of reproach and the despondency of reflexion to which after that period, she was, notwithstanding her constitutional spirits, perpetually subjected. 'Glenarvon' was written immediately after this rupture; though the most faulty, it is the most eloquent of her works."

As Lord Melbourne, William Lamb was to exert a strong and beneficial influence over another young life—a life the most illustrious.

To Queen Victoria, Lord Melbourne was a sympathetic adviser; to his young wife he tried to be a kind but firm master. Had he been able to eliminate the slight touch of priggishness from his character she might never have succumbed to Byron's fascination.

There were many among her friends who deemed it the most charitable course to maintain that latent seeds of madness did exist, and that their development in later life was the reason of her wild and eccentric conduct; but in his curiously dispassionate account of her in the Literary Gazette, Lamb declares that she knew their opinion and repudiated it with bitter indignation. That, like Calantia, she was doomed to fade and die from the effects of her lover's cruelty, was her fixed belief, but with approaching death, calmer thoughts seem to have come to her. "A kinder or a better heart has never ceased to beat," wrote her brother when all was over, "and it was to her a great consolation, and is now to us, that her mind was fully prepared and reconciled to this awful change. She viewed the near approach of death with great calmness, and during the whole of her severe sufferings, the patience with which she endured them and her kind and affectionate feelings for those about her, never failed for one moment."

ROSE AYLMER'S GRAVE: WITH A LETTER FROM LANDOR.

BY STEPHEN WHEELER.

A MERE accident some thirty years ago led to the discovery, in a writing-desk that once belonged to Walter Savage Landor, of a lock of Rose Aylmer's hair. Sundry additions since then have been made to what was generally known about the young lady whose untimely death Landor lamented in an elegy more often quoted, perhaps, than anything else he wrote whether in prose or verse. Rarely however has it seemed necessary to insert, in the story of Rose Aylmer's too brief life, particulars so strangely interesting as what may be gathered from a letter written by Landor less than two years before his own death, and until now wholly unknown to his biographers. With the kind consent of his nephew, the Rev. R. E. H. Duke, I am able to put the contents of this notable document on record.

Postmarked, so far as the impressions are legible, "Firenze 31 Gen[naro], [18]63, Bath Fe[bruary] 4, [18]63," the envelope is addressed to Miss K. Landor, 3, Belmont, Bath. The letter, written on both sides of a half-sheet of note-paper, is as follows:

"January 30.

"Dear Kitty—Now I begin to recover, in some measure, from the shock which I recieved [sic] from the letter I recieved [sic] of yours this morning, I lose no time in answering it. It gave me the first intelligence of Mrs. Paynter's death. I first saw her, when she was only six years old, walking on the burrows at Swansea, led by her sister Rose Aylmer, ten years older. I was not indifferent to Rose, nor Rose quite to me. Four of the eight lines I wrote on her death were engraven on her tomb at Calcutta. I wrote to her namesake on her birthday, the nineteenth, as usual for many years. My letter will reach her most inopportunely. I wish kind Henry's health was better. Robert's, I am happy to hear, is better. Walter and Charles dine with me to-day, for the first time in four years, and it must be the last. My excellent friend Mr. Duke will accept my thanks for his kind letter the more willingly if you send them in this to you.

"Believe me, dear Kitty, your affectionate uncle,

"Walter."

Miss Catherine Mary Landor, to whom her affectionate uncle wrote thus on his eighty-eighth birthday, was a daughter of the Rev. Charles Landor, eldest of W. S. Landor's three brothers. She died in 1892, aged seventy-five and unmarried. It is not unlikely that a poem in "Dry Sticks" (1858) headed "Kitty and her Lover," half humorous but also a little pathetic, was sent to her before it appeared in print. She was a friend of Rose Aylmer's niece, Mrs. (afterwards Lady) Graves Sawle, who once showed me a photograph of her. It was from Miss Landor that her uncle Walter, then living at Florence in the Via Nunciatina, now called Viadella Chiesa, first heard of the death of Mrs. Paynter, an old friend of his, half-sister of Rose Aylmer and mother of a "Rose from that same stem." In his reply he recalls having met Rose Aylmer and this future mother of a second Rose walking together at Swansea. He must have been introduced to Miss Aylmer before this, but it was the first time he saw her small half-sister, Sophia Price, aged six, who in years to come was to marry Mr. David Paynter, of Dale Castle, Pembrokeshire.

Sir Sidney Colvin believed that Landor made friends with Lord Aylmer's family and especially with Rose Aylmer at Tenby. According to John Forster, however, Landor was living at Swansea when the friendship began. Both writers omitted to mention that Rose Aylmer's father, the fourth Baron Aylmer, had died when she was six years old, and that two years later his widow married Mr. Howell Price, by whom she became mother of the aforesaid Sophia. At what date Mrs. Howell Price, ci devant Lady Aylmer, was again left a widow, I cannot say; but before her death, in 1805, she married a Mr. Bowles. As for the particular part of South Wales where Landor and the Hon. Rose Aylmer used to meet, perhaps not seldom, we have as evidence, besides the letter now in print, and Forster's statement, verses headed "Abertawy," the old name of Swansea, in which Rose Aylmer's gracious presence can be recognised, and that other poem telling of a walk with her to Briton Ferry where the oaken wood lay before them:

"Whispering 'happy as thou art Happiness and thou must part.'"

Nor will it be forgotten that the book in which Landor found the story of "Gebir" was shown to him by

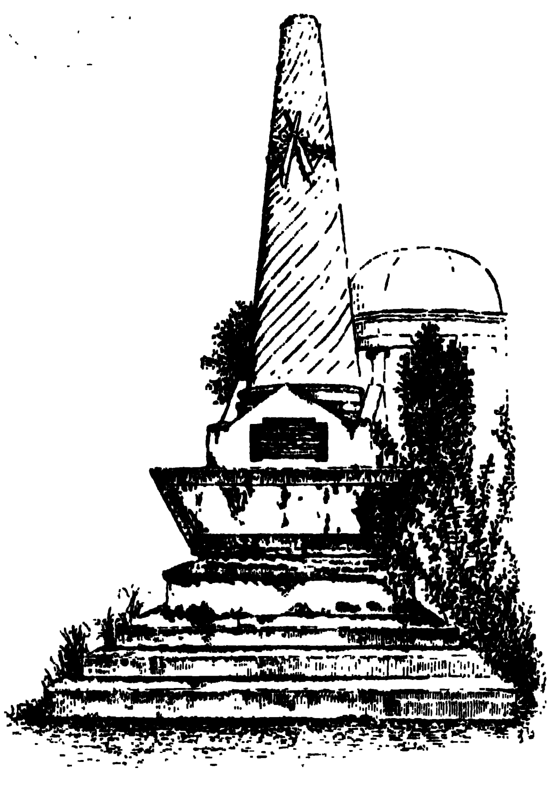
Walter Savage Landor
Aged 29 (1804).
From a painting by George Dance, R.A.

Rose Aylmer who had borrowed it from a Swansea circulating library. That it was at Swansea, therefore, and not at Tenby, the two young people became "not indifferent" to each other seems fairly certain. When all this happened is more doubtful; but assuming that Landor could recollect how old the two girls were when he first met them together, it may be inferred that the encounter took place before October 15th, 1796, when Rose attained the sweet age of seventeen. Not long after this, called by one she dared not disobey, she left Wales for a land where Ganges rolls his widest wave; which is Landor's account of the migration. But there is no reason to suppose she was a reluctant exile. Her mother's sister Barbara Anne—they were daughters of Sir Charles Whitworth—had married Mr. Henry Russell, barrister-at-law and Commissioner in bankruptcy, who in 1797 was knighted and appointed a judge in the Supreme Court of Bengal. He reached Calcutta in May, 1798. Lady Russell followed him a few months later, and was accompanied by her two nieces, Rose Aylmer and a Miss Mary Lloyd. Two of her sons went to India in the same ship. One of them, Henry Russell junior, had been given a writership in the Honourable Company's Civil Service; his brother Charles was to be a soldier. The Charlton, in which the party sailed, was met off Diamond Harbour by Sir Henry early in October, 1798; and in the recently published memoirs of William Hickey one may read how Miss Aylmer quickly attracted a host of suitors, the favoured one being her cousin, young Henry Russell. According to the Hickey "Memoirs" Sir Henry and Lady Russell were not altogether pleased when the two cousins became engaged; but it was no objection in this quarter that prevented their marriage. On March 6th, 1800, the Calcutta Gazette announced the death of the Hon. Miss Aylmer "in the bloom of youth and in possession of every accomplishment that would gladden or embellish life, deplored by her relatives and regretted by a society of which she was the brightest ornament." She had died at Sir Henry's house the Sunday before from an attack of cholera.

January 30

Dear Kitty,

Now I begin to recover, in some measure, from the shock which I received from the letter I received of yours this morning. I lose no time in answering it. It gave me the first intelligence of Mrs Paynter's death. I first saw her, when she was only six years old, walking on the burrows at Swansea, led by her sister Rose Aylmer ten years older. I was not indifferent to Rose, nor Rose quite to me. Four of the eight lines I wrote



Facsimile of first page of letter from Landor to his niece.

We must return to Landor's letter to his niece, in which there is something more that needs explanation. Four lines of his elegy, he said, were engraved on the monument over Rose Aylmer's grave at Calcutta. Whether he himself had been told this recently or long before is a question calling for less consideration than does a doubt, which must at once arise, as to the accuracy of his statement. So far as I am aware there is no mention of the monument in his published writings, nor can I recall an allusion to it except this in any unpublished letter of his, though it has been my privilege to read hundreds of them in the original script. All that can be said with certainty about the monument has to be sought elsewhere. No copy of the epitaph has been found earlier than that given in a volume published at Calcutta in 1803 and usually cited as "Asiaticus: in two parts." Part 2 contains numerous inscriptions on tomb-stones in Calcutta and the vicinity, among them being the following:

To the memory of the Honorable
Rose Whitworth Aylmer, who departed this life, March 2d,
A.D. 1800,
Aged 20 years.

What was her fate? long, long before her hour,
Death called her tender soul, by break of bliss,
From the first blossoms, to the buds of joy:
Those few our noxious fate unblasted leaves
In this inclement clime of human life.

It cost me more than a little effort to find the five lines of verse with slight variations in Young's "Night Thoughts," once a favourite book especially, Samuel Rogers said, with ladies. The whole inscription reappeared in a "Complete Monumental Register" by M. de Rosario (Calcutta: 1815), and again in two editions of the "Bengal Obituary" (Calcutta: 1848 and 1851). In these later books it may have been merely copied without verification from the text published by "Asiaticus," and even he may have taken it from a Calcutta newspaper. Some forty years ago, however, the late Brigade-Surgeon Busteed discovered the Aylmer monument after a long and difficult search, and though the epitaph was in parts almost illegible, he transcribed it from the stone tablet on the base of the fluted pillar which rises above the grave. His transcript, printed together with a description of the tomb, in the next edition of "Echoes from Old Calcutta," only differs from the "Asiaticus" text in the opening words. Instead of "To the memory" he found "In memory."

Rose Aylmer's Tomb at Calcutta.

Drawn by Thérese Wheeler from photographs by the late Mr. Stephen Paget Luke.

The difference can best be explained as due to a mistake made by "Asiaticus"; for the letters having, since Dr. Busteed read them, been carefully rendered more distinct, it seems almost impossible that the wording can ever have been altered. Nor did Dr. Busteed find anything to show that four lines of Landor's elegy, as well as five lines from Dr. Young's poem, had been engraved on the tomb during Landor's lifetime.

There would seem to be one conceivable solution of the mystery. Mrs. Landor's brother, General Sir H. E. L. Thuillier, of the Bengal, later Royal Artillery, began and ended his active service in India; and one of Mrs. Landor's sisters married a gentleman in the Bengal Civil Service. Either of the two may have seen the tomb and, after a passing glance at the epitaph, have fancied the verses must be Landor's. To mention the supposed discovery in a letter to their sister, or to her husband, would be a natural proceeding. Happily what was then an innocent fiction is now a fact. Beneath the marble tablet on which the original epitaph was inscribed there was affixed in 1909 a smaller one on which may be read by all who visit the old cemetery not only the first four but the whole eight lines of what by many of his admirers is regarded as Landor's masterpiece.

RESTORATION TRAGEDY.*

By George Saintsbury.

IT is a good thing that Mr. Bonamy Dobree should have followed up his edition of five of these tragedies in the Oxford World's Classics with this general companion volume to his "Restoration Comedy." The present subject is much less (what shall we say?) notorious than the other, but it contains some very remarkable work and is almost more curious in the good sense of the word than the Comedy is in the bad. Inveterate fault-finders may indeed grumble at this and the "World's Classics" matter not being actually combined. For Mr. Dobree himself admits that he has had to repeat some things, while on the other hand some of his readers may want a little more illustrative quotation. But it is almost a sufficient answer that in that case they had better provide themselves with the "five tragedies" which they can do at what facetious people used to call "a very moderate figure."

It is no doubt unfortunate that no one, at least as far as the present writer knows, has handled the whole subject of "Heroic" literature—poem, play and novel—in a satisfactory way; for taking it in parts can never be quite satisfactory. Mr. Dobree, who is seldom not worth reading, has of course a good deal to say about it as concerns plays. We believe that a bad man once explained the amazing "propriety" of Restoration Tragedy as simply and obviously and necessarily a contrast to the amazing impropriety of Restoration Comedy. And there may be something more than a mere joke in this, for Contrast and Compensation are mighty workers in the scheme of things. But it is not quite sufficient: and Mr. Dobree was not likely to consider it so. Accordingly, he takes a great deal of trouble to consider the nature and features of Tragedy, if not exactly "in the abstract," in the general, and though considering the title of his book one can find no fault with this, it is possible that some readers may take more pleasure in his remarks on dramas and dramatists in the particular. One thing that some of these will welcome is the treatment of Dryden. They may be a little surprised at Mr. Dobree's selecting " prettiness " as the name for one of the good qualities he rightly discovers in this really great poet, whose greatness has been not so much denied as ignored for the last century and a little more, by almost everybody who has touched him. Some of the songs—Mr. Dobree actually knows the songs!—are perhaps "pretty," but it is certainly not the word that most Drydenians would choose for the lighter side of Glorious John's nervous strength and bronze-like massiveness. The comparision of " All for Love " with " Antony and Cleopatra " must always be a stumbling-block for fools and a choice exercising ground or place for the wise. It is needless to say that Mr. Dobree is not a fool: if he seems to take a line (quite open to the wise) which one does not take oneself, he has a perfect right to do so. There are those who think that the deaths of Antony and Cleopatra in Shakespeare's play reach the absolute acme of pure tragic quality, and to them of course it does not in the least matter that the three first acts in the play are, let us say, a little promiscuous. To Mr. Dobree, who is much intent on " structure " in a not quite usual sense, and other things, it does matter. But he says nothing foolish about Shakespeare and he says some very wise things about Dryden.

Of the lesser—quite lesser—tragedians, he is disdainful and tells us that he is not going to tell us anything about Banks, Crowne and Settle. The first and the last we could spare as far as serious treatment went, but poor " Starch Johnny Crowne " might have had a page or two. On what we may call the middle trio, Lee, Otway and Rowe, he is, if not more merciful, more discursive. We own that in one sense if not all of the verb, his Lee is disappointing. You might indeed pick out some quite handsome expressions about him. Lee " can be enjoyed " ; he sometimes has " dignity " ; his songs are " often charming," etc. But the whole account is not favourable, and Mr. Dobree is almost shocked at someone who called Lee a great poet. If the someone had called him a great poet spoilt, it would have been hard to contest the description. On Rowe he is a little wicked, which is pardonable ; and though he thinks that " Venice Preserved " is the second on the list of Restoration tragedies (which it probably is) he admits, what is the fatal truth about Otway, that he had not poetry enough. As it happens, many years ago a friend of the writer's asked Sir Henry Irving whether he had ever thought of reviving this famous play. Irving said that he had given a great deal of thought to the matter : but had at last decided against it. Memory does not supply detailed reasons, if any were given, but fancy, perhaps rashly, supplies one. Could you get any actress, of sufficient calibre in other ways, at the present or any recent time who would make such a fool of herself as Belvedera does ?

To some readers the last chapter, which deals with " The Mourning Bride " and " Cato," will not be the least interesting. The average person probably knows nothing about the first except as furnishing cause for laughter against Johnson, though there are, or were recently, some stock quotations from " Cato." Mr. Dobree has of course no difficulty in showing that whatever " Cato " is, it is not a tragedy, and his defence of Congreve is pleasantly reasonable—not to be classed, though one has qualms, with the twentieth century estimate of Wycherley, as a sort of compound of Aristophanes, Persius, the prophet Micah and Blake. There is indeed a reference to the author of " The Country Wife " which makes one a little afraid. Mr. Dobree however scoffs at " jargon " (though he sometimes uses it) and is on the whole refreshing and nutritious.

THE SEAMY SIDE.

DEATH OF MY AUNT.

By C. H. B. KITCHIN. 7s. 6d. (Hogarth Press.)

Mr. G. D. H. Cole, University Reader in Economics at Oxford, lends the detective novel a " highbrow " atmosphere by making it the vehicle for audacious satire of the existing order. In " The Death of a Millionaire " he gives us a Home Secretary who is nothing less than a common swindler. Mr. C. H. B. Kitchin adopts a different method of painting the lily. In his latest book, " Death of my Aunt "—where an elderly woman is poisoned by oxalic acid crystals—he presents us with a murderess and an amateur detective who both devote their off-time to reading the latest and the most precious books and the playing of the latest and the most precious music. And to furnish the old theme with a fresh variation he makes his young " sleuth " timid, impulsive, cynical and a bit of a neuropath, and his police inspector not incredibly intelligent. Of these and other ingredients Mr. Kitchin has composed an original and a quite exciting story.

GATHER THE STARS.

By DIANA PATRICK. 7s 6d. (Hutchinson.)

At the age of thirty-seven Laurel Guest, the wife of a wealthy shipper, finds herself still beautiful but unwanted. Her husband, Murray Guest, who has been consistently though not openly unfaithful to her since their marriage, admires her but does not really need her. Her two stolid sons at Eton would never miss her. Even her friend, Charles Anselm, collector of antiques and women, regards her only as the possible heroine of one of his furtive intrigues. At this critical stage in her emotional life she is summoned to Ireland to rescue her great-uncle, who is over eighty, from the clutches of his wife, a designing woman of forty who used to be his servant. " Gather the Stars " is a grim and painful story ; but it is a sincere piece of work, free from mawkishness or cynicism, which grips the reader from start to finish.

SHARD.

By DAPHNE LAMBART. 7s. 6d. (Blackwood.)

They were very rich, these three abominable and completely self-centred young people of Shard, Jenepher, Kathleen and Vivian, and they were orphans. Mrs. Swallow of course " had spoiled them a little." Jenepher " was the most supremely selfish child—more selfish even than Kathleen or Vivian. But that was because she was the eldest and strongest, and knew she could make the others do anything she wished." And Vivian—Eton and Cambridge—at the age of nineteen had put his belief into words : " There is only one thing in the world I care a damn about—and that is beauty. I want to study it. What is it ? Well, that's what I want to find out." Between them, these three hurt quite a number of people, and were quite unconcerned. It is difficult to decide which of the three is the most detestable. The portraits are cleverly drawn though the author's sharp staccato style exasperates.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

LIAM O'FLAHERTY.*

THE Aran Islands, said Synge, were the most primitive place in Europe. Synge was probably speaking a little broadly. The fact remains that, despite whatever developments may have taken place in the Islands since the War, life there even to-day is stark, bed-rock, difficult.

It was on these harsh islands that, in 1896, Liam O'Flaherty was born.

There, as a boy, he saw the bare bones of life. The sea, in its cruellest as well as in its gentlest mood, was always, so to speak, at his mother's door. The men and women whom he daily met, among whom his intimate knowledge was won, were generally poor as the poorest Englishmen can hardly understand. Being poor "they had all things in common" and — this is the important point — their emotions were naked and often terribly direct.

Such a background in youth is only heightened in colour by the chances and changes that may later befall: and for Mr. O'Flaherty those chances and changes have been strange indeed.

In 1918 he came to London, got a job in a brewery, and remained there a week. He was given the part of a butler in a revue but got no further than rehearsal. He signed on, as a trimmer, on a boat bound for Rio de Janeiro, went aboard at that port and forgot to return. He went east to Smyrna. He went west to Montreal. He worked in a condensed milk factory, on the railroads, as a house-builder, on the land, as a lumber-jack, as a navvy making a canal, as a sailor on a lake ship, as a docker in Port Arthur, as a miner in a nickel mine, and with a Chinaman in a restaurant. In New York he lived for a week or two on the Bowery and got to know all about that city's far-famed underworld. Among other achievements in America he can claim to have led a strike. By this time it was 1920 and after once more wandering around in South America he eventually came back to England.

Not till then did he start writing; and he wrote, not of the strange things he had seen in the course of his travels, but of the Aran Islands where he was born. All he had seen had rather the look of tinsel beside the gold of those simple human beings who had been his first friends and enemies. What is bred in the bones of a genius invariably comes out in his books; and it was the meaning of life, as a man might have learned it on those primitive Irish shores, that came out in the writings of Liam O'Flaherty. If his pen ranges farther afield it is seldom farther than Dublin to the section of life there that is just as Irish and almost as primitive.

There is one other strong allegiance in him as a writer. His experience of war, and particularly his experience of civil war, has vivid import for him. Even so far back as the days when he was attending Black Rock college (at the time of the excitement about the Home Rule Bill) he started a corps of Irish Volunteers. Later, in 1914, at the National University, he joined the University College corps. Tired of waiting for an Irish revolution, he then joined the Irish Guards. In 1918 he was blown up at Langemarck and discharged. . . . Those experiences are the basis, without doubt, for some of his livest work.

Thus all O'Flaherty's best writing seems to have as its theme, in one shape or another, the hounding of man. In war and revolution, by the law: in civil life, by poverty.

Take first the hounding of man by law. His best novel, it is generally admitted, is "The Informer." It is conceived on a scale that is almost Michaelangelesque. The figure of Gypo, the informer, is drawn with terrific power—and that adjective is purposely chosen. With his huge limbs and slow-moving mind he moves through the pages with a cumbersome powerfulness that strikes the reader with an almost physical force. Here is only one of the hundreds of telling strokes by which the author gets his effect in this astounding book:

> "Gypo's face was lit with a demoniac pleasure as he raised Mulholland's body from the ground, clutching it by the throat with his two hands. He raised it up like a book which he wanted to read, until Mulholland's eyes were level with his own. Then they both looked at one another."

So Gypo, who in a moment of blind unreasoning need has taken blood money for betraying his friend, goes hounded through the streets of Dublin's underworld, instinct his only guide, while on all sides the cunning forces of the law are marshalled fatally against him. It is O'Flaherty's genius that he should so easily, almost from the beginning, and without a single appeal to sentimentality, win our sympathy for this dumb creature, outlawed, alone.

* "Thy Neighbour's Wife"; "The Black Soul"; "Spring Sowing"; "The Informer"; "The Assassin"; "The Tent"; "Mr. Gilhooly"; and "The Mountain Tavern." 7s. 6d. each. (Jonathan Cape.)

O'Flaherty has tried the same theme again in "The Assassin." But "The Informer" was a success no man might reasonably hope to repeat. There are superb scenes in the second novel. The events leading immediately up to the murder leave an indelible impression on the reader's mind; the unusual vividness of things during the agony of suspense that precedes a terrible deed terribly contemplated has seldom been more deftly set down on paper. Nevertheless, as a whole the novel loses considerably by comparison with its predecessor.

Among the short stories three must be singled out for the mastery with which they treat of a similar theme: "The Sniper," "Civil War" and "The Mountain Tavern." Whereas in the novels the author deals with the sustained agony of the drama of civil war, here in the short stories he deals with it in flashing moments—moments that, in their high light, contrive to give hints of the ebb and flow of character that lead up to and away from this chosen incident. "The Sniper" particularly remains vivid in the mind. It is years since we first read it, but that fugitive figure on the roofs, so ruthlessly pursued, remains just as fresh in our mind to-day as then.

So much for the novels and stories that have, as motif, the hounding of man by law, in war and revolution. Now for those which deal with the hounding of man by poverty, in civil life.

There is one poverty of the town and another poverty of the country; and the author who is not concerned entirely with those quips and jests wherewith human nature has mercifully learned to hide its tragedy with a light of comedy, will inevitably turn to the country rather than to the town for the scenes in which he intends to expose (for whatever reason) the stings of poverty. Not that poverty is more drab in one place than another; but that, in the town, it implies first an absence of those sophistications which are the very stuff of town-life—but which are, after all, superficial; whereas in the country it implies first a nakedness of living, a simplicity. Just because they are more elementary, love and hate, joy and sorrow among the peasants are more visible—and therefore more likely material for the artist. Selection, the artist's first necessity, is already half accomplished where poverty in the country is his subject.

O'Flaherty's two first books were "Thy Neighbour's Wife" and "The Black Soul"; and both of them were novels set in those harsh and barren islands of Inverara. They were prose epics of Irish poverty. There was little theme—so far as the term is usually understood—in the first: the main protagonist in the plot was every bit as much the village of Kilmurrage as it was Father Hugh McMahon, whose hopeless love for Lily threads through the book. "Thy Neighbour's Wife" is essentially the saga of an Inverara village by the sea, its foibles, its passions, its humours, its jealousies, its hates; and through it all there runs a vein of pathos—that men and women, who are only a little lower than the angels, should fall so far short of even their own ideal. "The Black Soul" is more ruthless, more realistic. It was this book, one may safely say, with which the author found himself. And it was in this book, moreover, that he first began his portraiture of those titanic, elementary—almost brutal—figures of which the Informer, the Assassin, and Mr. Gilhooley were to be the masterpieces.

Recently O'Flaherty has published a new novel, "The House of Gold." It too has its roots in that early, deep-bitten experience among the Irish peasantry; and it is by far the best of the work that reflects that period—if not quite the best of his work altogether. One titanic figure, Ramon Mor Costello, dominates the story. He is the author's personification of the peasant-owner whom the rising Irish middle class sought to overthrow; for this book is a kind of pure allegory; and his final and terrible downfall is brought about by the beautiful woman whom he had married—who in her turn personifies this rising middle class. Though the whole story is built upon this social theme, it is so perfectly objectified that the reader is scarcely likely to guess its larger import until reflection follows on the emotional excitement of a splendid tale splendidly told. The final chapters of "The House of Gold," wherein ruin falls on Ramon Mor and on his wife, and the village is thrown into the chaos of revolt, is as fine a thing as the author has yet achieved. Throughout the book there is the same ruthless castigation of whatever is slothful and degrading in Irish rural life as there was in his first novel—save that here its virulence is less wilful and far more knowledgeable.

"Spring Sowing" was the name of the book that immediately followed "The Black Soul"; and with this book it was clearly seen that we had a story-teller in our midst whose work put him in the very front rank of that difficult art.

The title-tale itself was like some second telling of the story of Eden: in it was all the ache of life lived in the face of unrelenting poverty but relieved, while youth and early manhood lasted, by the dumb consolation of simple peasant love.

Since that collection, two further collections of short stories have appeared, "The Tent" and "The Mountain Tavern." It is in these three books that one remaining aspect of O'Flaherty's work asks for consideration, namely, his astonishing power in dramatising the life of animals and birds. Of that particular kind of story he has written many; but one or two are all that we can pick out here, "The Wounded Cormorant," "The Wild Goat's Kid," "The Blackbird's Mate" and "The Birth"; and it is not at all extravagant to say that no one to-day is writing more appealing tales of animal and bird life than these. Not everyone will agree that it is legitimate thus to humanise these creatures in order to awaken the reader's emotions; but few would have the temerity to say, whatever they felt on that matter, that they had not been stirred thereby to a finer and richer sympathy with life on this all too alien plane.

So brief a survey of O'Flaherty's work can make no pretence whatever to estimate his place in letters to-day. This much however should be clear: here is an artist, capable of being touched to the very finest issues, and, what is more, equally capable of setting those issues down in a dramatic story form so rare that the most discriminating reader can surrender himself to the sheer pleasure of the author's art and so far from any suggestion of the precious that the most "ordinary" reader can relish the amazingly vital picture of life he puts before him.

C. HENRY WARREN.

BOOKS AND THEIR WRITERS.

LOOKING BACKWARD.

By St. John Adcock.

IT is not so customary now as it used to be for literary and other journals, at the beginning of a new year, to look back over the year that is gone and chronicle, with as much satisfaction as there is room for, the best of the multitude of books that have enriched its fifty-two weeks. The custom has dwindled, I suppose, because most of us have come to realise that no such chronicle could ever be quite reliable; it was necessarily limited to the best books the chronicler himself happened to have read; and nowadays not even the most constant reader can succeed in reading more than a comparatively small proportion of the thousands of books that make their appearance between the end of one year and the beginning of another. We should perhaps render a less dazzling but more useful service if we could look back over the year past and sort out a few books that, though nearly as good as any we have praised and better than some, were lost in the crowd and failed to meet our eye when they first appeared. This salvage work is however impracticable, unless circumstance assists you, as it has just been assisting me.

A week or two ago a friend sent me a copy of "The Shepherd and the Child," by John Owen*, protesting with uncomplimentary remarks about critics in general that it had not received the attention or met with a tithe of the success it deserved, and urging me to read it. I know John Owen's work and do not think I should have been so late in noticing a new novel by the author of "The Cotton Broker" and "The Giant of Oldbourne" if it had been sent to me earlier. I do not know what the critics may have done with it, but it has not gone so unhonoured as my friend seems to suppose, for I see it has now reached a second impression. It is no use attempting to summarise the story, for no summary could communicate the delicate art of its design or the grace and charm of style with which the narrative is developed. A poignant, strangely beautiful story, this, of the sensitive, imaginative little Sebastian (one of the most natural, gentle, wholly delightful children I have ever met in fiction) and the shepherd, Stephen Lantorn, who walks with a limp, a wartime legacy, and is as gentle, as simple and sensitively imaginative as the child himself, but with leashed passions of love and hate underlying his gentleness that make him an exacting lover, and a terrible enemy when suddenly his rage breaks blindly out of control and overshadows his and Sebastian's idyll with tragedy. It is a story that is beautiful in idea, and in the manner of its telling. A nervous, hesitating boy, with a hatred of violence, Stephen had gone into the War; and he had come out of it a gentle creature, fond of birds and animals, hating violence still and sick with horror at times when he remembered the murderous things he had done in battle, yet with those subdued, sinister impulses sleeping at his heart. When they were making him a soldier, the blood-lust had, with difficulty, been roused in him when he was instructed in bayonet drill—"when men were taught, not only to kill, but to want to kill. Fluttering-hearted little clerks who would never willingly have trodden upon a corn in the Tube became men of violence; and yet there are elderly spinsters of both sexes who wonder to-day that life and property do not seem to command the same respect as in other times."

* 7s. 6d. (Gollancz).

We are saying that the frank, sometimes disgustingly outspoken war books pouring from the press nowadays will do more to prevent another war than all the orthodox peace propaganda. There is nothing disgustingly outspoken in "The Shepherd and the Child," but its subtle showing of how the war influences, dormant in normal circumstances, survived in Stephen and drove him in a flash of rage to a barbarity as disastrous to himself as to the man who wronged him, is in its quieter way a more moving, more effective protest against war than are abhorrent revelations of the squalor of the trenches.

Mr. Robert Graves.
From a drawing by Kathleen Shackleton.

Incidentally there is a horrible passage in Mr. Robert Graves's "Goodbye to All That,"* which amply confirms all Mr. Owen says of how the bayonet drill instructors not only trained raw recruits to kill, but resolutely inoculated them with a savage desire to kill. Though the larger part of it is inevitably given to the war, "Goodbye to All That" is an autobiography, and as uncompromisingly candid and unorthodox an autobiography as any I remember Mr. Graves writes with a curious detachment of his family and friends and even of himself, almost as if he were writing a novel and he and they were imaginary characters. But, just as cheerfulness was continually breaking through the philosophy of Dr. Johnson's friend, a whimsically satirical humour, a restrained warmth of feeling breaks now and then through Mr. Graves's air of detachment into sketches of his home life in childhood and into some of his schoolboy memories, though these are streaked with a good deal of resentment. The record of his public school experiences is in the main distinctly unpleasant. He obtained a commission when the War came and at first had some faith in the cause, but was soon disillusioned; and his pictures of life in the firing-line and behind it are as grim, as ghastly, as repellent as anything in "All Quiet on the Western Front." There are enough of outspokenness and bitterness and cold contempt in his war chronicle to make it appalling. He tells of heroic deeds without comment, and without comment sets down something of the drunkenness, callousness, the almost incredible stupidities and fatal blunderings of the higher commands. He has been blamed for describing things at times with a naked realism, and for introducing into his dialogue words that are not tolerated in polite circles. But if we are to be saved from more wars it is best that we should have the truth about them; if they are a filthy business let us go into the next—if we are so mad as to have another—with our eyes open and knowing it for the filthy business it is. It needed courage, as well as other gifts, to write this book, and I would rank it second to none of the few brilliant war books that have added to our knowledge if not altogether to our enjoyment.

It is a relief to say good-bye to all this for a while and get two centuries away from it in Defoe's "Tour Thro' London about the Year 1725."* Between 1724 and 1726 Defoe published the account of his "Tour Through the Whole Island of Great Britain," and from this Sir Mayson M. Beeton and Mr. Beresford Chancellor have extracted those parts describing London, Southwark, Westminster, and certain neighbouring parts of Middlesex, thus deftly reconstructing and presenting "a living picture of London as our author saw it, supplementing for this purpose the text with annotations, maps and reproductions of old drawings and engravings, mostly contemporary with the period of his life." Defoe did for London of the early eighteenth what Stow did for London of the sixteenth century; he journeyed all about the town registering the principal buildings, telling something of their story and, whenever possible, blending his topography with any human interest that belongs to it. Rowland Hill may have extended the penny post to the whole kingdom, but about 1725, as Defoe faithfully notes, "the Penny Post, a modern Contrivance of a private Person, one Mr. William Dockwra, is now made a Branch of the General Revenue by the Post Office," and it was now brought to "so exquisite a management" that "with the utmost safety and dispatch letters are delivered at the remotest corners of the town almost as soon as they could be sent by a messenger," and that from four to eight times a day. Defoe boasts "we see nothing of this at Paris, at Amsterdam, at Hamburgh, or any other City that ever I have seen or heard of."

Dockwra, as the editors say in their annotations, "was the first to stamp letters with the date and hour of dispatch from his office." Rowland Hill deserved his pension, his knighthood, and his statue outside our London Post Office; but did Dockwra deserve nothing more than to die in poverty, about 1702, and survive as one of the many half-forgotten London worthies niched in this great story of Defoe's Tour?

All London as he knew it lives again in these pages, and the more vividly because the editors have very skilfully linked up his records with additional information, historical or topographical, that was not available to him or that he had not space for in his larger survey of the British Isles. The numerous plates are admirably reproduced and the handsome folio volume appropriately bound in an antique panelled, gilt binding that has been copied from one contemporary with the original publication. In a long introductory essay the editors have told the story of Defoe's life in London, dealing with him as man of letters, journalist, reformer, and giving an excellent and concise account of the great men who had their homes in the city he was surveying. The book is published in a limited edition and will be a valuable and beautiful addition to the collector's library.

SEVENTY TIMES SEVEN.

By JOHN RATHBONE OLIVER. 7s. 6d. (Brentanos.)

The interest of this intense story is twofold—psychological and religious. "Seventy Times Seven" is a deeply moving and serious picture of a deposed priest, Michael Mann, whose life recalls the great saints of the Early Christian Church, so waylaid is it by disillusion, temptation, persecution and misunderstanding. Michael's trials, his early poverty, his life in prison, his insight into the human mind and heart, are related by his old friend, Dr. Claude Monroe, and by extracts from his diaries. This old-fashioned device of the story-teller is skilfully handled by Mr. Oliver, whose writing is as powerful and impressive as his knowledge of psychology is wide and sound. The strange life of the unfrocked priest, and his long struggle to come back which culminates in the dramatic chapter where, dying, he says his Last Mass, would alone make "Seventy Times Seven" an unusual and outstanding book. The gallery of clerical types taken from the American Episcopal Church will interest all students of religion. This study of a broken idealist's life depicts the triumph of failure, and few readers will forget it lightly.

MORE BIOGRAPHY.

By E. CLERIHEW BENTLEY. Illustrated by G. K. CHESTERTON, VICTOR REINGANUM, NICOLAS BENTLEY and the Author. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)

For sheer delicious absurdity you cannot do better than get this book of caricature and rhyme. Mr. Chesterton and the author produced a book called "Biography for Beginners" many years ago while they were still at school. That has now become recognised as a classic. Here is another of the same order, but one or two of our younger comic artists have been called in to help, and the result is a collection of verses and a series of illustrations that keep one laughing from cover to cover. It is all good-natured fun, rollicking nonsense.

> "Of course Ranjitsinhji
> Was quite right not to be stingy.
> But I never could quite see the relevance
> Of his keeping nine thousand elephants."

None of the "biographies" contains more than four lines, but brevity is the soul of wit, and all are pithy and amusing.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JANUARY, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 14th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the seven Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

That they may be available also to Overseas Competitors, Competitions I and II will be the same each month until further notice, but the subjects for all the other Competitions may each month be changed.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS.; the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best twelve lines of humorous verse with the following rhymed endings: night, uprising, bright, surprising; vain, blessing, pain, depressing; street, obese man, beat, policeman; one, splendid, begun, ended.

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best appreciation, in not more than two hundred words, of any novel published last year that the Competitor thinks has not been sufficiently noticed.

V.—In his "Politics and Literature" (Hogarth Press), Mr. G. D. H. Cole asks: "Need literature be 'literary' in order to be great?" HALF A GUINEA is offered for the best reply in not more than two hundred words, with reference to the best example of literature that is not literary.

VI.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author and Publisher at head of each review.

VII.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

TO MEET, AS FAR AS POSSIBLE, THE OBJECTIONS MANY READERS HAVE TO CUTTING ANYTHING OUT OF THEIR COPIES, WE HAVE REDUCED THE COUPON TO THE SIZE OF A POSTAGE STAMP IN THE MARGIN AT THE BOTTOM OF THIS PAGE. NOTHING NEED BE WRITTEN ON THIS, BUT IT MUST BE CUT OUT AND ENCLOSED WITH THE COMPETITOR'S MS. OR MSS. A COMPETITOR MAY ENTER FOR ANY NUMBER OF THE SEVEN COMPETITIONS, AND ONE COUPON IS SUFFICIENT FOR THEM ALL, BUT THE NAME AND ADDRESS OF THE COMPETITOR MUST BE WRITTEN ON EACH MS. SUBMITTED.

RESULTS OF COMPETIONS FOR NOVEMBER—DECEMBER.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to Helen Mitcham, 63, Philpot Street, Stepney, E.1, for the following:

DECEMBER MIST.

I shall remember
And treasure in my store of perfect hours,
This, strange and secret and aloof, and ours,
When drear December
Showed his dim beauty that none else had known,
To us alone.

You and I only,
Hid from the world by veils of gossamer,
Held in enchanted silence with no stir,
Exquisite, lonely,
While four white swans passed on a lake of glass,
As dreams might pass.

What far horn-blowing
From faery outposts lured us through the mist,
Adventurous, elate, as to a tryst
Beyond our knowing?
What dryad's piping led us to the strand
Of fairyland?

If we may never Hear it again together, keep for me
That fragrant joy we knew, a memory,
Enduring ever,
When wonder was new-born in drear December.
I shall remember.

We also select for printing:

Let me not dwell in quiet places, Lord,
All of my days upon this fervid earth;
For who can tell serenity's true worth,
Not having known the joy she may afford
After distraction of a Life's discord
Long spent without her, or her kindred mirth?
Strife seemeth life-blood, even from our birth,
So that we must, nor of our own accord,
Wrestle against Thine elemental forms.

Wearied, half blinded by incessant wars,
Then might I stumble on a night of stars—
A quiet pool, left by the recent storms,
And I would feel as one for ever blest,
Finding there, both serenity and rest.

WINTER.

Sorrow, if you have frostier spells to bind
Upon a land already strangely chill,
The naked, silent country of my mind,
Then cover first and deepest my poor skill;
Bury my singing far beneath a thorn,
Or drown it where great wastes of water lie,
Then, as you will, let clouds be racked and torn,
My suns rise pale, my laggard perfumes die.

But though you curse my hilltops with your cold,
Strip every field and every furrow bare,
Pray, grief, pass by my prisoned summer gold,
My dead joy's music, never tarry there;
Lest, O wild rover, with your scourge and sting,
You blight in that frail harvest frailer spring.

II.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation is awarded to John A. Bellchambers, 40, Highgate Hill, N.19, for the following:

ELIZABETH PLAYS WITH FIRE. BY WINIFRED CARTER.
(Alston Rivers.)
"The rest is silence."
SHAKESPEARE, Hamlet, Act V, Sc. 2.

We also select for printing:

TAKEN FROM LIFE. BY GEORGE BELCHER.
(Alston Rivers.)
"One hundred miles an hour he went,
And quite enjoyed the fun;
A brewer's dray got in his way—
And his day's work was done!"
T. W. CONNOR, And His Day's Work Was Done.

(John P. Coghlan, 16, Fontenoy Street, Dublin.)

A WIFE OR TWO. BY C. B. POULTNEY.
(Herbert Jenkins.)
"Troubles never come singly."
Old Saw.

(I. M. Jones, Westfield College, Hampstead, N.W.3.)

THEY BEING DEAD YET SPEAK. BY CHRIS MASSIE.
(Chapman & Hall.)
"Ann! Ann! Come quick as you can!
There's a fish that talks in the frying-pan!"
WALTER DE LA MARE, Peacock Pie.

(Diana Koop, No. II House, Roedean School, Brighton.)

WOMAN DOMINANT. BY E. CHARLES VIVIAN.
(Ward, Lock.)
(1) "Her small good man
Shrinks in his arm-chair."
TENNYSON, The Princess.

(Rev. F. Hern, Rowland's Castle, Hants.)

(2) "For what are men better than sheep or goats?"
TENNYSON, Passing of Arthur.

(Sidney S. Wright, "Redcot," Mayfield Road, Bickley, Kent.)

III.—THE PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best extract from any British writer in praise of fine weather is awarded to Norah M. Butterfield, 3, Kingsley Terrace, Westward Ho!, Devon, for the following:

IN PRAISE OF FINE WEATHER.

"The flawless days of May, when big, white clouds sail leisurely over the sky, when the 'burning bush' is in the height of its beauty, and white lilac is out, and purple lilac is breaking from the bud, and chestnut spires are lengthening, and the hawthorn will not be long. Out in the fresh, green world, where thrushes sing so madly, the sweets of the morning are waiting to be gathered—more than enough for all, low at our feet, higher than we can reach, wide enough even for the travelling soul. Joy rushes in with the rain-washed air, when you fling the window wide to the dawn and lean out into the clear purity before the light. . . . Joy is your talisman, when you slip out from the sleeping house, down wet and gleaming paths into the fields. . . . Then the air is full of wings; birds fly in and out of the trees, scattering showers of raindrops as they dash from a leafy chestnut or disappear among the inner fastnesses of a fir. The east burns; the hearts of the birds flame into music; the wild singing rises in a swelling rhythm until, as the first long line of light creeps across the meadows, the surging chorus seems to shake the tree-tops."

MARY WEBB, The Spring of Joy.

We also select for special commendation the replies by E. Sweatman (Reading), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Ella Tucker (Althorne), K. M. Sanders (Bridport), Emily Davis (Dublin), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), J. E. Parsons (Ware), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Diana Koop (Brighton), Mrs. E. B. Nicholls (Liverpool), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), Isobel M. Lillie (Bridlington), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), B. A. Billings (Withington), A. Davidson (Glasgow), E. C. Latimer (Wigan), A. E. Nation (Bristol), Fred W. Flear (Harpenden), Ierne Ormsby (Addiscombe), John A. Bellchambers (London, N.), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Doreen Arbuthnot (Chelsea), Frances Lillie (Ipswich), John P. Coghlan (Dublin), Ada F. Strike (West Worthing).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best list of the twelve greatest living British novelists in order of their greatness is awarded to B. M. Beard, 214, Broadway, Bexleyheath, Kent, for the following:

1. John Galsworthy.
2. H. G. Wells.
3. Arnold Bennett.
4. G. K. Chesterton.
5. Hugh Walpole.
6. Warwick Deeping.
7. Sheila Kaye-Smith.
8. H. M. Tomlinson.
9. W. J. Locke.
10. Compton Mackenzie.
11. John Buchan.
12. Rose Macaulay.

We have left this decision entirely in the hands of the Competitors, and the correct list, according to their preferences, is as follows:

1. Galsworthy (66).
2. Wells (61).
3. Bennett (56).
4. Walpole (52).
5. Sheila Kaye-Smith (48).
6. John Buchan (33).
7. Kipling (30).
8. Barrie (28).
9. Chesterton (23).
10. Phillpotts (19).
11. Rose Macaulay (15).
12. Quiller-Couch (10).

M. Darrah and Winifred Simmons have ten of these authors in their lists, and K. M. Sanders, Gwyn Morgan and Reginald Watts nine; but though the winning competitor has eight she places them much more nearly in what is, in accordance with the preferences of the competitors as a whole, the right order. Authors who obtain from four to seven votes apiece are George Moore, Sir Hall Caine, John Masefield, Alfred Tresidder Sheppard, R. H. Mottram, Sir Philip Gibbs, A. E. W. Mason, Sir A. Conan Doyle, Compton Mackenzie, Frank Swinnerton, Virginia Woolf, J. D. Beresford, Warwick Deeping, May Sinclair and Francis Brett Young.

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best acrostic on the name of any well-known author is awarded to N. M. Butterfield, 3, Kingsley Terrace, Westward Ho!, Devon, for the following:

STELLA BENSON.

We also select for printing:

WALTER DE LA MARE.

W hisp'ring voices; winsome magic phrases;
A n atmosphere of pale, clear, moonlit phases;
L istening phantoms hid in empty by-ways,
T elling us of long-forsaken highways.
E ach portrays a picture realistic,
R adiant with some image, curious, mystic.
D eftly drawn with skilful, clear design.
E xquisite in every form and line.
L impid verse in peaceful tranquil measure,
A mid a wealth of words in golden treasure;
M ental visions of serene repose;
A flock of golden sheep at even's close.
R eplete with art, with lyric grace and charm
E ach miniature stands out, self-poised and calm.

(Kathleen Blyth, St. Joseph's Secondary School, Victoria Road, West Hartlepool.)

JOHN BUCHAN.

O n quests that allure the devil-may-care
H appy in tracking fierce beasts to their lair,
N or wanting in wit to counter a snare.

B rave hearts and swift minds that plan and that dare
U nite in emprise quixotic and rare
C ajoling foes here and coaxing fools there;
H eroes like this even highbrows can't spare
A nd Dumas and Scott can name you as heir;
N o stories to-day can match yours in flair.

(Sir Duncan Grey, "Windgarth," Weston-super-Mare)

We also highly commend the acrostics by Emily Davis (Dublin), W. R. Dunstan (Lewes), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), S. Todd (London, S.W.), Ada F. Strike (West Worthing), Mrs. Annie F. Simpson (New Southgate), Ethel M. Kennedy (Southport), A. Davidson (Glasgow), Mary Hughes (Beckenham), Irene Ardern (West Runton), J. Gedge (Taunton) J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Angela A. Verne (Benfleet), Winifred Simmons (Parkstone), Alfred O. George (Minehead), Isabel S. N. Smyth (Belfast), Iris Ottaway (Bungay).

VI.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best hundred-word review is awarded to Anne Simpson, c/o United Railways of Havana, Apartado 450, Havana, Cuba, for the following:

The Pharisee.
From "Everyman of Everystreet." By Mary D. Stocks (Sidgwick & Jackson).

THE LAUGHING QUEEN. BY E. BARRINGTON. (Harrap.)

When E. Barrington took it upon herself to humanise Cleopatra and show up the ambitious cold-blooded schemings of this truly feminine figure, she must have known she would lay herself open to comparison with the works of Arthur Weigall and Talbot Mundy. Shakespeare and Bernard Shaw have also had their say about the immortal Greek; but none have made her out so lovable or conjured up such glowing pictures of the wealth and magnificence of her surroundings, and lent such a convincing air to her associations with Cæsar, Antony and wise old Apollodorus as the author of the "Laughing Queen."

We also select for printing:

AT THE CLOSE OF DAY. BY RICHARD KING. (Hodder & Stoughton).

This little book of "friendly" essays is a collection of exquisite cameos of life. Everyday contacts and commonplace tasks are transformed as by a magic touch into revelations. Mr. King shows us the hidden splendour in everything until we rather wistfully seek it in ourselves. "Set ope the doors, O Soul," seems to be the guiding purpose of this book, and the author, we feel, has done it. It seems to me to be pre-eminently a book to be read when one is alone. It is not a railway train book, unless the carriage is empty and day is dying.

(Rev. R. K. Spedding, 92, Hartington Road, Liverpool.)

DUCHESS LAURA. BY MRS. BELLOC LOWNDES. (Ward, Lock.)

How refreshing it is, amid the spate of sex complexes, marital infidelities and the like, which floods the present-day novel, to come across a story so clean, sane and withal humorous as Mrs. Belloc Lowndes has here produced! Delightful indeed is the "romantical" Duchess, not one of whose family can match her for fineness of character, though all are influenced by her for good. Equally well drawn is the Duke, the mutual understanding between this married pair forming possibly the most charming part of the book. We are grateful for a thoroughly cheerful narrative, with the happiest of endings.

(Eileen Newton, "Hildawell," Southend Gardens, Whitby, Yorks.)

THE MAN NOBODY KNOWS. By BRUCE BARTON. (Constable.)

Here is not an historical biography, coloured by the interweaving of a little myth and toned down by a mystic haze, but a picture—full-length, noble, bold but not without beauty—significant and compelling. Like the early masters, the author draws not from the life but from a great idea, only clothing the spirit in contemporary raiment. This well-written book reveals startlingly new lines of thought, and may provoke or even shock. And the reward of the author's bold sincerity and courage is not an unworthy one; for he has turned many eyes towards the Figure he portrays.

(K. M. Sanders, "Tamworth," Bridport, Dorset.)

TRENT'S LAST CASE. BY E. C. BENTLEY. (Knopf.)

This book is more subtle than a detective story. An artist commissioned by an editor to unravel a crime mystery, is a refreshingly unusual investigator. The numberless intricate details of character and circumstance are so finely woven that the mystery is fully sustained till the end. The artist's love for the murdered man's widow keeps the truth from the law for all time, thereby preventing, if not a grave miscarriage of justice, at least unpleasantness for a lovable character. The story is, intentionally or otherwise, a convincing argument against capital punishment.

(C. S. Stamper, 54, St. Augustine Avenue, Grimsby, Lincs.)

We also specially mention the reviews by Lawrence T. Greensmith (London, S.W.), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), W. M. Spriggs (Edinburgh), L. Haggard (Norfolk), Joan Vale (Moss Vale, New South Wales), B. Noel Saxelby (Whalley Range), G. Pitt (London, N.), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Cecelia Naumann (Cranleigh), E. C. Latimer (Wigan), N. M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), Keith Baddeley (Chesham), F. D. Hague (London, N.W.), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), M. Brown (York), Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport), Mrs. Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), Ann Gibbins (Oxted), Mrs. Grace G. Webb (Rugby), Winifred Simmons (Parkstone), Constance M. Bruce (Bingley), Elsie Adderley (Bedford), A. Davidson (Glasgow), Doreen Arbuthnot (Chelsea), Rev. W. Ashby (Keighley), Ierne Ormsby (Addiscombe), Ada F. Strike (West Worthing).

STORM BIRD.

By MOLLIE PANTER-DOWNES. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)

When we get women fluting (vocally, not instrumentally), the sly whisper of chypre, and the glossy flanks of a piano, all in the first chapter, we may be pardoned for expecting some exotic scenes. Miss Panter-Downes does not, however, re-establish the vogue of the Arabian Nights to any unseemly lengths, but is content to tinkle with the normal triangle after the best modern methods. Frederick Lonsdale does the same thing with more wit but less perfume in "Canaries Sometimes Sing." In both cases it is the "uneducated savage" who is loved—but departs. What is the matter with our modern education? A word in the author's ear—neither artists nor art students now speak of the "altogether" when referring to the figure model; it is a relic of "Trilby" days, and we really must be up to date in these details!

THE SANFIELD SCANDAL.

By RICHARD KEVERNE. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

Mr. Keverne's method of producing a "thriller" without several murders to arouse our blood lust has again proved successful. The plot is conventional, and the author has armed himself with the usual mixed bag of lively characters—the missing heir under an assumed name, an international band of crooks, lawyers both good and bad, and the necessary attractive female. In spite of these drawbacks, however, Mr. Keverne has one or two additional surprises up his sleeve, and the story flows along easily, carrying the reader to the ultimate success of the virtuous in a credible fashion. If there is no opportunity in this narrative of forgetting the victim in the fun of tracking the criminal, there is at least the disturbing mystery, after all the criminals have been accounted for, as to who stole the diamond necklace.

WINTER'S NIGHT.

BY ELEANOR DUNBAR HALL. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

Sara Charles, "curiously imaginative, violently susceptible and nervously sensitive," was a rising novelist who had lost her boy lover, Philip, in the Great War, and ten years later could not bring herself to marry the brilliant doctor, Max Broome, though she really cared for him. She could not free her body and had a horror of physical passion. So partly to restore her jangled nerves, and partly to learn something about the last three generations of her forbears, she took a holiday in the bleak country of North Lancashire where, a little from documents and largely from sympathetic insight, she reconstructed the history of her father, her grandfather, her great-grandfather and her great-grandmother. What she discovered then was that her family remained sturdy and undistinguished yeoman stock until her maternal grandmother, Blanche Howarth, a beautiful girl of seventeen, married Arthur Charles, the last and degenerate member of a race of impoverished gentlemen. He remained faithful to his wife only until an accident coinciding with the birth of their son ruined her beauty and her figure. And this son, her own father, still further complicated the strain by marrying a gipsy woman's illegitimate daughter, who was her mother. Regarded from the point of view of "human documents," "Winter's Night" may seem like a Zolaesque study in heredity. But it is not that. It is a very poignant and a very convincing attempt, a fictional attempt of course, to account for the conflicting and never quite traceable pulls of personality.

THE BOOKMAN'S DIARY.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

The Memoirs of Clemenceau, translated by Mr. F. M. Atkinson, will be published by Messrs. Harrap early this year.

The first English translation of Baudelaire's Diaries is to be published next month by the Blackamore Press. Mr. T. S. Eliot has written an introductory essay for this edition, which will be illustrated with reproductions of Baudelaire's own drawings.

"Poetry at Present," which the Oxford Press is publishing about the end of this month, is a series of essays by Mr. Charles Williams on modern poets, from Hardy, Kipling, Bridges and Yeats to Robert Graves and the Sitwells.

A new book of essays by Mr. Augustine Birrell, "Et Cetera," will be published early in the spring by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

Few books for children are more popular with children themselves than are those of Mrs. Marion St. John Webb, whose new "Littlest One" collection of verses, "The Littlest One in Between" (Harrap), and the story of "Mr. Papingay's Caravan" (Collins) are among the most successful of this season's gift-books. Mrs. Webb has three new books ready, or in preparation, for this spring and summer: "Mr. Papingay's Shop" (the fourth in her series of "Mr. Papingay" stories), to be illustrated by Frank Rogers and published by Messrs. Collins; "Thirteen Stories for Children," which the University of London Press will publish; and "John and Me and the Dickory Dog," to be published by Messrs. Harrap this last being a selection from the charmingly whimsical verses for children Mrs. Webb has been contributing to the Sketch for the last two years, illustrated by A. H. Watson.

Bibliophilus Maximus, G. K. C.

Reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.

A new quarterly magazine which has just made its appearance in Australia is named Desiderata and, as its sub-title indicates, aims at serving in particular as "a guide to good books." Its many long and short reviews are well considered and well written; they are soundly critical and—a great boon to readers who are looking for guidance—are careful to tell you concisely what each book is about. In addition to the reviews, there are very good brief articles on Charles Doughty and his work, by I. M. Foster; on "The Sorrows of a Book Collector," by Camden Morrisby, whose experiences should be both a warning and an inspiration to those who are still in the opening stages of that fascinating pursuit; an excellent "Study of Theodore Powys," by Sylvia Townsend Warner; a poem by Walter de la Mare (the only outside contributors); and a devastating little essay by Randolph Bedford on "The Future of Australian Literature." Mr. Bedford declares "the new Australian novels are without blood or movement, because it has become fashionable to imitate the anæmia of novels done in England. Whereas the earlier Australians wrote of men and women they had known, these pallid prattlers do not write of even men and women they have met in books." He goes on to say: "It is a bad thing for the future of Australian literature when you find the writers of a new strong country accepting as models those dull people, the Compton Mackenzies and Walpoles and Galsworthys." This makes me wonder whether Mr. Bedford is not too sweeping in his condemnation of all the novelists of his own country. I think he should have excepted anyhow Arthur H. Adams's "Tussock Land" and "Galahad Jones," Louis Stone's realistic story of a Sydney larrakin, "Jonah," and ever since I read Chester Cobb's "Mr. Moffat" I have been trying in vain to learn something about him. "Mr. Moffat" seems to me essentially Australian in character and atmosphere, and if it is not the best novel that has come out of modern Australia, there must be better ones that I have not seen. I wonder whether Australia takes enough interest in her own novelists? A leading Australian bookseller called on me recently and I questioned him about Cobb, but he did not know the name, and the title of Cobb's finest novel stirred no memory in him, but he made a note of it and promised to inquire when he got home and give me all the information he could gather. He has now been home several months, but I have heard nothing. All which helps me to agree with the editor of Desiderata, who in his preliminary note speaks of "the paucity of Australian journals devoting much space to current literature," and the need for calling the readers' attention to "good and important books." Desiderata is published by Messrs. F. W. Preece & Sons, of Adelaide. I congratulate them on a very interesting first Number, and if it has the success it deserves it should not be long before they can realise their hopes of making the magazine a monthly instead of a quarterly.

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé.

Mr. Reginald Arkell.

After very varied and interesting experiences as journalist and editor, in London and as far away as Ceylon and Malaya, Mr. Ashley Gibson has written his autobiography—or a first instalment of it—in "Postscript to Adventure," which Messrs. Dent will publish about the end of this month. It is the story of the first thirty years of his life, and is as outspoken about all sorts of people he has known as it is about himself. Mr. Gibson has some admirable books of travel and short stories to his name, and is at present editing for Messrs. Dent their Outward Bound Library, a series of illustrated handbooks to the British Empire.

A book of the lightest, liveliest, most irresponsibly entertaining verse about Switzerland and the people who go there to make holiday is "Winter Sportings," by Reginald Arkell, with illustrations in colour by Lewis Baumer (7s. 6d.; Herbert Jenkins). Here you may read of how "Pride Goes Before a Fall," of Belinda the Clumsy, of "The Eternal Colonel," of the yodeller who could not stop singing of why it is unwise to laugh at Scotsmen, especially when they are curling and, among many other delectable things, what happened to Henry when, among the mountains, he thought he had got on a safe path from which the snow had been swept away:

> "I always failed to understand
> Why Henry went to Switzerland.
> His mind was never on the job;
> He didn't luge, he didn't bob;
> He didn't even think it fun
> To venture down the village run;
> And if he joined a tailing party,
> Directly it was time to start he > Decided that he wouldn't go
> For fear he tumbled in the snow. . . ."

Author and artist have worked together cleverly to hit off the characters, foibles, manners, customs and conduct of those who indulge in "winter sportings" in Switzerland, and have done it with a deft and whimsical humour that you can enjoy as thoroughly in your arm-chair at home as you can on the spot.

A new volume in the Outward Bound Library, "Canada West," by Frederick Niven, is to be published by Messrs. Dent this spring.

Mr. Francis Gribble has written a "Life of Balzac: The Man and the Lover," which is, I understand, based upon new material. This will be published shortly by Messrs. Eveleigh Nash & Grayson.

Mr. Robert J. Casey,
Author of "Four Faces of Siva" (Harrap).

Referring to Lieut.-Colonel F. E. Whitton's review, in our last Number, of "The Life of Lord Fisher," Admiral Bacon writes:

"Lieut.-Colonel Whitton, in his able review of 'The Life of Lord Fisher,' ends by practically asking the question why little mention was made of the battle of Jutland. It may interest your readers to know that I have been unable to trace, in such letters as have passed through my hands, any considered pronouncement on Lord Fisher's part concerning that battle. All I know from personal conversation with him is that he was disappointed, but came to see that Lord Jellicoe, whom he called 'the sure man of victory on the sea,' did all that was humanly possible.--R. H. Bacon (Admiral)."

We regret that under two illustrations from "The Medway River and Valley," by W. Coles Finch, in one of our Christmas Supplements, Mr. Jonathan Cape was named as the publisher of the book. "The Medway River and Valley" is published by the C. W. Daniel Company, to whom we offer our apologies for the error.

A book I am recommending to all who are interested in the short story is "Tales of the Little Sisters of Saint Francis," by Shaw Desmond. The tales are fanciful, whimsical, wittily wise and steeped in the charm and darkling mysticism of the Celt.

BOOKMAN.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS.

RENUNCIATION: A FRAGMENT, by Constance Wakeford (Guernsey Press Co.), consists of a series of letters to "Michael" in which the thoughts and feelings of a girl whose lover has been killed in the Great War, are expressed with courage and pathetic cheerfulness. "Michael" is the dead lover, and "Green Eyes," the writer of the letters, lives most of her time in an ugly London boarding-house and goes to an "after-care" office to do her daily work. There is proof of the agony of bereavement now and again in some of the letters, but, without any attempt at spiritualism, the author gains comfort and peace from the one-sided "communications" which form this book. Love of nature, kind-heartedness, an interesting, intimate style in writing of everyday thoughts and everyday occurrences, are all found in this slender volume. A second offer of marriage comes, but is not accepted; and ill-health comes also. There is cheerful philosophy here, and a lesson to be learnt.

With GREAT CHILDREN IN LITERATURE (7s. 6d.; Alston Rivers) Mr. Patrick Braybrooke inaugurates a new series, entitled Great Literature series, and quite appropriately the first is devoted to the outstanding dream children of literature. Children as widely diverse as Lionel Valliscourt in "The Mighty Atom," Oliver Twist, Peter Pan, Little Lord Fauntleroy, Little Nell, Judy Abbott in "Daddy Long Legs" and numerous others, are drawn with a revealing and sympathetic pen. Their differing characteristics in the light of their several circumstances, also the various methods adopted by the different authors in their creation, give abundant material for interesting comparison and conjecture. Whether we agree with Mr. Braybrooke in all his pronouncements, and few authors, we fancy, leave a more personal impress on their criticisms, it has been an intriguing excursion, which has revived many delightful acquaintances of the past.

In the preparation of his various royal biographies, Mr. Evelyn Graham must have had exceptional opportunities for gleaning an enormous amount of relevant material, and in EDWARD P. (12s. 6d.; Ward, Lock) he has made excellent use of all thereof that pertains to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales. From the rejoicings which greeted the Prince's birth in 1894 to the realities and tragedies of the War days and the ensuing difficulties and problems into which he threw himself with such praiseworthy tact and willingness, the canvas is crowded out of all proportion to the number of years represented. The outline of typical days at Oxford, York House, at the Front, etc., which, as the story progresses, develop the propensities of a snowball, leave the reader somewhat breathless and full of wonder as to how it is done. One thing is evident, it is not done without resolute perseverance and thorough attention to detail. The Queen's reply to admiration of her son's gift as a speaker is eloquent of this: "But, oh, the time he takes to prepare them!" Considering the popularity of the Prince, Mr. Graham is to be congratulated on his avoidance of fulsome flattery. It is a very human as well as royal figure that emerges from these pages. "There was a time when after dinner at G.H.Q., it was found that H.R.H. was missing from his quarters and had disappeared along the road that led to the trenches. With breathless anxiety staff officers leapt into powerful cars and scoured the country for the missing fugitive. Throughout the pitch darkness, rain and slush of the night the search progressed until about morning, amid a group of muddy poilus, His Royal Highness was found taking a hand at cards." Countless other incidents, both characteristic and revealing, sandwiched in with the activities and responsibilities which fall so unsparingly to his lot, make a most comprehensive and engaging study of His Royal Highness.

A VERNON LEE ANTHOLOGY, arranged by Irene Cooper Willis (3s. 6d.; Bodley Head), is a very welcome addition to 'The Week-end Library." It is now half a century since Vernon Lee started writing; but her work retains its vitality to a remarkable degree, and this well selected anthology should serve to introduce it to a new generation of readers. As some of her later books are being reprinted in full in this same edition, the extracts here chosen are mainly from her earlier essays. But what maturity of thought and perception, combined with an intensely fresh and individual expression, is evident in these descriptions of life in Italy, Germany and England, these disquisitions upon art, and these meditations upon character and conduct! In æsthetic sensitiveness Vernon Lee may almost be compared with Walter Pater, though there is a moral undertone in her work which gives it a strength which Pater sometimes lacked. Combined with her passionate love of beauty is a passionate hatred of self-consciousness and insincerity, and it is significant that she sometimes expresses a greater sense of spiritual affinity with crude and illiterate people than with many of the intelligentia who pretend to share her own artistic enthusiasms. This little book is a treasury of charm and wisdom. Vernon Lee has often been classified with Stevenson and Emerson, but Browning hit the mark more surely when he compared her with Ruskin. In some ways indeed she is more satisfying than Ruskin. She lacks his stature, but her spirit and ideas are more at peace with themselves.

Mr. R. Denne Waterhouse,

Author of "Jacob Awake" (Arrowsmith), reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN.

If the whole book, of which THE EARLY LIFE AND ADVENTURES OF JEAN JACQUES ROUSSEAU (8s. 6d. net; Heffer, Cambridge) is the opening section, maintains the high level so far set, then we can count on obtaining from its author, Dr. A. L. Sells, what has long been needed, a biography of Rousseau in English, which is abreast with modern research. Basing his work in part on the "Confessions," the other autobiographical writings and the correspondence of Jean Jacques and taking advantage also of the results of modern scholarship, and the new data in the "Correspondence Générale" now in course of publication, Dr. Sells has touched but lightly on that side of his subject's temperament which has attracted the attention of medical authorities and psychoanalysts and has aimed at reconstructing the texture of Rousseau's inner life from year to year and tracing the growth of his personality. The result in this prelude is a book of great charm, with the idyll of the years at Les Charmettes as its central feature and the naïveté of the man given its proper value. Yet even in describing the outset of his hero's career, the English biographer is compelled to take note of instances of that indifference to family ties and human responsibilities—apparently inherited by the philosopher from his father—which led subsequently to his abandonment of his children. In dealing with Rousseau, a carefully balanced judgment is above all things necessary. Dr. Sells, fortunately, seems to possess that quality.

There is plenty of interesting reading even in an ordinary dictionary, and much more in "Who's Who" annual biographical dictionary than in many biographies that have a whole volume to themselves. The 1930 WHO'S WHO (50s.; Black) contains about 35,000 tabloid biographies of living celebrities in all walks of public life; you learn from these at a glance all you need to know about those people—where they were born, their ancestry, their schooling, their various achievements, where they live, which are their clubs and what are their recreations. If the recreations of Sir Hall Caine, Wells, Bennett, Galsworthy are not recorded, it is pleasant to know that such a busy man as Gordon Selfridge has several, including novel-reading; that Mark Hambourg, after working brilliantly at the piano, recreates himself with numismatics, philatelics and photography; that Compton Mackenzie finds relief in the gramophone; Osbert Sitwell's recreation is "regretting the Bourbons," which does not sound very bracing; Ramsay MacDonald is a golfer and walker, but on the whole politicians, British and foreign, seem shyer even than authors are of confessing to their amusements. A man's recreations may throw sidelights on his character, it is for its wealth of personal and general information about men of the day that "Who's Who" has come to be regarded as an indispensable desk-companion in every well equipped office and library.

A HEART FOR SALE.

By E. MARIA ALBANESI. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)

We congratulate Madame Albanesi on a quietly written but constantly interesting love story. We at once take to the sturdy and independent hero, Heron Blayne, who though he is patronised and liked by rich Sir Charles Drackwell, retains his own personality. Heron becomes much interested at a dance in a neglected typist. "Jenny has very dark blue eyes which seem to be aglow with some inward flame. He also noticed that she was thin and not at all smartly dressed; as a matter of fact, though he did not know this, she was wearing a day gown." Poor Jenny is not happy. Blayne sees her home, but is dismayed to find that she is locked out by her stepsister. (But why? Read for yourself.) A capital, deftly woven tale, with perhaps just a little too much reserve at the very end.

THE SPEAKERS IN SILENCE.

By "GANPAT." 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

The author tells an enthralling yarn of thrilling deeds in northern India, rendered all the more interesting by his intimate knowledge of the country and its peoples. Aptly described on the wrapper as "A Very New Adventure," the book deals with the efforts of an extraordinary secret society which is determined to destroy the fabric of modern civilisation all over the world. The accidental discovery of their schemes by Jim Harvey, an electrical engineer engaged in wireless research, is the opening thrill, and thenceforward the reader's interest is firmly held by the adventures of Jim and his friends. The plot is decidedly original and a strong love interest is developed before the story reaches a climax that raises one to a high pitch of excitement.

THE OPALESCENT PARROT.*

This engaging bird, who (after nearly a century of listening to human-beings repeating the parrot-like twaddle of their respective generations) is shocked into articulate wisdom, to the dismay and humiliation of his hearers, is already familiar to BOOKMAN readers. He is conceived in a spirit at once of gay humour and of penetrating satire, and he not only provides a connecting link and some light relief for a series of essentially serious essays, but enables his creator to mock at certain contemporary tendencies in life and literature more irreverently and pungently than would otherwise have been possible. We had marked a number of the parrot's utterances for quotation; but here is the gravamen of his indictment against the "advanced" pseudo-intelligentsia of our day, who "have almost decided that ugliness is beauty" and "are quite sure that morals are out of date":

"'Exactly,' said the Parrot, stretching out a long, emerald wing, and scratching the back of his crimson head with an opal claw. 'Exactly; and, as I remarked, all is chaos. You are at the mercy of every wind of opinion. You don't know what you really believe on any subject under the sun. You praise minor artists in terms that would make Shakespeare blush, and you talk with utter contempt of men that could pick you all up, intellectually, between a finger and thumb, and put you in their waistcoat pockets.'"

The parrot monopolises a few brief interludes, and gets a good deal of well-aimed and well-deserved ridicule of his human prototypes off his breast. He also plays an introductory and subsidiary rôle in some of the earlier essays. But he disappears from the later ones, and he had better disappear from this review. Otherwise, intriguing though he be, we shall be giving this oracular bird more attention than he actually merits.

We had better get Bunyan, too, out of the way. In this volume of essays, most of which are revaluations of the great figures in English literature, Mr. Noyes reprints the article which originally appeared in this journal and which, he tells us, produced "nearly two hundred agitated replies in the Press." He briefly surveys the controversy, and tabulates its "results" in a manner apparently quite satisfying to himself. We will grant that Mr. Noyes scores a few points against his critics in logic; but he himself, in any other connection, would be angry at the suggestion that a great genius can be explained away by logic-chopping or dismissed because of certain glaring inconsistencies in his philosophy. In this very volume he expresses indignation against the critics who belittle Carlyle for the same reason. We readily concede that Bunyan's ideas were often contradictory and muddled. The present reviewer even anticipated Mr. Noyes in suggesting that Ignorant, in "The Pilgrim's Progress," is actually wiser than his ridiculers. That Bunyan has been over-praised by Macaulay and other eminent writers is probably true, and Mr. Noyes might have performed a valuable service in demonstrating that fact if he had not, in a mood of disillusionment, flown to the opposite extreme. Even if Mr. Noyes were correct in his estimate of Bunyan, the spirit in which that estimate is written would still be indefensible, and it betrays some logical fallacies of its own. If, for example, Bunyan were mad—"he stares at us with those pitiful insane eyes"—is it reasonable to say that he "deserved all that he got on earth" in the way of imprisonment and persecution? For some inexplicable reason, Mr. Noyes, in dealing with Bunyan, displays a bitterness conspicuously absent from the rest of his book, which as a whole glows with warm and comprehensive human sympathy.

Many readers assumed that Mr. Noyes's attitude towards Bunyan reflected his antagonism to Puritanism in general; and, with the Bunyan essay alone before them, that would be a warrantable conclusion. It is one however which the eighteen other essays in this volume do not confirm. Mr. Noyes certainly does not hide his Roman Catholicism under a bushel; but, in the light of his magnificent tribute to Milton, his enthusiasm for the best (but least known) work of Longfellow, and his praise even for the Quaker poet, Whittier, he stands exonerated from any charge of prejudice. He recognises that Shelley was only an "atheist" in that he was more Christian than the Christians—his vision of "world-sustaining love is at one with the vision of St. John"; and though belief in authority naturally makes him critical of "the literature of rebellion," Mr. Noyes pays just homage even to Voltaire, who condemned the God of the theologians rather than God Himself. Mr. Noyes quotes from Voltaire's "Ode sur le Fanatisme," and adds:

"What is this but an insistence on the very attributes of the Deity which it has been the glory and the power of the Christian religion to find in its own Founder, and to give as the central explanation of its own mystery, 'God so loved the world'? Creeds and systems, theologies and theologians may have failed again and again and to the uttermost; but nothing can alter the fact that the strength of Christianity, the wisdom that was hidden from the wise and revealed to the simplicity and love of little children, the infinite justice at one with infinite mercy and divine compassion, had so wrought upon the minds of men that Voltaire himself was intellectually compelled to judge its priests by the standards they had forgotten."

It is Mr. Noyes's peculiar virtue as a critic that, whether he is discussing literature or life, he brings us back, again and again, to the fundamental realities and simplicities. Intellectually, he is alert to a remarkable degree, and his judgments are based upon a thorough mastery of his data. Spiritually however he is usually on the side of the child against the wise men, as is shown most delightfully of all, perhaps, in his attitude towards the commentators on Shakespeare's Sonnets. And, speaking of Shakespeare, we should add that Mr. Noyes does not appear in this volume merely in the rôle of critic, but as true "essayist" or impressionist also. His prose style has gained enormously in dignity, restraint and power. It is lyrical without a trace of floweriness or sentimentality. There is —notably in the appreciation of Chaucer and in "An April Day," with its musings upon the miracle of genius born to obscure parents in a wayside cottage near Stratford-on-Avon—some extraordinarily charming writing in his pages. This is indeed a many-sided, beautiful and noble book, always graceful and often gay, yet inspired by a passionate sincerity, a spontaneity, and a spirituality that are thrice welcome in this day of pontificial negations and of parrot-like superficialities.

DR. MACFIE'S POEMS.

Dr. Macfie in this collected edition* of his poems shows himself to be a meditative poet. He uses verse to express not so much what he sees as the thoughts evoked by what he sees. For instance, in "The Titanic," which is one of his best poems, there is practically no realistic description of the wreck, but a continual play of the poet's philosophic imagination upon ideas suggested by it. He recognises this himself, for he gives the poem the sub-title " An Ode of Immortality." This ode, in effect, is typical of all Dr. Macfie's best work.

* "Collected Poems of Dr. Ronald Campbell Macfie." 7s. 6d. net. (Cayme Press.)

As a poet of what might be described as " philosophic onlooking " he is a writer of a high order. There is a breath of Lucretius blowing through his verse. The scientific outlook strengthens not only the fibre of his imagination, but also the colour of his vocabulary. In this he seems to possess something of the literary temper of John Davidson, especially the John Davidson of the " Mammon " trilogy and the " Testament " series, though there is this difference between the two poets : Dr. Macfie is a mystic as well as a scientist, while Davidson was an imaginative realist.

As a technician Dr. Macfie is concise rather than rich, with the result that his measures tend to be harmonic as against melodic ; that is to say, he is better at the ode than at the song. His work is finer at all points when he can set his mind brooding—and, moreover, brooding logically—upon his subject, with the consequence that when, as in a lyric pure and simple, it is a question of a kind of divine inconsequence, he is not uniformly so successful. Goethe said about lyric poetry that it should be logical in its whole but inconsequent in its parts, by which he meant no doubt to indicate the necessity in the finest lyric poetry of the waved thyrsus and the impassioned dance. There is no thyrsus waved in Dr. Macfie's lyrics ; they are too meditative to be fiery, too mentally wrought to be " filled with the God."

For all that, he has his lyric successes : " A Day in June," " Unattainable " and " Wild Roses " possess what many of the others—even when in most lyrical measures—lack, and have a rarer music. But finer as a poem is the less lyrical and more philosophical " The Mystic," which I should like to quote :

" Lo, I and He
Are Earth, and sea,
And clod, and god, and worm, and star ;
'Twixt His and mine
There is nor line,
Nor boundary, nor bar ;
Out into His Infinity
My finite reaches far ;
And yet I know not what He is, nor what we singly are—
What Infinite Perfection makes and finite senses mar.
I merely thrill
Beneath His Will,
And know that He must be—
That heart
And limb
Are part
Of Him,
And He a part of me—
That we grow one
In star, and sun,
And Earth, and sky, and sea."

I have quoted that for two reasons. The first is because it is a fine poem in itself, and the second because it seems to me to exemplify a tendency that in others of Dr. Macfie's poems but not in this—is subversive of true music : the too frequent use close together of lines of two feet and even of only one foot. Such prosodic units when used too consistently and without sufficient interval become dangerously facile, especially in regard to rhyming, and give the ear a jolt rather than the true pleasure of metrical surprise.

Dr. Macfie is no modernist in his conception of poetry ; he does not seek to be iconoclastic either in technique or the spiritual approach to his art. Where his music is most individual it is through new combinations of line-lengths, not in any attempt at discovering a new norm. New norms and exaggerated metrical theories are for those who have nothing to say and so are reduced to evolving intricacies to cover up their want of the true simplicity of creation. To say a great thing greatly is not to have to say it strangely or provocatively. But Dr. Macfie cannot be accused of having nothing to say ; he packs his verse with more genuine thought than verse generally carries ; he has a high passion of thinking, and passionate thought is an emotion as suited to the lyre as " the love that moves the sun and the other stars."

A collected volume calls in some measure for assessment, and yet assessment is a most ungrateful task, presupposing in the critic qualities that even the greatest critics never possess. No man, at any given period of literary history, can make a safe pronouncement upon a contemporary's chances of immortality. The only court with any pretence to authority is that of the Ages. We cannot be expected to do posterity's work for it ! Still, it is possible to indicate a writer's virtues, and also his limitations, without necessarily saying at the same time that those virtues or limitations are such as will compel, or hinder, continuous appreciation through after-times.

Obviously Dr. Macfie has neither narrative nor dramatic powers. He is a lyric poet in the sense that Pindar was a lyric poet, not in the sense that Catullus was, or Burns, or Shelley. At the same time he has nothing of Pindar's swiftness. Where Pindar rushes headlong upon his subject, Dr. Macfie analyses it and meditates upon it. His work therefore rarely has action ; it is to a certain extent static, and that makes towards sameness. There is a limiting homogeneity about it. Its range is deep rather than wide, and its appeal not universal, for only the wise will love it—while even the very unwise can love the Shakespeares and the Brownings and all the poets of human fellow-feeling. Dr. Macfie is more in the line of the Matthew Arnolds, with a touch of the brawniness of the Drydens.

I have left until last any consideration of his ode entitled " War." It is his finest achievement, and is beyond question one of the very highest examples of the poetry inspired by the late struggle. It is, as others have said, one of the greatest odes in the language, with a tinge of the epic in it, and no critic should be unwilling to recognise it as such. It is too long to quote, and extracts would give no idea of its logical sweep, its metrical range, its amplitude of vocabulary. He shows in it the power—rare among our living poets—of concrete thinking. Moreover, he is not afraid to forget himself, to swamp the nerves—the source of so much modernist verse !—in vaster considerations, and to admit to a sense of morality—and English poetry has always been peculiarly happy when dealing with moral magnitudes. In this ode it is so once more, and for this poem alone Dr. Macfie's " Collected Poems " should be set upon the shelves of all those for whom poetry is no idle singing but a matter of strenuous beauty.

QUALITY WITH QUALIFICATIONS.*

Mr. Frank Swinnerton, in an entertaining article in the October BOOKMAN, says :

" I have never been able to understand why anyone should wish to be a writer. What do we see in the game of writing to attract us ? Not money certainly ; for the professional boxer, the business man, the racing motorist, the jockey and the defeated politician who joins Boards of Directors all make more money than the author. Not a love of ease, for there is no harder work than authorship. Having had twenty-five years' experience of the business, I know that by comparison with the author the busiest business man idles."

I agree with every word of that. Yet I go on. So does Mr. Swinnerton. So do thousands more. We all know that we are squandering the mighty gifts that a malevolent Providence bestowed on us as a birthday present. We know that had we used those gifts to material ends we should now be enjoying greath wealth, great fame, great honours. We know that we are the greatest of all humankind, that ours are the only works of man which have any chance whatsoever of attaining immortality. There are other great artists—in painting, music, sculpture and architecture. Their fame, their works may endure for many centuries, even for a thousand years. The work and the fame of the genius in words endureth from the beginnings to the terminals of this new-born cult of civilisation. Science, in the wide sense, has its little day and passes. Philosophy, poetry, story-telling, these three manifestations of the writer's art shall never pass away. And novels? What of these most recent ephemera in literature?

They only shall survive if they are novels with a purpose. All the greatest novels, all the novels that have achieved resounding popularity, have been novels with a purpose, and that purpose not wholly and solely the beguilement of an idle hour.

Here are five novels, four of them very good in their kind, and the fifth— well, negligible. " Two Wives " is a commonplace story, pleasantly told. The same story has been told countless times, and almost without variation. Here we have the usual seduction of the usual perfect maiden who never existed. We have the usual heart-broken lover marrying the usual coarse, up-to-date daughter of the usual horrible old war profiteer. All the minor characters are moulded to the usual pattern. Then come the usual wild coincidences, improbable happenings, and the providential deaths of all the inconvenient people. To savour the dish there is a seasoning of elementary French to flatter the reader into believing that he is really quite a linguist. But, one outstanding merit: the book is clean. Yet, despite even that handicap, it may still become a best seller.

" Kettledrum " is a first novel, and a very good one. To quarrel with the technique would be to deal unfairly with this most promising work of a new writer. But, in the author's own interest, might I point out that it is a mistake to introduce a whole crowd of characters in the first chapter? It is also a mistake to be too consciously clever, though this is a fault soon outgrown. Nor is it wise to write in this strain: " I never read novels, but can't avoid hearing their titles. His last sounds like a second edition of his first hot-pot! Why can't these young authors leave off boiling up stuff that has been on the boil for centuries and will boil on till the end of time? You'd think they thought they had discovered vice! Why lunatics with cacoethes scribendi are allowed loose beats me." As I have hinted, it beats both Mr. Swinnerton and me too. But surely the expression of that sentiment is out of place in a first book? Yet I think we would both sincerely praise this novel and urge the author to go on.

Now hear another modern maiden speaking: " After all, there's more in life than just this sex business. Falling in love and all that. I don't want to fall in love. I haven't any urge that way." Thus Diana at the crossways, in Miss Mills Young's new novel " Four Seasons." Of course Diana falls in love and marries in due course: which is to say, after many setbacks and other obstructions. A delightful book in this accomplished novelist's best vein, tender, humorous, well conceived and well ordered. The thumbnail studies of Devonshire peasant types are particularly diverting.

And now here at last is the novel with a purpose. I have not read a more original or pungent book than " Females " since Gissing's " Odd Women " came my way. It is concerned with the same theme of frustrated womanhood. But here we view the problem from a totally different angle, and in a clearer light. We are introduced to a dozen or more women, only one of whom is married. The rest are just wasting their sweetness on the desert air for lack of men to come along and fertilise them. Each one of the younger generation is in some sort a careerist. Only one of them finds even an illusory satisfaction in her career. The rest, in the words of the wildest and wisest among them, declare boldly that women do not want freedom, as freedom for women is understood nowadays. " They want men and they want marriage, a better, freer marriage . . . but they want it just as their mothers wanted it "—with all its implications. A novel full of force and fire, of passion and revolt, deeply pathetic, profoundly tragic, and yet not altogether gloomy, never at any time morbid. To miss " Females " is to miss a very masterpiece of realism, idealism, revelation.

I have too little space left in which to do anything like adequate justice to " The House of the Dey." It is another most original novel and at the same time a consummate work of art. It is also a tale of tremendous thrills. It gripped me fast throughout. The period of the story is a hundred years ago, and yet its general tone is up to date as the latest thing in winter wear. I can aver with conviction that this is the most legitimately exciting novel I have read for years, and at the same time one of the most finely imagined and splendidly wrought.

EDWIN PUGH.

TWO ESSAYISTS.*

In the lightest of the essays contained in this volume Mr. Huxley confesses that " I find nowadays that I simply don't want to be up-to-date. I have lost all desire to see and do the things, the seeing and doing of which entitle a man to regard himself as superiorly knowing, sophisticated, unprovincial." The confession is rather surprisingly naïve in a writer who throughout the rest of the book devotes himself, to the exposition, from various angles, of a philosophy of life. Yet ingenuousness is no less a characteristic of his philosophy than of this personal aside.

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. Aldous Huxley.

Mr. Huxley shares with Mr. D. H. Lawrence and many other sensitive critics of the modern world the conviction that " circumstances have led humanity to set an ever increasing premium on the conscious and intellectual comprehension of things. Modern man's besetting temptation is to sacrifice his direct perceptions and spontaneous feelings to his reasoned reflections; to prefer in all circumstances the verdict of his intellect to that of his immediate intuitions." And he is certain that " a life lived, as far as may be, exclusively from the consciousness and in accordance with the considered judgments of the intellect, is a stunted life, a half dead life."

The growth of science, and the mechanisation of life which has derived from it, provide the most obvious proof of the correctness of his diagnosis. But science itself, like industrialism, derives from the Protestant impulse, with its assertion of the rights of individual will and judgment, and the authority of the mind in determining truth. So far as Protestantism has encouraged an exclusive intellectualism and an acquisitive individualism, it deserves Mr. Huxley's condemnation, although his judgment of " the Bible-reading Protestants," who introduced into Europe the idea that " there was only one God, and He existed primarily to see that the virtuous were successful," is superficial and one-sided. He assails however not only Protestantism, but monotheism, and he claims that " monotheism and polytheism are the rationalisations of distinct psychological states, both undeniably existent as facts of experience, and between which it is quite impossible for us, with the merely human faculties at our disposal, to choose." Elsewhere he writes that " one psychological fact is as good as another; there is no conceivable method of demonstrating that God is either one or many." This assertion of the equal validity of all psychological facts is repeated several times throughout his essays, and his whole philosophy is based upon it. But in accepting it as adequate he shows that he himself is limited by the scientific attitude of which he demonstrates in other ways the defects.

To the detached observer one psychological fact is as good as another. But those who have striven, however imperfectly, to cultivate the spirit, to deepen their perception and to harmonise their being, know that experience has degrees of value, of meaning and of reality. The problem which life presents to such is that of reconciling the One and the Many, of being consistently one and inwardly free amid all the diversity of moods, and of transcending the duality of the mind and the senses in an achieved wholeness of being.

It may be, as Mr. Huxley contends, that " people will cease to be interested in unknowable absolutes," but a philosopher who lightly rejects the possibility of experiencing the timeless within time and the absolute in the relative, merely betrays his own incapacity. And he betrays it equally closely when he describes the saints as representing " but one aspect of human life —the ' spiritual.' " For him in short the spiritual is one psychological state, the intellectual another and the sensational another. And each may and should be enjoyed independently. Hence the philosophy which he defines in his essay on Pascal as " Life-worshipping," or more simply in the title of his book. Essentially it represents a sanctification of immediate impulse, of living alternatively and to the full on each plane of the being without necessarily either evaluating or relating them. He admits indeed that " men must organise their diversity into some kind of singleness," but the process, so far as he defines it at all, is external and superficial. The inadequacy of such a Protean philosophy hardly needs stressing. It is enough to say that true spirituality, far from representing one aspect of human life, informs and includes them all. The senses are elements in it no less than the mind, and a perfected personality is its ideal expression. Mr. Huxley indeed champions a " humanity perfected and consummate " as the ultimate ideal, but his free-and-easy life-worshipper could never in our opinion perfect his humanity, because he could never subordinate his diversity to a really significant unity.

Mr. Huxley therefore has value chiefly as a critic of all the dualistic perversions, the false denials, the diseased self-destructiveness in which the pursuit of the spiritual has involved men in the past. But as an expositor of the laws governing true creativeness he can offer little more than the psychoanalyst who confines himself to the resolving of complexes and the loosening of inhibitions.

Mr. Priestley, by contrast, has no explicit philosophy to offer his readers, but he has, what is perhaps even better, an implicit humour. At the same time we cannot wholly acquit him of being one of those who, in Mr. Guedalla's words, tend to establish a standard psychology for essayists by handling filmy themes " with an arch modesty and a shy obtrusion of their private characters." Certainly if he is never quite guilty of shambling forward with a shy grimace which serves to tell us that he is a friendly creature with a world of small human weaknesses and a whole host of minor (but strictly reputable) failings, he seldom quite succeeds in making us forget that he is the professional entertainer, even when his confidences are most intimate. The entertainment however is as good as it is various.

HUGH I'A. FAUSSET.

THE UNIVERSE AROUND US.*

From all time the science of astronomy has dealt with immensities vast enough " to tease us out of thought," to bewilder the intellect, to baffle the imagination. Even Ptolemaic astronomy had its vastitudes. And to-day modern telescopes and modern mathematical methods have revealed immensities behind immensities, and depths beyond depths, till figures and measurements have ceased to have any definite intellectual meaning, and have become little more than symbolical or emotional expressions of the inconceivable and transcendental.

In his last remarkable book, " The Universe Around Us," Sir James Jeans—perhaps the most distinguished of living mathematicians—gives us the modern view of atom and star, and overwhelms us with a sense of the " boundless inward in the atom, boundless outward in the whole." He reveals to us a universe with infinitudes of space, eternities of time and omnipotencies of energy—a universe where electrons a millionth-millionth of an inch in diameter fly round their infinitesimal orbits, several million million times a second, at the rate of hundreds of miles each second—a universe where each nebula in space has in it enough matter to make 2,000 million suns—a universe where there are nebulæ so distant that light travelling from them at the rate of 186,000 miles a second, takes 140 million years to reach us—a universe so large that all the million stars in it are as little crowded as would be six specks of dust in Waterloo Station. Figures like these stultify themselves and amount to little more than a string of superlatives, though they at least make us realise the inconceivable size and complexity of our environment. But Sir J. J. Jeans deals with more than figures: he gives dramatic pictures of the dynamics of the universe that the imagination can grasp, and he reaches the great conclusion that must affect a man's whole outlook on life, and time, and eternity. He deals at length, for instance, with the theory, now universally held, that matter is not eternal but can be converted into radiant energy. Every planet, every sun, he tells us, is melting away into radiant energy and is in course of annihilation. To give us heat and light the sun is losing weight at the rate of a million tons a second, while the star S. Doradus in the Lesser Magellanic Cloud is wasting away at 300,000 times that rate. The energy given off in the course of this annihilation or transformation of matter is tremendous—" Annihilation leaves nothing behind ; it is a combustion so complete that neither smoke, ash nor cinders is left. If we on earth could burn our coal as completely as this, a single pound would keep the whole British nation going for a fortnight, domestic fires, factories, trains, power-stations, ships and all ; a piece of coal smaller than a pea would take the Mauretania across the Atlantic and back." The sun had once a hundred times its present weight, and it had lost ninety-nine hundredths of its weight before life appeared on the earth. Most of the matter in the other planets of the Solar System has also been annihilated. So that life would seem to be merely the produce of a cinder heap.

This theory of the annihilation of matter naturally leads to the question of the beginning and end of the universe. Had it a beginning and will it have an end ? This question Sir J. Jeans answers without hesitation. He maintains that " probably about 200 million years ago matter which had not previously existed, came, or was brought into being," and that the universe cannot go on for ever—" With universes as with mortals, the only possible life is progress to the grave." As to life on earth, Sir J. J. Jeans believes that barring accidents and any sudden shrinkage of the sun, the human race may survive a million million years.

Sir J. J. Jeans is not only a great man of science ; he is an admirable writer and expositor. Abstruse, technical and difficult though much of his subject be, he is always accurate, lucid and interesting, and we have rarely read a more fascinating book. It grips one like a drama ; it delights one like a work of art.

A LONG-LIVED LORD CHANCELLOR.*

The late Lord Halsbury, in addition to his longevity and long tenure of legal offices, was remarkable as a Tory of Tories who, despite the fact that his beliefs appeared obstructive to a later and more impatient generation of political opponents (and sometimes to men of his own party), never lost their respect and affection for himself as a man. In their opinion he might be a political old fogy in his last years when, at the age of eighty-seven, he led the band of Diehards against the machinations of Messrs. Lloyd George and Asquith, but they respected his personal integrity, his genial personality, his tenacious memory, and his great gifts as an advocate in his earlier years at the Bar.

* " The Earl of Halsbury." By A. Wilson-Fox. 30s. (Chapman & Hall.)

Born in 1823 in Penton Street, in the days when Pentonville was still a rural suburb—almost the same as Grimaldi describes it in his " Memoirs " a quarter of a century before —Hardinge Giffard was the son of a clever father, Stanley Lees Giffard, editor of The Standard, a member of a decayed Devonshire family who in the Middle Ages were possessed of good estates and traced descent from the Norman lords of William the Conqueror. The boy was educated at home, and when he went to Oxford in 1842 great expectations were entertained for his future by reason of his brilliant gifts. It was a disappointment therefore when he only took a fourth class, the reason being, according to his biographer, that his father, " Dr. Giffard, had never taught him the meticulous criticism, the 'art' of emendation, or the rare rules of grammar which University examiners in their quaint wisdom consider so vastly important." For the next five years Hardinge Giffard assisted his father with The Standard, writing for it regularly on every variety of subject. Mrs. Wilson-Fox gives a pleasant glimpse of this period :

"Every morning two strong, thick-set figures the editor in his full-skirted frock-coat, double-folded stock, fob and high hat, and his son probably less conventionally attired—would set out from the Pentonville house to The Standard office. In 1845 a few omnibuses were running in London, but the Giffards liked to go on foot. They were always great walkers. Now, however, the green fields of twenty years back had gone for all time, though the old rural names remained, and all about them had sprung up narrow, ill-paved streets of mean houses. They would march along Coppice Row, down Saffron Hill . . . and so past the New Model Prison to Holborn. There they would cross into Farringdon Street, where the Fleet river—little more than a sewer—still waited to be hidden away from the eyes and noses of men, and so into New Bridge Street, whence The Standard still fulminating against Radical iniquities, kept on its respectable way."

At length Hardinge Giffard resolved to become a barrister. He was called to the Bar at the age of twenty-seven. His success was immediate ; within a year prosperity was attained, and he found himself in a position to marry and take a house in Gloucester Place, Portman Square. " There was a virile force about him, a combativeness, a strength of conviction and a pertinacity which carried all before him. And he knew the right moment for the employment of a quick daring, which time and again gave him the victory." One of his early successes was in securing the commutation of the death sentence passed on Thomas Smethurst (and his eventual pardon), accused of poisoning Miss Bankes. Arsenic and antimony were found in the body, and Giffard turned the tables on the prosecution by advancing that these poisons could have been introduced into the dead woman's body by means of the copper used in the analysis of the organs. In 1869 Giffard defended Lord Carrington (the late Marquis of Lincolnshire) on a charge of assault, he having horse-whipped Grenville Murray for an article, published in The Queen's Messenger, attacking Carrington's father, who had died the previous year. The case ended with a free fight in court, black eyes and bloody noses.

The Lord Chancellor in Peer's Robes.

From "The Earl of Halsbury Lord High Chancellor," by Mrs. A. Wilson-Fox (Chapman & Hall).

Hardinge Giffard attained great prominence as counsel for the Claimant in the original case of Tichborne v. Lushington (1871), a cause célèbre whose reverberations still sound ; but when the Claimant in turn became defendant, in a charge of perjury, Giffard no longer appeared for him, for he had lost faith in Orton or whoever the man actually was by birth. In 1876 Giffard was appointed Solicitor-General, and in the following year he was elected M.P. for Launceston. In the House he was active in the measures against Bradlaugh and his method of taking the oath, for Giffard was ever a fervid Protestant. He became Lord Chancellor for the first time in 1885, at the age of sixty-two, when he also was created a baron ; the earldom of Halsbury followed in 1897. His greatest achievements as the head of the legal profession are associated with the Bill which enables an accused person to give evidence on his own behalf, and the establishment of the Court of Criminal Appeal. Although these measures were primarily of benefit to ordinary, and often criminal, men, Lord Halsbury had but little sympathy with democracy. As an ultra Tory he believed that only men of birth and breeding and culture were fitted to rule and hold high offices ; he expressed his view that ignorant and undisciplined minds " will always act either to favour some doctrine in which they fanatically believe, or to serve the most obvious interests of the moment." In his home life he was genial and fond of children and cats. His keen sense of humour is aptly illustrated by extracts from letters.

Mrs. Wilson-Fox has done her work well in a simple, straightforward, narrative manner, without any literary pyrotechnics. She supplies excellent résumés of legal and political cases in which Lord Halsbury was concerned. It is a pity that she needlessly went out of her way to make one erroneous statement, namely that in 1848, when Hardinge Giffard was a special constable at the time of the Chartist Demonstration, " there were only two bridges spanning the Thames in London." Presumably she means London Bridge and Blackfriars Bridge; without making any research into the question of how many bridges there were actually in 1848, one may safely advance the belief that Westminster Bridge and Waterloo Bridge were most certainly in existence then, and most probably also Southwark Bridge and Vauxhall Bridge, to say nothing of the old wooden bridge which spanned the Thames at Battersea.

Lord Halsbury died in 1921, at the age of ninety-eight. Born in the reign of George IV, he was one of the few men who could remember the whole of the Victorian Era and survive it for twenty years. He knew the best days of the horse-coach; he witnessed the rise of the railway and the decline of the horse. He lived to see the roads again bustling with the motor-car, and above them aeroplane and airship. Truly a marvellous retrospect.

TALES OF TO-DAY AND YESTERDAY.

If Miss Tennyson Jesse's[1] characters do not stand out with sufficient distinction from the background of gilded glory that was the Palace of Royal Mandalay in the latter half of the nineteenth century, it is because that background is painted in such gorgeous colours, is such a pageant of flashing gems and glittering wonder, that we are perhaps a little too dazzled to look with sufficient intensity at such unattractive people as the pious Agatha, and shallow little Fanny Moroni, whose fatal love affair brought about the British conquest and the overthrow of Burma in the year 1885. The background is a prodigious and brilliant piece of work; the atmosphere of the court, with all its Eastern barbarities and extravagances, is conveyed with a wonderfully realistic touch, and the book only fails in that it does not arouse our sympathy for any one of its characters. It is not that they are too human, but that they are not human enough. Miss Tennyson Jesse regards humanity with a cynical eye, and is so anxious to guard against sentimentality that she rules out sentiment. The result is that we watch the comings and goings of her men and women with interest but without emotion; we catch her habit of criticising while remaining aloof from their feelings; we laugh at them, never with them. The book nevertheless is a clever blending of history and fiction; it was a stupendous task to undertake, and deserved to be singled out by the Book Society.

Miss Netta Syrett, in her "Portrait of a Rebel"[2] also takes us back to the Victorian age, but her background is a conventional English one, and her lovely, passionate, intelligent Pamela is a very different being from the sly, supple, dark-skinned Fanny who flitted through the Palace of Mandalay. Pamela was born a rebel against the restrictions imposed on women and the hypocrisy that hemmed them in. Her bohemianism coupled with ignorance led her to a disaster that, in those days, might be considered the greatest disaster a woman could encounter—but, with her dominating temperament and aided by circumstances, she overcame it and sheltered herself from disgrace. We get the whole story of her long life—for she lived long enough to see her granddaughter enjoy the freedom she had striven for—a poignant, arresting story, quietly told yet always interesting.

Quiet too, in its way, but a book of such singular merit that it is difficult to speak too highly of it, is "The Necessary Man,"[3] by Miss Agnes Logan—a first novel of unusual strength and beauty. The beauty is not so much in the telling—the style is simple and straightforward—as in the whole scheme, in the author's intimate understanding of ordinary folk and in the philosophy she brings to bear on life with its tragedies and comedies. Sandy Brocklebank, eldest son of a Bedfordshire farmer, is believed by his family, and believes himself to be indispensable to the farm. He sets aside personal ambition for it, it comes between him and the girl he wants to marry, it prevents his going to the war; and yet in the end, when an accident forces him temporarily to surrender his authority, he discovers he is not indispensable, the farm goes on without him, another steps into his place. And he finds something else too—that all his sacrifices have not been sacrifices to the extent he imagined; it was not the farm he hated, but having his liberty curtailed; when he knows himself free to go, he loves it and stays. This summary gives no adequate idea of the charm and delicate skill of the book, nor of the naturalness of that Bedfordshire family. It is a sincere and satisfying piece of work.

Mrs. Kate Whitehead, whose first novel, "The King's Legacy," was published a short time ago, has now written another, "For Prince Charlie."[4] That the author has suffered all her life from the severe disability of total deafness, gives perhaps significance to the fact that in "For Prince Charlie," a story full of romance and action, she introduces among other personages from real life, Henry Baker, whose astonishing power of teaching the dumb to speak stirred London in the eighteenth century. Mrs. Whitehead is to be congratulated on a very interesting tale.

BROWNING AS GUIDE.*

The idea that poetry has any "moral" or "message" is one that is indignantly rejected by the fashionable poets and critics of our own day. It will be remembered that the foxes (in the fable) which had lost their tails attempted to exalt taillessness into a virtue in order to hide what was really their jealousy; and we sometimes suspect that the modern impatience with "teaching" in poetry has a similar explanation. Too many of our contemporary poets have nothing of importance to say; they are almost wholly preoccupied with mere rebellion or mere moods; and consequently they denounce as a vice what, if we could read their secret minds, they probably envy as a virtue. At all events, most of the great poets of the past have been philosophers as well as singers. In the highest poetry of course the philosophy and the song are inseparable, and the "message" is implicit in the music. But that is a perfection to which even the greatest poets have only attained in their most inspired moments. In the majority of great poets there is both implicit and explicit "teaching," and it is only a kind of æsthetic snobbery or logic-chopping that declines to recognise the fact. It is true that poetry, like the Bible, has suffered many things at the hands of the commentators, who are often not merely a self-important but a perverse race, darkening what is clear instead of lightening what is dark. Nevertheless, there is room for the good commentator; and such Dr. John Hutton again proves himself to be.

Twenty years ago Dr. Hutton wrote a book called "Guidance from Robert Browning in Matters of Faith." That little volume still maintains its popularity throughout the English-speaking world, and its numerous admirers will now welcome the sequel which lies before us. In this "Further Guidance" Dr. Hutton concentrates his attention upon the series of poems called "Ferishtah's Fancies." Ferishtah, it will be remembered, is an Eastern sage, to whom the most varied people turn for companionship and friendly counsel, and who talks to them in stories and parables drawn from the observation of homely, daily commonplaces, from which he carries their thought by easy stages to the infinite. The setting is Oriental; but Ferishtah is after all but another of those dramatis personæ through whose lips Browning discusses his own views of man, God, and destiny. Browning was often a man talking, through an assumed character, to himself. His philosophy was frequently experimental, and Dr. Hutton warns us against accepting it as final or dogmatic. Dr. Hutton himself never dogmatises. All he says in effect is: "This is what this or that poem means to me"; and he says it in such a way as to inspire us to seek if possible another and equally clear meaning for ourselves :

"The justification of Browning, and of any man who presumes to have a formula for life, is that for him it is not always a formula. What we want when we go to another for guidance is not so much light or an answer to our question. We know that no other can ever answer our question. At best he can only find an answer to his own. What we want, and what we are in need of, whether we are aware of this or not, is sympathy with our condition. We want some friendly mind not to despise us, but to share with us our sense of the problem, or our dullness to evidence which is sufficient for others."

These words are as applicable to Dr. Hutton himself as to Browning. Dr. Hutton is no prosy, didactic commentator. He is a true and sympathetic interpreter. Nor does he forget that if he is interpreting a philosopher he is also interpreting a poet. His paraphrasing of "Ferishtah's Fancies" admirably captures the spirit of the original. It is full of terse, vivid word-painting, of mingled vigour and tenderness, of humour and satire ; and the "guidance" emerges naturally and incidentally from a retelling of the stories. This is a wise, helpful, human little book, which the most careful student of Browning need not despise, and which should prompt many new readers to turn to a poet who is "too big a man to belong to any one generation." Dr. Hutton's advice to readers, when confronted by the critic who declares Browning out of date, is that given by Isaiah on a famous occasion : "Answer him not."

GILBERT THOMAS.

"MR. JUSTICE DARLING."

It is a fact that no judge in our time has captured the imagination of the public and the respect of his colleagues of bench and bar in quite the same fashion as the subject of this biography.* Predecessors of his, the legal luminaries of an age when newspapers printed news and "publicity" remained an undiscovered art, never of course had the chance. It is certainly not his fault, and perhaps slightly his misfortune, that from the moment of his first judicial appointment "Mr. Justice Darling," as he must affectionately remain in the thoughts of his contemporaries in every walk of life, should have been marked down by the reporters as "good copy."

Luckily Lord Darling is too great and good a lawyer and man to have his excellently balanced head turned by consciousness of his own vogue as a "card," if the epithet can be applied to so august a personality as that of one of His Majesty's puisne judges. Humour, fancy and scholarship have never ceased to grace his judicial utterances when the occasion has allowed of their exhibiton, continuing to bubble from him spontaneously, though some might say he was overdoing it. And when, as too often was the case, gravity was the proper note, he saw that it was maintained. No judge has supported more becomingly the dignity of the bench, displayed a more scrupulous fairness to the defendants and prisoners who have come before him in their hundreds, none has surpassed and few approached the logic and poise of his summings up, the sagacity and clarity of his charges to innumerable juries. It is doubtful even if a condemned murderer ever left his court nursing a grudge against the man who had just sentenced him.

Such a man deserves a biography above the ordinary. Views may differ as to Mr. Graham's tribute being an entirely adequate one, but if his work lacks the high distinction demanded by the subject it remains a vivid and convincing piece of portraiture possessing all the merits that industry, enthusiasm and careful documentation can impart. His own comments are lively enough without being too showmanlike, and frequently he applies with effect the device of letting Lord Darling paint his own portrait in his own words, resurrected from the records of a score of famous cases.

The text is abundantly illustrated with line drawings, caricatures and contemporary photographs. Such care as has obviously been taken in preparation of the material (supervised to some extent, one gathers, by Lord Darling himself) is a little detracted from by slipshod proof-reading. "Brodstays" for Brodzkys, "Crauford" for Cranford are instances, and it is a little odd to encounter an interpolated [sic] after the expression "forcible feeble" in a quotation from some editorial diatribe of the eighties against Mr. Darling's first promotion.

Many a cause célèbre over which it was Lord Darling's lot to preside in the course of the last thirty years is here graphically summarised, to recall for those of us who remember most of them the intense public interest aroused at the time by such human dramas as the Crippen, Stinie Morrison, Armstrong and Seddon trials or, in refreshingly lighter contrast, the famous Romney Picture case, which, apart from its interest to connoisseurs and the artist community, provided Lord Darling with the happiest vehicle for display of his facile wit and quite amazing memory and erudition. Quotations and apt similes rained from the bench in a positive barrage, wits were fired among learned counsel in the court below, even in the witness box into which eminent experts tripped on each other's heels, to a general give-and-take of allusive aphorism and persiflage that dispelled like a tonic breeze the musty and somnolent atmosphere usually overhanging the Court of King's Bench. The newspapers enjoyed a long drawn out field day through the entire week of the tourney, Mr. Lewis of Bond Street undertook to take back his pseudo-Romney from Mr. Huntington of New York, repay the £20,000 expended on it, plus interest, shoulder the staggeringly heavy costs of the trial, and as a final flourish present the original bone of contention to the National Portrait Gallery or the Royal Academy as "practically the only important work in oils surviving from that artist, Ozias Humphrey."

MR. JUSTICE DARLING (intervening) : He has not thought whether the Law Courts have a claim.

Sir JOHN SIMON : We might have a "knock-out."

THE AUTHOR OF "DISENCHANTMENT."*

A host of people in Manchester, to whom the thrill of seeing the initials "C. E. M." at the foot of countless articles in the principal newspaper of the city will be for ever remembered ; a host of people who regard "Disenchantment" as the book of books on its subject, one that will survive when much catch-penny writing about the War is forgotten ; and a later host, to whom the name of Charles Edward Montague became known only when he gained his sunset fame as novelist and writer of short stories : these and a number of friends and fellow-players who rubbed shoulders with him in what he affectionately called "the writing game," will assuredly wish to read Professor Elton's memoir and treasure it for the fragments of letters and diaries that intimately reveal the genial, generous-souled man behind the pen.

But whether or not the volume will attract further readers, outsiders who know nothing of its subject and who might be led thereby to a study of his fascinating work, is another question. We live in a time when biographies are written with enthusiasm, often embarrassing enthusiasm, and rarely nowadays do we encounter a biography so dispassionate, so obviously "official" as this by Montague's old colleague. It is as spare and unemotional as though it had been done in late Victorian days, under the supervision of rationalists and positivists. Leslie Stephen, who was memorialised after the same pattern, would have greatly admired it.

With commendable though, as we think, over-modest purpose, Professor Elton has kept in the dim background. Of course all the facts are in his memoir. Montague was born at Ealing, London, in 1867, the son of Irish parents. He was educated at the City of London School and Oxford University. He arrived in Manchester in 1890 as a probationary member of the staff of the daily newspaper with which he was closely connected for the remainder of his life. He married the daughter of that great editor and journalist, Mr. C. P. Scott, and enjoyed an uncommonly happy existence as husband and father. He served in the War, although he was over military age, dyeing his hair in order to pass the inquisitors. While stationed abroad he was appointed to the post of "assistant press officer" or assistant censor, and as a consequence he came into close contact with men like Shaw, Wells, and Tomlinson. At the end of 1925 he retired from active journalism in order to settle in Oxfordshire and devote himself—at the age of sixty, if you please!—to fiction-writing, but died from acute pneumonia, three years later, at the Manchester residence of Mr. Scott.

Among the speakers during the farewell dinner to Montague when he left his beloved "M. G." was Mr. Scott himself. He recalled Montague's first days in Manchester, and dwelt on "his comradeship, his soldiership, and his sportsmanship and love of cricket and football. . . . Montague had lived both lives, the life of the journalist and the life of the author—he had lived them both, and he had lived them together.

> "The paper of the day might die with the day, but its work, if well done, as Montague had done it, did not die; it entered into the life of the nation and helped to direct its mind and shape its destiny."

These fine words adequately sum up the career of C. E. Montague as a contributor to newsprint. His career as novelist is not so easily surveyed. "A Hind Let Loose" and "The Morning's War," his first two novels, appeared in 1910 and 1913 respectively. But his next work of fiction was not written until ten years later, and in spite of a pathetic note to his brother in which he announces that he has retired "from the daily round of fixed-hour professional toil while still young and skittish enough to kick up our heels in the meadows to some purpose," the delay was fatal. His response to the call of his creative genius was made too late. He had no longer the tremendous energy needed to carry a long imaginative work through consistently, triumphantly. "Rough Justice," that would have stirred critical readers to a lively anticipation if it had been written by a younger man, begins with that tremendous energy apparent in every page, but it fades into insignificance—artistically speaking—long before the conclusion. That is why some of the short stories in "Fiery Particles" and "Action" are Montague's best work.

Mr. Reginald L. Hine,
Author of "The History of Hitchin" (Allen & Unwin).

As an artist, then, Montague's career was a failure. But do not imagine that it is one of the depressing failures. Rather may we call it a sunlit failure, for he was a man who lived and had all his being in sunlight. His letters are boyish, jolly, manly. Those of his friends who received them are privileged beings. "God bless you," he writes to Mr. H. M. Tomlinson—at the age of sixty-three—"wherever I've lived among common men I've been much the commonest among them. It's the well-educated, with their appalling omnisciences and contempt, that I can't get into any sort of comfortable touch with. They find out at once that I've not read any Balzac or Sainte-Beuve or Coleridge or Bergson or somebody and I have to sneak out."

Of course he was a better scholar, and a more highly equipped man of knowledge than all those omniscient and contemptuous ones. His book of "Dramatic Values" is ample proof of that. This little volume, by the way, has not been superseded as a criticism of the modern theatre by the writings of any of the critics who are dealing with the drama to-day and who have openly expressed their antipathy to Montague's point of view. The explanation is probably that they have not the humour for it—even if they have the scholarship, of which so far they have given no indication. "C. E. M." was just overflowing with humour:

> "I don't give a hang for all the sound intellectual reasons for devotion to a country—pride in its greatness or its blasted 'rough island story,' or the pedigree of its kings. As far as I can tell, my own regard for England is almost wholly sensuous. My England is the Strand and Waterloo Bridge, and all the Thames and the Pennine Hills here, and the crowd at a League football match, and Midland farmers talking like Shallow and Silence about the price of beasts, and the look of the common soldier in France at anything new, and the special kind of good temper and humour and relenting decency that the man of the working classes has here."

There are many passages as self-revealing as this in the fragments which Professor Elton has printed from Montague's letters, especially in those addressed to his distinguished and equally famous "M. G." colleague, Mr. Allan Monkhouse. Indeed it is easy to understand that the biographer has thought it wiser, as far as possible, to let Montague's own words speak for him. But it we would have rejoiced in a fuller and more warmly drawn portrait to accompany them, we have at least the compensation of finding at the close that Professor Elton has said the very best thing about his old friend, after all. He speaks of him as an artist who had surmounted the risks of his trade and would not be forgotten, and says a clear and high spirit lay behind his art. And then, in conclusion, he says: "Charles Montague may have been fortified by a favourite author, Shakespeare, in his conviction that with common luck, and with effort, and with the spirit of youth and courage, life, however it be swept by tragedies, may be found excellent, ever fresh, and ever entertaining; and also in the conviction of what he calls the 'inherent decency of things.'"

THOMAS MOULT.

HITCHIN.*

Mr. Hine set a very high standard in the first volume of his History of Hitchin, a standard which is in no degree lowered in the second volume just to hand, rather the reverse. In size, number of illustrations and cost of production it certainly exceeds the former, but we would be chary of adding attractiveness, having such pleasing recollections of his deft manner in handling his material. The first might be said to have taken a broader sweep, to have painted, as it were, a little world in miniature, if the two words do not clash with each other; while in the present volume the attention is more concentrated on certain outstanding phases and interests, and here, naturally, a more human note is struck.

* "The History of Hitchin." Vol. II. By Reginald Hine. 16s. (Allen & Unwin.)

Belonging to a long dead past is that peaceful, deserted ruin, Minsden Chapel, two or three miles out of Hitchin, where the more derelict the chapel became, the keener grew the romantic desire to celebrate marriages there. At the last ceremony in 1738 " a piece of masonry fell and dashed the service book out of the curate's hand." The historian in Mr. Hine gives place to the poet as, working under the spell of Lionel Johnson, he resuscitates in glowing imagery its one-time beauty and atmosphere. Considerable space is devoted to the history of the Hitchin Baptists, Congregationalists and Quakers, taken from their own records, which have not been fully explored before. " Bunyan was constantly in these parts. The good people at Hitchin would steal away and meet him either at Bendish, five miles away, or Wain Wood, two miles away, and usually at dead of night." Speaking of the latter place, " If it drenched with rain, there were four devoted women ever at hand to hold an apron above his bare head as he preached." It is interesting to recall the debt to the Quakers : " It was they who founded the hospitals, the libraries, the friendly societies, the penny savings banks, gave land for new roads and open spaces, and projected the Corn Exchange and the Old Town Hall." With what a whimsical pen is the picture drawn of their tentative quest for relaxation and recreation : " some had taken to cutting silhouettes, some to chess, bowls, others to walking, while some even ventured so far as to visit Brighton (then Brighthelmstone) every year." In 1771 it is intriguing to find in Mercy Ransom's book of recipes one for lip-salve, and a little later we read of " an apologetic compromise of whist and Bible-study," quaintly assisted by the playing cards decorated with biblical scenes, Genesis, Exodus, Samuel and Kings serving for the four suits, with mock elucidatory couplets scribbled underneat .

" Sports and Pastimes " and " Crime and Punishment " are two more headings under which a lot of entertaining facts are marshalled, those under the latter being principally drawn from the Petty Session and Quarter Session Rolls, while the former give occasion for many curious and characteristic drawings by Samuel Lucas. Intimate glimpses into the domestic life of the townspeople are given in " Wills and Testaments " and " Place, Field and Surnames," where we find a hint that indefatigably and fully as Mr. Hine has pursued his task, he has not yet said the last word. The rousing of Hitchin from its inertia by the Fire of London opens up another interesting phase of the story. A chronology of principal events from 55 B.C. to A.D. 1929, as well as a number of appendices, a bibliography of fifty pages and an index which covers both volumes, rounds off a record as complete as any we have seen. As a result of his fourteen years' labour Mr. Hine has placed an amazing compilation of facts on record, and, what is a great deal more, he has invested them with a vivid reality, a real flesh and blood quality, which will serve as a criterion for many, and be the delight of many more.

R. N. G. Scott, Captain R.N.

From "Captain Scott," by Stephen Gwynn (John Lane).

CAPTAIN SCOTT.*

The story of Captain Scott can never grow stale nor lose the glamour of romance, and it is fitting that this account of his life should be included in " The Golden Hind " series, alongside such names as Drake and Ralegh and other famous explorers. Having his own letters and diaries to reveal him the interpretation of his character is not made difficult for his biographer ; we know him for what he was—a brave, simple, modest, unselfish man whose heroism and zest for high adventure belong to all time.

Yet Mr. Stephen Gwynn, by a careful selection from those writings and by the graphically told story of Scott's youth, has strengthened our knowledge, and presented to us a vivid and unforgettable picture. He tells of early ambitions, ungrudgingly relinquished because of money difficulties at home ; of the need to economise which haunted him for many years and made him fearful when, nearing his fortieth year and anxious to marry, he contemplated bringing poverty upon another. His marriage, as happy as it was brief, preceded his last voyage, and letters to his wife add a poignancy to the dramatic tale. This is a book to stir the imagination ; for remembrance of the epic venture to the South Pole—that most glorious failure—must always move us deeply, as it moved the whole world at the time of its happening.

WORTH WHILE.

Of these translations from Russian, French, German and Scandinavian literatures, one- a fine book in itself—is also welcome for the light it throws on the position of immigrants in the United States ; three more are creditable work, while yet two make the reader wonder why they should have been done into English. Four out of six is, however, good measure.

" Peder Victorious " [1] was written in Norwegian which, considering the content, is curious. O. E. Rölvaag, himself an emigrant from the three million who inhabit Norway to the three million Norwegians who have made their home in the States, relates the history of a settlement of his people. By so doing he incidentally reveals a factor in American life which differentiates it from Europe. What happens here when a Czech, Magyar or other group finds itself on alien soil? The original owner of that territory does his best to compel the new-comer to adopt his speech and creed. Sundry hard-pressing laws with regard to schools and printing are imposed, with the result that the stranger is made ultra-conscious of his nationality. America does the opposite. Her immigrants are left to their own devices, and the consequence is that although the original immigrant clings to his native speech, his children adopt that of the country in which they have settled. America absorbs her immigrants. They learn English, they intermarry with other races, and the result is a fresh infusion of blood, an enrichment and that amazing energy which has given her so large a place in the sun. The people who rushed in large numbers to a new world before the immigration laws were passed are responsible for present-day America, and the country, in preventing the flood by barriers, is turning aside one of its sources of genius. In "Peder Victorious" Norwegian children, growing up in the United States, are shown breaking, of their choice, with the traditions of the land from which their parents came. The eager reader hopes O. E. Rölvaag will show in another book the result of the intermarriage of Norsk and Irish.

With this Norwegian story, almost cosmic in its breadth and understanding, can be placed "Goldman's,"[2] by Sigfrid Siwertz, the human and humorous story of a department store in Sweden. This ripe book is the work of an artist sure of himself and deeply wise. Goldman, the little Jew, whose life is the store, whose affections are centred on the people who manage it, who is the whining, shrewd and kindly king of the world he has created, is an admirable study. Twelve points of view, in twelve short stories, give us the store in the round, from the dancing golden slippers which are its sign to the stealthy raids of its proprietor on the Strasburg pies. Said the night-watchman when he caught Goldman in the delicatessen department and was ordered back to the gold and pearls: "'Scuse me, Chief, the managing director he said to me to look up here from time to time; 'Some of the finer food-stuffs disappear,' said he . . . 'especially the goose-liver.'" "Jasā! All right, sergeant; be getting on with your job," murmured his discomfited employer.

In almost all translations words are used which cannot be found in the Concise Oxford Dictionary, but with one exception these volumes are adequately done, and the English of one is outstandingly good. Mr. Cournos being himself a sensitive artist is the right person to interpret for us the tales of his fellow-countrymen,[3] and we have only to compare his translation of "Babel" with that in "Red Cavalry" to realise the difference between the work of a cative mind and that of a mere journeyman. It is to be hoped Mr. Cournos will find time to give us more stories from the literature of new Russia.

Julian Green is a writer who has been much talked of, and it is interesting to find that although he writes in French his quality is English, or perhaps it would be more correct to say American. "Leviathan," translated under the title of "The Dark Journey,"[4] is the book of an immature but sombrely rich and powerful mind. It deals with unusual people, and vile people, but endows them with reality, and the first half of the book is convincing. With Gueret's attack on the woman he loves, however, it drops broken-winged, never to recover itself. The nervous and emotional storms so ably indicated would not have led that hesitant and weakly creature into violence. They might have carried him over the edge into self-destruction, but no farther. Mr. Green has not yet attained the sureness of touch of the two Scandinavian writers, although when he comes into his own he will probably give us more penetrating studies than either have done.

Georg Grabenhörst's "Zero Hour,"[5] when compared with "All Quiet on the Western Front," is but the pale shadow of a book. The artist who went through the War feels he must put his experiences into words, and as a consequence book after book appears. They are mostly well written, but the background of horror is not one that appeals to the ordinary reader. "All Quiet" gave us an unforgettable picture of war conditions, its material was excellently handled, the impression it made was deep. On finishing it the ordinary person has had as much as he wants, as he can take in, and he flees all other books on the subject. "Zero Hour" is one of those other books and that "All Quiet" should have been written is its misfortune.

Why should "The Master of the Day of Judgment"[6]—which it is to be hoped is not the Continental idea of a good murder and mystery story—have been printed in such unusual type? The flourishes distract the attention from the tale, and the tale is not sufficiently interesting to stand it. Certain persons commit suicide, being influenced to do so by the spirit of a malevolent Italian, long since dead. On the last page we are informed that this is not however the true explanation, and another is given. The publisher informs us the author is famous. Perhaps this is a poor specimen of his work.

On the whole the northern nations have given us the books which were most worthy of translation—at least as far as these six are concerned—and the best, "Peder Victorious," is an enrichment of American literature due to the pre-immigration-law liberty which she is now restricting. Short views and fear may eventually affect the States as injuriously as the Inquisition affected the empire of old Spain.

C. A. DAWSON SCOTT.

The reader who takes up Colonel Whitton's "Wolfe and North America" expecting to discover in it a new "life" of the victor of Quebec will soon find himself disillusioned. The limits or, if you will, joint purposes, of this wide-ranging book are confessed in its double title. The author might have given us one of two things—either another historical survey of the conquest of Canada or a fresh critical estimate of the character and career of James Wolfe; instead of confining himself to one or other of these tasks, he has compromised between them, sandwiched slices of biography between slabs of political and military history, with the disadvantages that must accrue of divided interest, hurried treatment, so far as the human side of his work is concerned, and defective artistry.

It is easy to see where his heart is really engaged. The growth of the British Empire, the fortunes of the British Army—these are the themes that stir his enthusiasm. An admirer of Sir John Fortescue, a writer in whose ears Captain Mahan's famous doctrine of "sea-power" rings like a blessed word—the phrase serves as a sort of refrain throughout this volume—he is caught by the spectacle of the long struggle between England and France for mastery on the North American continent; he is attracted by the contrast between the adventurous voyageurs and centralised government of French Canada on the one hand, and the home-keeping habits and jealous rivalries of the American colonists on the other; he is interested in the geographical features, especially the waterways, of this "new world"; above all, he is preoccupied with the military problems involved in the campaigns he discusses.

Yet, it would seem, he could not altogether resist the glamour that attaches still to the name of Wolfe, he could not wholly rule out the personal element in his book, and so he supplies episodic chapters summarising that genius's all too brief life. This, despite the fact that Colonel Whitton thinks, with Sir John Fortescue and others, that both Wolfe's contemporaries and posterity for long afterwards overrated his achievement at the expense of others—Amherst, his nominal commander, and Sanders, his naval colleague, for instance—and wrongly magnified his victory at Quebec into a conquest of the whole of Canada. To hold such views and yet to employ Wolfe's name as part title of a book which goes some way towards reducing his stature is to deal, to say the least of it, a little hardly by that hero.

Not that Colonel Whitton denies the brilliance of Wolfe's triumph, not that he does not in his biographical interludes throw into piquant relief some curious features of the man which merit notice as make-weight to his gallantry. From youth up Wolfe was delicate; soon he became a victim to a form of tuberculosis and other bodily afflictions. It is hardly surprising then, that racked as he so often was with illness, he should betray irritability in his correspondence. But he even permitted himself to indulge in spasms of rash censoriousness! Of his fellow officers he said at twenty-one, "Few surpass me in common knowledge, but most of them in vice. I dread their habits and behaviour." That sounds almost priggish. Glasgow folk he found "civil, designing and treacherous." Poor Scotland! Four years after Fontenoy he writes of the British infantry, "I have but a very mean opinion of the infantry in courage. I know their discipline to be bad and their valour precarious." These were the men who were to fight like lions for him on Abraham Heights. He was as harsh in speaking of Americans, "the dirtiest and most contemptible, cowardly dogs that you can conceive." So high strung a man had his fits of depression, as in the famous dispatch sent to Pitt within a fortnight of his great victory, in which he talked despondently of "a choice of difficulties," and added, "The courage of a handful of brave men should be exerted only when there is some hope of a favourable event." Pitt's nerve in publishing that dispatch had of course its reward.

For Wolfe had the fire and the daring which atoned for these black-dog moods and the great Minister's special choice of him was not mistaken. Nor was the public of the day in error, despite all that our military historians may say, in hailing Quebec's fall as the death-knell of French hopes in Canada. The city was nearly lost again —but it was not lost, largely because it had lately been won, as well as because of the arrival of the British fleet. It took another year for Amherst to conquer Canada, but he was undoubtedly helped by the despair which affected the French after the loss of their Canadian capital. Yet if Canada was not wholly won at once, what a marvellous year for Great Britain was that year 1759. From all over the world came news of victories—in India, in Canada, on the high seas. The country, to be sure, had got all it needed to implement victory—a Minister of wide vision, and generals and admirals he could trust. But miracles could not be worked. Two years and more he and his people had to wait for the harvest; 1759 brought the harvest. Is it any wonder that when English folk learned of Wolfe's success bonfires blazed in every town and village? Popular instinct over these matters is not often at fault. Quebec was a symbol and it was also a tonic. The victor had died in the hour of his triumph, as was to be Nelson's fate later; he was given an apotheosis. It was rough no doubt on Amherst that too little acknowledgment fell his way, but while Wolfe was dead, he, like Sterne's fat scullion, could rejoice in being still alive. The historians at any rate—Colonel Whitton among them —are making him recompense to-day.

EUROPEAN LITERATURE.*

It is becoming increasingly difficult to keep pace with even the modern literature that is produced. Authors, fashionable and popular for a decade or so, are forgotten so quickly that even their influence on younger men passes unnoticed. Who for instance has called attention recently to the obvious effect that Frank Wedekind's plays have had on the modern theatre, especially on such authors as Eugene O'Neill and Sean O'Casey? Who indeed remembers Wedekind to-day, or could name more than one of his plays? It is obvious to any student of the newer movements in literature—the movements once represented by The Little Review, and now by Transition and This Quarter and many small American publications—that the young author is a diligent reader. The merits and the faults of many of the more extravagant books published to-day are dependent on the fact that they are written by men who, in an age of films and automobiles, still prefer the ancient and honourable sport of reading: their originality is like the originality of the Elizabethan poets; they are excited by the prospect of bringing to life the incredible services of literature. It is no use saying, in the face of the enormous amount of old literature and of modern, that the best will always get to the front. It is simply not true. There is no time for most of us to read even those masterpieces of the world's literature which were written before the century began. We need not go back to the seventeenth and sixteenth centuries. Who to-day reads Goethe? or Carlyle? or Schiller? Who reads Addison? or Pope? or even Molière? Of course these great authors have some readers; but with the increase in amount of modern literature, it is inevitable that many of the old masters should be ignored. Yet the professional students of literature continue, either with histories or criticisms; and I for one am very glad that they should. For though I shall never read all I should like to, it gives me pleasure to know that others are reading authors which I—perhaps through ignorance of the language or through lack of time—will never be able to study. With the subjects of Mr. Janko Lavrin's new book I am moderately well acquainted. He writes separate essays on Balzac, Heine, Turgenev and Baudelaire; and a series of Plutarchan studies on Ibsen and Shaw, Huysmans and Strindberg, Tolstoy and Nietzsche, Tchehov and Maupassant, Dostoievsky and Proust. I find his approach to his authors a little too solemn, a little too much the approach of a man who has not sufficiently considered life apart from books (which is quite a different thing from not considering life apart from literature). For instance in his essay on Baudelaire Mr. Lavrin makes a surprising statement:

> "When the boy was six years old, Mme. Baudelaire was already a widow. She soon married the utterly respectable M. Aupick, who became later an ambassador and a general. This step of hers affected the young boy in quite an unexpected way—it aroused his jealousy."

The most disastrous consequence of the spread of psycho-analysis among the literary class is that it produces a sort of mental inertia; its formulæ are used without intelligent examination. What is more expected, more natural than that a petted, adored, spirited child of six should be furiously jealous when presented with a rather dull stepfather, lose the daily and hourly companionship of his mother, become instead of her comrade and friend, simply "the child" again? It would have been unexpected had Charles Baudelaire not been jealous. At times also Mr. Lavrin does not explain his meaning sufficiently. I can attach no precise meaning to his statement: "It is now generally agreed that Tolstoy is not a religious, but only a moral teacher." There have been in the past some ethical philosophers who contrived to persuade themselves that you could have an ethical system without a religious one; but of these surely Tolstoy emphatically is not. His whole ethic depends on his acceptance of a certain view of the Christian philosophy, especially as he found it in the synoptic gospels. Or does Mr. Lavrin simply mean that as a religious teacher Tolstoy is not satisfactory? For I should have thought that this objection was valid also against his ethic.

Again I rub my eyes in amazement when Mr. Lavrin writes of Proust's skill in dealing with sex:

> "In the analysis of this appetite (whether normal or abnormal)

* "Modern Spanish Literature." Two volumes by L. A Warren. 30s. (Brentanos.)—"Studies in European Literature." By Janko Lavrin. 5s. (Constable.)

Proust has no equal. His favourite heroes are either sentimental sensualists like Swann, the young Robert and Proust himself, or sexual inverts like Baron de Charlus. Albertine and a long gallery of other characters. It is only fair to say that although gloating at times over such dangerous themes, Proust treats them with great tact and with great objectivity."

" Objectivity ! " If there is one book which is from beginning to end a riot of subjectivity surely it is Proust's great masterpiece : its very form is a piece of sublime egotism. Mr. Lavrin is however a pleasant critic, and beginners may find him useful as a guide to authors they will then desire to read.

It is such a guide I welcome in Mr. Warren's magnificently complete handbook to Spanish literature from the eighteenth century to our own day. Recently there has been, largely under American auspices, a great revival of interest in Spanish authors, especially in the dramatists. Benavente, Sierra, Quintero—are all names familiar to students of the modern theatre ; and at the end of last century Edmund Gosse included novels by Valera and Valdes in his series of Continental novelists edited for Heinemann. Unfortunately the one Spanish author who earned world-wide fame was that late pursuer of Hugo romanticism, Blanco Ibañez. His war novel had real merits ; but his general level was far below that of other Spanish novelists who are almost unknown to those who are unacquainted with the language. Baroja, who is not without a naturalistic strain, is worth ten of Ibañez, while Azorin's highly individual, reticent style reveals a new capacity in the Spanish genius. Mr. Warren seems to know almost every Spanish author of importance. He is perhaps a little hard on reputations of yesterday—I should not rate Echegaray as low as he does : his theatre is no doubt rather melodramatic, but it does not, I think, deserve Mr. Warren's violent condemnation : it is a grave error in criticism to decry as unreal feeling which is expressed in such a way that it seems unreal to you. The " Great Galeoto " is an extraordinarily effective piece of writing, when it is acted well ; and that is a not unimportant test of the merits of a play. Mr. Warren is as well acquainted with Spanish life as letters, and this gives his book a singular value. Its utility would be greatly increased however by the addition of a bibliography of translations.

R. ELLIS ROBERTS.

NINETEENTH CENTURY ENGLAND.*

Mr. Freemantle, in " England in the Nineteenth Century," has made an extremely important contribution to modern history. The title of the book is a misnomer, for Mr. Freemantle's four hundred and fifty-three well printed pages contain, not a textbook résumé of a crowded century, but a wide and comprehensive view of England in the years when, under the leadership of the dying Pitt, she was saving her self by her exertions and Europe by her example. In his survey, alike imaginative, scholarly and impartial, the author has performed a real service, not only to students of history, but to everyone who wishes to understand the problems of modern civilisation.

The first decade of the nineteenth century has lately become the battle-field for those historians who view the past merely as a storehouse of political arguments. The old school, who could see in these years only the stately Pitt and the heroic Nelson, have been challenged and put to rout by those who, judging the past always by the light of the economic and social ideals of the present, behold in the England of our great-great-grandfathers a savage prison in which a few icy aristocrats oppressed a vast multitude of suffering and wretched toilers. To this new school history appears to be nothing but a long story of injustice, and the early nineteenth century the culminating epoch in Mammon's despotism of the poor.

Mr. Freemantle has come to our rescue with a book which one trusts is only the first of a long series that will give us a complete and balanced picture of a great age. In this, his first volume, he covers the years from 1801 to 1805. He begins with a survey of the England of town and country, left by the old century to its successor. We are introduced in a series of pictures to the growing towns of the industrial areas. We see Manchester where the " respectable males of the town met for conversation, news and a sixpennyworth of punch every day after dinner in a dark dungeon of a public-house, kept by one who punctually cleared them out at closing time with the words : ' Past eight o'clock, gentlemen ! ' enforced by a whip with a long lash " (" It is not surprising," comments the author, " that masters who submitted to this should have employed the same means in their factories with children who dawdled on their way to work ") ; Liverpool, with its docks and windmills between the Mersey and the Lancashire foothills ; canny Newcastle, with its rough, well-to-do, independent colliers ; the charlatan Brummagem, where " crusty knaves that scud the streets in aprons seem ever ready to exclaim : ' Be busy and grow rich.' " Beyond the newer England he paints the older, " the land of the edge of the moorlands and the rims of forests," and beyond that again, in the west, a secret, green Wales, whose largest town, Swansea, then only boasted six thousand people, and where the miners still believed in fairy knockers, wh revealed to them the hidden seams of coal.

In front of this background Mr. Freemantle has drawn us, with a breadth of vision worthy of " The Dynasts," the great figures and events which form the real foreground of these momentous years. The rival forces in Parliament and their leaders are introduced (the author has not mastered his Iliad for nothing), and the scene shifts across the far-flung battle line to Abercromby in Egypt, the roar of the guns at Elsinore, and the long lines of tossing men-of-war in the rolling Atlantic swell off Trafalgar. The description of Nelson's death has been told, and worthily told, many times before ; the author makes no attempt at originality, but we rise from his rendering of the scene with something of the emotion with which we leave the theatre after witnessing the performance of a great drama, grateful that it has been given us to receive, from the pen of the great grandson of one of Nelson's captains, the most splendid and gracious story of our annals. " History," he well says, " loves to linger over a scene so touching and so glorious."

Mr. Freemantle thoroughly understands the age. His book is worthy of recommendation to all students of literature as a companion volume to Jane Austen's novels. He sees, loves and comprehends his world in little things as well as in big. The whole age is here. He devotes several pages to a discussion of the early nineteenth century view of marriage and seduction. The latter, he tells us, " had succeeded hard drinking as the fashionable vice of the last quarter of the century." In his study of Robert Owen and his contemporaries he gives us something of the spirit of the earlier, Homeric Forsytes : " getting on and growing rich was in the air." His vision is wide enough to include the whole of an age, richer in contrasts and contradictions than perhaps any other. There was in those days, as he sees, breathing space. " The factory worker of 1801," he writes, " still smacked of the country-side from which he came, and was one whom it was not safe to make into an enemy. Lancashire at this time bred the roughest men in England. . . . If the masters were hard, they had good need to be."

Such a book as this, though written in a laconic, scholarly and ever slightly humorous style, is never far from poetry. It enables one to understand so much, without which the nineteenth century is a riddle, for the drawing-room of Jane Austen, the teeming life of Dickens's street, the report of the first Royal Commission on the Coal Mines, the fantastic glories of Scott and Wyatt, the rich inhabited country-side of Borrow, all so contradictory to each other, have their roots in the England which Mr. Freemantle has made it his task, and I think his joy, to reveal.

CÆSAR REMEMBERS.*

Mr. William Kean Seymour.

A new volume of poems by Mr. William Kean Seymour has been overdue for long. Even his irreverent parodies of contemporaries in Punch have not reconciled us to the silence of his own authentic voice. At long last "Cæsar Remembers" appears, published in an extremely tasteful form, and is sure of a grateful welcome. From a repeated perusal of Mr. Seymour's new poems, and from a recollection of his earlier work, it would appear to the present reviewer that his ideal of poetry is the rhythmical expression of Beauty and Emotion. In spite of a general sympathy with the aims and methods of modern poets, Mr. Seymour yet walks securely on traditional paths. His subjects are such as are congenial to poetry, and not more appropriate to prose. The themes which occupy his attention are the beauties of this material world where he moves and has his being; and he writes really of emotions which are permanent and fine experiences, and not of moods which are cheap and transitory, and go at four a penny. From this summary of Mr. Seymour's qualities it will be apparent that he is seldom austere. His Muse may be radiant and adorned without, but the hair shirt is worn less frequently next her skin. Without hard thought poetry devoted to beauty frequently has a tendency to cloy. This penalty Mr. Seymour's Muse does not always escape. His sensitive appreciation of beauty is sometimes overstressed and gaudily coloured, and then it falls from beauty into mere prettiness, which is a very different thing.

These common characteristics of Mr. Seymour's poetical work can be illustrated more particularly from the book under notice. The poem, "Cæsar Remembers," giving its title to the collection, must be familiar to many readers of anthologies. With careful simplicity the poem describes a Roman camp in the Chiltern Hills, and Cæsar amongst his legions building dyke and rampart against the Britons, but in thought far away.

> "Soft in the shadows
> He saw, and heard,
> A Roman garden,
> A Roman bird.
> "Soft in the shadows
> The tired man heard
> A woman's laughter,
> A woman's word.
> "Cæsar, shivering,
> Heard repeat
> Spades on the hill-side,
> Sentries' feet."

This is sensitively felt and realised and expressed. There is nothing too much. The author, obviously, is pleased with it himself, quite justly, for he tries to repeat his first fine careful rapture both in "Semiramis" and in "Cortez." In these two poems, more particularly in the latter, the experiment does not quite come off. "Semiramis" very nearly catches the earlier accent, for metre and poem are extremely charming. In the opinion of the present writer it is less satisfying by reason of a fault occasionally apparent in Mr. Seymour's poetry, the sin of excess. An outstanding illustration of this tendency may be found in the poem which stands first in the collection, entitled "Siesta." I have a disquieting fancy that the author has placed it in the position of honour because he appreciates it unduly. It is an extremely clever piece of work, but cleverness is not required in poetry, but rather intensity. The "properties" accumulated by Mr. Seymour, the desperate effort to make the poem riot with colour—the oranges on blue china, the jade and silver spoon, the melons on chrysoprase—seem meretricious, and compare unfavourably with the quiet loveliness of his finer things. In criticising this proneness to excess I would not for one moment seem to suggest that Mr. Seymour should distract his eyes from the pageant without him and look at the world within. He can do this on occasion, as I gladly admit, for instance in the delightful free verse poem "Weeding," with its peculiarly characteristic touch of humour at the close. But his essential gift is that of a man for whom the visible world exists, and who is capable of expressing what he sees from a glowing palate. When this gift is exercised in moderation and with restraint he is capable of such a poem as "Fruitage," which lovely phrasing and lively emotion make a thing of enduring value.

It is to be hoped that the fine qualities which are the notes of Mr. Seymour's verse—his technical dexterity, his sense of beauty, his sensitive feeling for nature, his capacity for emotion—will ensure "Cæsar Remembers" the attention it deserves. Probably more talent is expended in poetry, with less recognition from the public, than in any other art. It is fortunate that poetry is its own reward, for it seldom has any other. From these poems it is clear that this exceeding great reward is already Mr. Seymour's. We can but trust that a more material success will be added to him also.

THE UNDYING WAR.*

Mr. Compton Mackenzie served in the Dardanelles in 1915 until he was invalided in September. After that he was Military Control Officer at Athens and, later still, Director of Ægean Intelligence Service at Syra. His book, as the title indicates, deals with his experiences in the Gallipoli campaign; it has been acclaimed by the Book Society as "The Book of the Month," an honour, in our opinion, well deserved. The volume may be reviewed under two aspects. In the first place it may be considered as a series of pen pictures of the campaign, the incidents of which were noted by a quick-witted observer gifted with immense literary power; and also as a description of the personal traits and characteristcs of many who served on the peninsula. As regards the pen-pictures, we feel that the expectations of Mr. Henry James were fulfilled when he wrote to Mr. Mackenzie on June 18th, 1915, "I confess I take an enormous pleasure in the fact of the exposure of the sensitive plate in your imagination, your tremendous attention, to all these wonderful and terrible things." As regards the descriptions of persons these range from what is akin to hero-worship, in a few cases, to what is decidedly the reverse in several others. In the case of the latter there is nothing of the " pease-cod of anonymity " for the victims. Their names are given, and although the mocking irony is often irresistible, it shades off at times into cruelty marked, we feel, now and then by something not in very good taste.

In its second aspect the book may be regarded as a review of the campaign as a whole, with emphasis laid upon what, in Mr. Mackenzie's opinion, might and ought to have been achieved. Mr. Mackenzie was much struck by the amateurishness of the whole organisation. While waiting for news on that dark night of the Suvla landing the thought " went singing through my head. We have lost our amateur status to-night. It was foolish for me who had been old enough to remember the muddle of the South African War to go on believing in the practical value of the public school system." Yet in nothing does the amateurishness of Gallipoli show itself more clearly than in the circumstances which led to Mr. Mackenzie's own presence at G.H.Q. on the peninsula. On March 23rd, 1915, he received a letter from his friend Orlo Williams, from which the following is an extract:

> " I noticed a day or two ago that he (Sir Ian Hamilton) had brought Vol. II of ' Sinister Street ' to read. So when I was in conversation with him I told him I knew you, etc. and that you had tried for a commission in Egypt. So he said at once: ' Write to him and tell him to get into communication with Eddie Marsh and get sent out to me as a Marine or anything and I will find him a job of some kind. . . .' "

And that was that.

As regards the campaign as a whole, Mr. Mackenzie was, and still is, a pronounced Easterner. " I believed from the beginning of the War that our best policy was to attack Constantinople." Again and again in the volume there is insistence upon the " might have been " had it not been for " the insurmountable mental barrier " presented by all the politicians at home, except Mr. Winston Churchill, and for the futile operations of the misguided people on the Western Front. But as Napoleon says, the moral is to the physical as three to one, and here the author of this review will say what he has never said in print before. It happened that a wound kept him in a military hospital practically the whole of 1915. It was the year of Gallipoli. It was the year, on the Western Front, of Second Ypres (with the first gas attack by the Germans), of the dubious victory of Neuve Chapelle, of the disaster at Aubers Ridge and of the bloody non-success of Loos. To that hospital came scores and scores of wounded officers. But whereas the present writer can never remember any officer from France who was not serenely confident that we would eventually win, he can never remember any officer from the Dardanelles who was not firmly convinced that there was in that region " no earthly." The unanimity manifested on each side was extraordinary. This recollection is given merely for what it is worth, but it seems worth something in a review of " Gallipoli Memories." Mr. Mackenzie's book is a fascinating one, even if his views do not command the acceptance of the reader. The absence of any reference to the sketch map in the Contents should be put right.

Mr. Williamson's slim volume is also one of reminiscences, but of an entirely different kind. He served in France and, as a soldat retourné, recently made a nine-days' pilgrimage over the Western Front, starting from Calais, revisiting the salient with " Pop," Vlamertinghe, Goldfish Château, and of course Ypres as well, thence east via " Plugstreet " to Arras and the Somme. There is very little about the actual fighting which Mr. Williamson went through, but so subtle is his skill that by suggestion rather than by description he conveys to us in many places the horrors of his war years The note of the book is one of disenchantment—greedy Belgians, surly and grasping French peasants, and the new generation of objectionable young men flocking to estaminets from which come the blare of an American automatic hurdy-gurdy and over which is the sign " Grand Anglais Jazz Balle every Sunday Night wellcome." Mr. Williamson gives the impression of a man asking himself, " Was it worth while, for this ? "

Miss Borden's book is not a novel, but " a collection of sketches and prose poems written when I was at the front with my hospital," which was just behind the French lines. The sketches are not entirely medical, for there are vivid descriptions of French scenes and French soldiers. But it is in the sketch, " In the Operating Room," that Miss Borden comes into her own. For technique and economy of phrase this extract is worth quoting:

> 1ST SURGEON: Quick, a basin! God! How the blood spouts. Quick, quick, quick! Three holes in this lung.
> 2ND SURGEON: Take that leg away, will you? There's no room to move here.
> 3RD SURGEON: Take this dead man away, and bring the next abdomen. Wipe that table, mademoiselle, while I wash my hands. And you there, mop up the floor a bit.
> (The doors open and shut. Stretcher-bearers go out and come in. A nurse comes from the sterilising room with a pile of nickel drums in her arms. Another nurse goes out with trays of knives and other instruments. The nurse from the corridor comes back.)
> NURSE: Three knees have come in, two more abdomens, five heads.

It was the German ex-Crown Prince, we think, who once spoke of the late madness in Europe as " This jolly old war."

Messrs. Dent are to be heartily congratulated upon " A Soldier's War." It is a prose anthology containing fourteen tales by different writers of three nationalities—French, German and British, and of varying temperaments; and the names of Henri Barbusse, Edward Thompson, and Fritz von Unruh, taken at random from the list, are guarantees of the high literary value of the book. There is a thoughtful introduction in which the editor points out that in Germany the reaction of a violent pacificism is producing a reaction against reaction. Men write articles and even books to declare that they personally enjoyed the War. If only some manager would have the courage to stage " In the Operating Room " !

F. E. WHITTON (LIEUT.-COLONEL).

AMBITION.*

We open every new book by Mr. W. H. Davies with a certain amount of anticipation, and especially a new book of verse. Years ago he had the desperate idea of calling one of his many collections " Farewell to Poesy," but she could not take the hint. Twice he has issued Collected Peoms, as if that were final; and still he has found it in his heart to sing the world a few more. He calls his latest volume " Ambition," after one of the poems. Ambition should be made of sterner stuff.

> " I had Ambition, by which sin
> The angels fell;
> I climbed and step by step, O Lord,
> Ascended into Hell.
> " Returning now to peace and quiet,
> And made more wise,
> Let my descent and fall, O Lord,
> Be into Paradise."

This poem is perfect—the shape, the rhythm, the natural plainness, the orderly advance of thought and phrase together, the native wit, the easy art of it. Throughout the book in the best poems (more than two-thirds of it) there is this notable ease of execution—not a change of Mr. Davies's style, but a refinement of it—and my own opinion is that when some as yet unborn anthologist of discrimination makes a final selection from the many little volumes, some of Mr. Davies's best will be found in " Ambition."

While acknowledging with all gratitude the charm of Mr. Davies's earliest poems, and the new and individual note which it was his skill and pleasure to give, we have to admit that there was a certain rawness—a quite unstudied imperfection—often a natural charm like the childishness of children. It appeared in an excessive use of monosyllables and a curious lisping rhythm due to the (theoretically) wrong stresses on naturally unstressed words. This lent his poems a newness which perhaps he did not always intend; and a less sincere poet might have exploited the faculty dangerously and played the artless child of nature to monotony, purposely avoiding smoothness and technical perfection. But Mr. Davies has never done so, and in this book he attains to an almost classical skill at times. The last poem in the book, "My Life's Example," or the first, "Friends Unborn," or this, called "Day or Night," are all examples of his finished skill.

"Again I wake and cry for light!
My golden day has gone,
And looking through my window now,
I see the stars and moon.

"Which shall I sacrifice to sleep,
With both beyond my praise?
So lovely are these silvery nights,
So bright these golden days."

R. C. Lehmann.
From the portrait by William Logsdail (Hill & Saunders, Eton).
From "Selected Verse," by R. C. Lehmann (Blackwood).

The quotations I have used do not, it is true, show the typical W. H. Davies, but he is there. His surprising childlike fancies—"How merrily this bantam world, Can clap his wings and crow," or the stars that "peep out like timid mice," are to be found still, and still surprise; though they are not so much relied on.

There are also a few, though least successful, poems of maxims or conclusions. The prevailing mood of the book is of one whose senses still delight in the small beauties and creatures of the world, one whose love of joy and content as age advances only grows deeper roots in earth. Mr. Davies has loved wild nature with his whole heart and she has never failed him; he is as loyal, sincere and happy now as he ever was; but now he knows the fullest meaning of joy and seeks and finds content. I know of no book new this season which can give as much joy and content to the reader at so modest a price.

LIGHT VERSE.*

It is sometimes asserted that it is more difficult to find rhymes in the English language than in most.

Be that as it may, the fact remains that a neat way with rhymes is a rather special characteristic of our best makers of light poems, to say nothing of the ingenious feats of some of our more serious writers. Byron enjoyed playing with rhymes, Browning had a decided leaning towards the ingenious in this direction, and finally we come, by way of Calverley, Gilbert and Austin Dobson, to our present-day writers in this manner.

Here are three books by three modern authors (though one, alas, is no longer with us) whose happy felicities of rhyme take the ear with their pleasing cacophonies no less than the mind with their nimble wit.

But although the writers of these three books of poems have certain traits in common, they have each a very distinctive character.

In Mr. Lehmann's "Selected Verse" there is a tenderness, a delicate undertone of wistfulness which permeates his work and sweetens it as the scent of potpourri will sweeten the atmosphere of a house.

This does not mean that he is a sentimentalist; far from it. His rowing and cricket poems, his college poems, his delightful animal poems are expert, crisp, vigorous and essentially common-sensible in their outlook.

Again and again one finds oneself chuckling over their excellent funninesses and their quite extraordinary cleverness. "Lans Remigii" is a little masterpiece of clever versification, with its amusing triple rhymes:

"But now each college resident, Dean, Master, Provost, President,
By every word he says identifies himself with oars. . . ."

That sort of thing takes some doing, especially when it is kept up for six verses.

But again and again too one comes across the romantic note, the touch of sincere feeling (none the less sincere because it is so graceful) which enabled Mr. Lehmann to write so engagingly and tenderly of dogs, of children, of old friendships. Everyone who has ever loved a Pekingese will adore the lines to "Sooti," and I think it would be a hardened soul indeed that did not respond to the account of "Rufus" awaiting his master on the Stygian shore. And isn't this a charming quatrain at the end of "John"?:

"Gives one long sigh of unalloyed content,
Over a day so well, so proudly spent;
Resigned at last to listen and obey,
And so begins to breathe his quiet night away."

The last line contains the whole essence of sleeping childhood.

I think the nicest thing about Sir Owen Seaman's "Interludes of an Editor" is the fact that Sir Owen is not afraid of laughing at himself. Lots of us can make fun of politicians and modern fashions and Mussolini (though we can't do it one hundredth part as deftly), but when it comes to our own weaknesses . . .

And what a satisfaction there must be in turning out poems as artlessly intricate, as unpretentiously perfect as these. Often the technique is so good that one might easily forget how clever it is if one had never tried one's hand at verse-making.

There is in these verses just that kind of witty funning that has given Punch its unique position in the world of literature, and Punch is fortunate indeed in having an editor who sets his contributors so high a standard of craftsmanship.

Looking through the book a second time, I tried to decide which poem I liked the best, but couldn't make up my mind between the "Oxford Dictionary" one, the charming "Memories of the South," and the grave "In Memoriam " to George Meredith. There is a verse from the last which will show the fine, high qualities of Sir Owen at his best:

> " Long Time initiate in her lovely lore,
> Now is he one with Nature's woods and streams,
> Whereof, a Paradisal robe, he wore
> The visionary gleams."

Mr. Knox, best known as " Evoe," is great fun. He writes with such an infectious gusto, with such a jolly, headlong zest.

The " Invocation " (to the Spirit of Financial Prosperity) is delightful.

It goes bursting along in a wild, high-spirited, youthful, larking sort of manner which is irresistible; and " 'Tis Winter-time in Podmell," written in the Belloc-Chestertonian style, is a most engaging piece of work.

" Evoe " sings his gleeful rhymer, and all of a sudden one realises that hard beds and youthful " movie " stars and photographs in the illustrated papers and passenger flights in aeroplanes and other unpromising subjects are really very funny indeed. And to be able to make commonplace or tiresome things very funny indeed is surely an achievement at least equal in value to that of the constantly-held-up-to-our-admiration benefactor who makes two blades of grass grow where only one grew before.

DEATHS IN FRANCE AND SPAIN.*

"Death of a Hero " is a volcano of a book. Mr. Aldington's native skill and long practice as a writer ensure something more than adequacy in the choice and arrangement of words, but it is quite clear that in writing this book his eagerness to get down all that he had to say would brook no timidity, restraint or consideration for the rules which usually guide the professional novelist. Indeed " Death of a Hero " is not a novel—it is a document, obviously based on incidents in which the author took part, with a running commentary in which the narrator speaks in the first person. As a method it is not one lightly to be recommended, for a writer less well equipped would undoubtedly fail to make it convincing.

In the prologue the author declares his intention of writing the life of one George Winterbourne, a soldier killed during the Great War, a man whom he met for the first time in the army, a soldier like any other, and unlike all others; became his friend, confided his troubles and presumably a good deal of his past. By making George a " real " person about whom he could only have such information as he acquired, Mr. Aldington robs himself of the novelist's privilege of omniscience, and if in reading the book one bore this in mind, one would be frequently compelled to ask: " But how does he know that George thought thus, felt thus and behaved in such a way? However confiding, such and such things no man confides, or indeed can. Fortunately, however, except at those moments when the author avowedly sheds the omniscience which he had assumed in spite of himself, one is far too absorbed in the narrative itself to be much concerned about method.

Part III, which deals exclusively with the War, is in its directness and freedom from rhetoric as devastating an indictment as I have read; but although some details of war's beastliness and horror are given, it is less those than its stupidity, its futility and its squandering of fine emotions which remain in my mind as I close the book. " Death of a Hero " is a war book, but at least half of it is concerned with the lives of the hero's parents before he was born, and with his own life and love affairs before the War broke out. Mr. Aldington inveighs against all the cant, hypocrisy, stultification, affectations, shams, greed and humbug with which public and private life is pitted and scarred. Sometimes his generalisations are unfair and undiscriminating, but for the most part his judgment is just and his analysis of causes shrewd. So full is his book of bitterness that a pessimistic frame of mind would seem to be an inevitable reaction to its perusal; but in fact, like all true satirists, he evidently has an unquenchable belief not only in the fundamental fineness of humanity but even in the possibility of happiness. He—to quote the poem which serves as an epilogue—may walk away from contemplation of the War: as we, after reading the almost unbearably poignant last few pages of his book, do; but he will not give up his faith in humanity, because he has beheld its potential nobility in a vision, and communicated the vision to us.

> " In an agony of helpless grief and pity."

After the unbridled passion of Mr. Aldington's book, Mr. Osbert Sitwell's new novel seems curiously restrained. Here is the story of a handsome, charming and talented man who in his youth was an author with a rare and individual gift of expression. He has a love affair in which—for once—he is unsuccessful; he takes his ruptured heart to Spain, recovers, has a strange quasi-psychic adventure in which he is apparently confronted by himself when old; suffers a complete mental metamorphosis; abandons highbrow literature for lowbrow; marries well; becomes rich, is knighted, and then in old age once more suffers a change and desires to regain his earlier highbrow gift. He goes to Spain, to the scene of his early quasi-psychic adventure, and his life is rounded off by a vision of himself when young. A Poe-esque story, written with a regard for circumstantial detail not unlike Poe's own, with one eye on the ways of certain French writers. Mr. Sitwell, very deliberately employing a method which he claims to have originated in his first novel, achieves many admirable things; his sentences frequently attain a rhythmic beauty not unlike music itself, and his method of building up atmosphere—not least the atmosphere of Spain—is extremely effective; and if we only ask of a work of art that it shall be true to its own principles, " The Man Who Lost Himself " is entirely successful. Doubt only assails me when I find Mr. Sitwell, in a preface, seeming to suggest that his story might be a true story. Perhaps, in the second edition, the greater part of the preface might be omitted without loss.

Both of these books are delightfully produced.

MADNESS IN SHAKESPEAREAN TRAGEDY.*

Shakespeare, like so many other literary people, has not failed to note the dramatic possibilities of insanity; and he has therefore on a number of occasions introduced insane characters—or rather it should be said some who are undoubtedly insane, while in others the supposition is that madness in some degree existed. As might be expected it was the tragic aspect of insanity which appealed most to him; and it is with his tragic mad folk that Dr. Somerville deals in his interesting and most readable book. In passing it may be noted that apparently it was Mr. Wyndham Lewis who made the discovery " that Shakespeare was particularly prone to the description of demented persons." Dr. Somerville has given Mr. Lewis his benison in this respect: adding that he (Mr. Lewis) " looks upon madness as being an essential factor in the construction of a Shakespearean tragedy." The latter statement is certainly contentious: but that either of them is the first to point out that Shakespeare or for that matter his contemporaries, took a great interest in depicting insanity, is by no means so. It would indeed be strange if so obvious a point had passed unnoticed. As a matter of fact it is seventy years since for example Dr. Bucknill wrote his " Psychology of Shakespeare "—the later edition of which was entitled " The Mad Folk of Shakespeare "—a book which may still be commended to their notice, or to that of anyone else interested in this topic. Dr. Bucknill deals with Macbeth, Hamlet, Ophelia, Lear, Timon of Athens, Constance—among others; and with these characters Dr. Somerville is concerned, while he studies also Othello, Goneril and Brutus. It may be of interest also for Dr. Somerville and Mr. Wyndham Lewis to know that a very valuable study of "Elizabethan Drama and its Mad Folk," by Mr. Edgar Allison Peers, was published in 1914. There are numerous references to Shakespeare therein.

Both Dr. Somerville and Mr. Wyndham Lewis are inclined to lay too much stress on the importance to be attached to insanity, or, as the lawyers would put it, the "alleged" insanity in Shakespearean tragedy. Indeed Mr. Lewis has given it as his opinion that "Shakespeare, like Cervantes, was occupied always with cases of insanity." Dr. Somerville quotes this apparently with approval, and adds "for in truth the principal characters in Shakespearean tragedy are all more or less mad." Coming on pronouncements such as these, a stranger to the plays might reasonably and shudderingly assume that their author was but an exploiter of the unreason of Bedlam. It is notoriously difficult to draw any line between sanity and insanity—though, in practice, it is not quite as difficult as might appear; but if we are to adopt the Somerville-Lewis criterion, which of us can escape unscathed! True it is that Shakespeare commented on this "mad world" and if he held "a mirror up to nature" he would certainly find reflected there a sort of mad folk. Yet the point is that Shakespeare —myriad-minded—was not obsessed with the idea of madness.

Lady Simon, whose remarkable book, "Slavery," is published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

Again it is to be doubted if it is possible on all occasions to arrive at a satisfactory diagnosis of the particular forms of insanity from which the characters suffered. Though Dr. Somerville gives quite explicitly his reasons for the conclusions at which he has arrived, it does not follow that these can be accepted. It is but common fairness to emphasise the difficulties which he has had to face and to commend his courage in overcoming them as ably as he has done. Dramatic dialogue does not give as clear an indication of the "patient's" condition as it is possible to obtain from the description given by a novelist—provided always that the novelist knows what he is talking about! He has to observe his "case" correctly and in addition to describe the important and typical symptoms. As excellent examples of this verisimilitude there may be mentioned Mrs. Rochester in "Jane Eyre," Prince Muishkin in Dostoievsky's "The Idiot," and some of the characters depicted by Zola and by Dickens. Writing at a later date their descriptions tend to reflect the more advanced knowledge of mental disorders. Only too often writers are too prone to trust to "imagination for their facts"! But knowledge regarding insanity does not unfortunately come from inspiration—even to a Shakespeare. And in any case it would be the dramatic aspect of insanity that would appeal to him. It would not greatly matter to him if he mixed up the symptoms of different forms of insanity so long as he got his effect. This is not said to diminish in any way appreciation of that marvellous mind but merely to remind us that some sense of perspective is necessary when considering even Shakespeare.

This is not the place to consider the diagnoses at which Dr. Somerville has arrived; but a word may be said as to the "still-vexed" question of Hamlet's insanity. Dr. Somerville regards him as a case of manic-depressive insanity, a condition in which there are marked alternations of excitement and depression. Even from some of the symptoms which Dr. Somerville notes this seems unlikely; and it is to be remembered that in "The History of Hamlet" upon which, as pointed out by Payne Collier, Shakespeare is supposed to have founded his tragedy, Hamlet is stated to have feigned insanity. On the other hand, Shakespeare made the character one of his own: and we may agree with Dr. Connolly who, in his lengthy essay on "Hamlet," says: "There is assuredly sufficient foundation for believing that the mind of Shakespeare, exercised on the old story of simulated insanity, imagined the finer outlines of a mental condition in which there is a partial disturbance of reason."

It is a fascinating problem—or series of problems—and we are grateful to Dr. Somerville for recalling this aspect of Shakespearean lore to public attention in his able and penetrating study.

HUBERT J. NORMAN.

PHILIP SNOWDEN—AN INCOMPLETE PORTRAIT.*

Mr. Bechhofer Roberts's previous work gave us a right to expect something better from him than this "impartial portrait" of Philip Snowden. There are certain essential requirements for a good biographer. The first and chief is that he should understand the aims and the principles dominating the actions of his victim. It is not necessary that he should possess special knowledge about him—this "Ephesian" obviously lacks—but it is necessary that he should at least try to comprehend him.

Much of this book is extreme partisanship thinly disguised as impartial biography. Mr. Snowden was for many years a leading advocate and organiser of Socialism. "Ephesian" tells us that, "The history of Socialism in England . . . has been honeycombed with hysteria and folly, jealousy and self-seeking and every form of degeneracy and incompetence." A note of naïve and probably quite unintentional condescension towards working class politicians runs through the pages. But a still more serious fault is that "Ephesian" has not really mastered his brief.

The greatest event in Snowden's early life was the bicycle accident which left him maimed and a semi-cripple. It altered his whole future. For years he endured long spells of physical torment which would have warped a less fine character. "Ephesian" dismisses this accident in a couple of inadequate paragraphs.

The second pivotal point in Snowden's life was his marriage to the clever and beautiful young Yorkshire school teacher whose fame now rivals her husband's. There was real romance in their years of hard struggle in their little Midland home, but it has escaped "Ephesian." There is a real life of Philip Snowden to be written. It will show how this semi-invalid, without means, and with nerves rasped and frazzled by pain, yet forged his way to the foremost rank in British political life by his honesty, sincerity and Yorkshire "grit." It will show how he learned from experience, how he acquired his amazing powers of persuading and influencing others, and how he was able in the vital hour to rise above party and worthily and successfully uphold the cause of the nation against the furious attacks of the politicians of half Europe. But that biography is not here.

F. A. MACKENZIE.

AND AGAIN, THE CROOK STORY.*

Another batch of stories of fantastic crime prompts further reflection on the technique with which such tales are presented. I stress technique advisedly; the subject-matter of crookery (if I may hark back to a recent article) hovers pretty constantly along the border-line between the improbable and the impossible; the writer's prime task is to make such things plausible; and herein what matters is the degree of art (and also the varieties of the art) with which he sets about it.

One does not easily recede from one's contention that the highest rank of novel writing—the most intelligent and the most interesting, even in the commercial field—is the character story. And yet, so infinite is the variety of the novel to-day—here come for example Messrs. Rohmer and Radcliffe, with two tales of continuous and gripping interest; well written moreover, but with as little concern for the portrayal of character as they have for probability. Even the plausible with these two goes hang; their aim, first and last, is to maintain so rapid a fire of thrills that the reader's criticism is in abeyance. "The Emperor of America" is a nightmare of scientific organisation run mad; in "The Flower Gang" I cannot guess how many people are killed (I started without a score pad), but they must reach well into double figures. Yet both books succeed, within the limits of their kind; one would never reread them certainly; but at least while one is at them one cannot stop.

And indeed it may be that the whole-hogging thriller is a better proposition, commercially anyhow, than the sort of giddy-hermaphrodite which tries to combine the sensational with delineation of character; thus falling between two stools. A good thriller need be no more than plausible; but a good character story must be inevitable—a very different affair. The latter therefore is no medium for an illogical plot; in fact the more it stresses character the more dangerously are the improbabilities of its plot revealed. In "The Secret Hand" love-making clogs the progress of a tale whose love interest is not its chief concern. In "The Merrivale Mystery" there is a good character story latent in the group of eccentric degenerates, leading their communal existence in a grim atmosphere of hatred at the big country house; but since the author's main concern is with a murder mystery, he has too little scope to do his characters justice; they are not suffered to be interesting, save as potential victims of the next outrage. With these two must be included "The Yellow Rat"—a story of incident rather than of mystery, since its secrets are never long withheld; on the other hand, its character interest is too slight to dominate the reader's attention, and so serves rather to accentuate than to conceal a certain poverty of action.

Are we then driven to admit that character (the backbone of serious novel writing) is in the thriller more a handicap than a help? So far it seems like it. Either "The Emperor of America" or "The Flower Gang" is in its crude way better reading than these other three, despite their greater pretension to character. Each defies tedium better, each takes the attention more triumphantly by storm. Yet happily there remain two novels of this batch in which the character method is vindicated. One feels that both "The Box-Office Murders" and "The Crying Pig Murder" are on an altogether higher level of intelligence—a feeling mainly induced, I think, by the more logical and inevitable characterisation of their protagonists. They have other virtues too—since a shrewd eye for character must necessarily connote a more intelligent standard in other particulars. Mr. Crofts's plot-development is first-rate—the skill with which he reduplicates his threatened box-office girls, without either confusing his story or distracting attention from the one girl who matters; the skill with which he lets the coining clue seem to peter out, when the suspected coins are passed by the experts at the Mint. Mr. MacClure, working on somewhat different lines, is no less effective; he plays the most difficult of all mystery-gambits—giving his reader every clue as fast as his hero discovers them eliminating his suspects one by one in a logical sequence, and yet contriving to maintain his suspense to the end; and his handling of the successive scenes in court—coroner's, magistrate's and the Old Bailey—is exceptionally well done. In brief these two novels tower above the rest; "The Crying Pig" particularly is the best mystery tale that I have read for a long time.

One further point. Is it coincidence, I wonder, that these two finer tales are each presented subjectively—that is from the investigators' angle only? In "The Box-Office Murders" there is no narrative of the gang's secret movements till a short section near the end, when the heroine is in their power. In "The Crying Pig" the problem is viewed step by step through the young barrister's eyes, with a nine-page confession from the murderer by way of epilogue. It may be that this method, with its sharper limitations, demands from the novelist a finer and more intelligent attack, in the crime story or elsewhere. But my space runs out. I submit the technical point for consideration; perhaps in some future article the question of subjective or non-subjective story-telling can be more fully thrashed out.

This charming story, continuing the life-story of that Margaret of whom we are told in "Sense and Sensibility" that "she had reached an age . . . not very ineligible to be supposed to have a lover," is by Miss Austen's great-grand-niece. Mrs. Brown has borrowed, with a modest nicety, her manner and not a few of her characters from her illustrious relative's book; and no one who enjoys

DEGENERATE OXFORD?
BY TERENCE GREENIDGE

Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. There is a rumour abroad that since the War Oxford is not the place it was, that it has lost its traditions, missed its bearings, and is generally drifting into apathy and disaster. The author of the present book was scholar of his college, and the son of a distinguished Don. He has only recently come down from Oxford, and having been a success in the schools, on the running track and in the drama, has claims to speak for more sides of University life than most men. The theme of his book is a defence of Oxford against its critics, while he frankly faces up to some of its worst foibles. This is a book which should make a sensation, because it is both honest and fearless.

7s. 6d. NOVELS

VILE BODIES

By EVELYN WAUGH, author of "Decline and Fall." Probably no book published since the War caused more genuine delight among sophisticated readers than Mr. Evelyn Waugh's first novel "Decline and Fall," which is still enjoying a steady sale in Great Britain and abroad. In "Vile Bodies" Mr. Waugh has wisely avoided the pitfall of imitating his own success. Admirers of "Decline and Fall" will find the same sense of humour at play. For Captain Grimes and Dr. Fagan we can offer them Colonel Blount and Mrs. Crump, but Mr. Waugh's new book marks an important stage in his development as a serious artist. It may be described as a tragedy in which comic relief overwhelmingly predominates.

THE BRIDGE IS LOVE

By C. A. NICHOLSON, author of "Hell and the Duchess," etc. "Was her mother among the damned? . . . For all these terrible days and nights Claire had been waiting to ask, and now she had been rushed into marriage, had taken vows in a strange church. . . ." The young bride, daughter of Adrienne de Trigues, tragic duchess and courtesan, plunges through a network of intrigue, of forms and ceremonies, social and religious, in quest of a clue to her mother's death and future state. Clinging to the essence of a faith, unhampered by conventions of Church or creed, of atheism or spiritualism, Claire seeks, also, the ultimate purpose of existence: the reconcilement of love, human and divine.

DEAD MAN'S QUARRY

By IANTHE JERROLD, author of "The Studio Crime." Miss Jerrold's first mystery story, "The Studio Crime," was acclaimed as an unusually fine piece of work, and her publishers consider her new story to be even better. It deals with the amazing murder of a young man who is one of a bicycling party on a holiday in the West of England. His body is found in a quarry close to the tavern where the party had just been taking tea. The clues are so intertwined that almost every member of the party in turn appears likely to prove the murderer. The final solution is among the most surprising in fiction.

THE CROOKED EYE

By KATHERINE VIRDEN. Miss Katherine Virden is an American novelist who has had a vivid experience of life, and also unusual opportunities for knowing what the public wants, during her career in a publishing house. She ranks as one of the most remarkable of American writers of criminal fiction. It has been her object to fill her stories of crime with real characters and, in her own words, to depict an actual criminal or two, for whom even the softest hearted reader could not find an excuse. "The Crooked Eye" is a mystery which no reader will penetrate until he reaches the last chapter.

FROZEN SLIPPERS

By MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON, author of "Children of the Zodiac," "Hollywood Love," etc. Mrs. Williamson's new novel takes her readers, once more, into the cinema world at Hollywood, and reveals her lively acquaintance with all the ins and outs of cinema life. Few writers keep a plot moving more quickly than she does, and her large public will not be disappointed with her latest offering.

PAGETT CALLING

By LIEUT.-COL. W. P. DRURY, C.B.E., author of "The Flag-Lieutenant in China," etc. Private Pagett is one of the most popular characters in fiction, and his capacity for self-exaggeration and self-glorification has made him a hero in many a ward-room. Colonel Drury's new volume of short stories contains several examples of Pagett's wit, and others of a sterner and more tragic element. There is plenty of variety between the two.

FANTOCINNI

By COUNTESS BARCYNSKA, author of "He Married his Parlourmaid," etc. Countess Barcynska is reckoned among the most popular short story writers of the day, and this new volume is full of variety, both of character and incident. The book contains such an infinity of different emotions that it can be recommended for reading under almost any conditions.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LTD., 11, HENRIETTA STREET, LONDON, W.C.2

Miss Austen's particular outlook on the world can fail to be entertained by this account of Margaret's adventures. There is a curate who might be Mr. Collins's cousin, and in her portrayal of Sir John and Mrs. Jennings the authoress is never at a loss to invent incident, behaviour and conversation in keeping with these figures of Miss Austen's creation. The final elopement is perhaps a little lacking in dash ; but Mrs. Brown is at her witty best in the battles between Marianne and the elder Mrs. Ferrars.

THIS POOR PLAYER. By Shirley Watkins. 10s. 6d. (Mathews & Marrot.)

Ambitious in scope and in style, this long novel is amateurish in its long, turgid sentences and laboured psychology. The theme is a fine one. This is the story of Alexander Birney who, endowed with the finest intellectual gifts and a high philosophy of life, was yet made of poor vain stuff. The slow tale of the warping of his brain and soul by praise too easily acquired and criticisms too bitterly resented, is an engrossing one to readers who are not checked by the book's heaviness. One is surprised at the almost divine patience of Birney's patron, Charles Sedley, who maintains him in comfort—and even luxury ; but one realises, at the same time, Birney's curious attraction for many people. When Charles's sister Eliza literally flings herself into Alexander's arms, he knows, and we know, that she is preluding intense misery for both of them. Birney's initial proud, even arrogant hopes, and his final utter failure to do anything fine with his life, are the beginning and end of a study, powerful if a little unwieldy. Miss Watkins must learn to simplify herself.

KEERBOSKLOOF. By Norman Giles. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

The steady downpour of detective fiction is constantly refreshing virgin soil ; and although so far only this planet is involved with perennial storms, if Mr. H. G. Wells could be induced to join the ranks of those serious novelists who now relax into thrills and mysteries, no doubt astral murders and lunar robberies would enrich our lending libraries with depressions from the skies. " Keerboskloof," " the very title, sinister yet romantic," as the fly-leaf so aptly puts it, is a first-rate thriller in a novel background, even though the detective does win his case only through the voluntary confession of the criminal, and then proceeds to make everyone happy by " faking " this confession. However, the character studies are unusually well drawn for this type of writing, and the reactions of the Kafirs to the whites make interesting reading. Staged in Dutch-African soil, the novel is an arresting one, despite the introduction of native words and phrases, which fill one with doubt as to their meaning and pronunciation.

THE RAVELLED SLEEVE. By Betty Inskip. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

A book of youth, with youth's buoyancy and tragedy, is Miss Betty Inskip's first novel. It is usual to speak of the promise of a first book, but " The Ravelled Sleeve " is an actual achievement. The characters are handled with delicacy, understanding and not a little humour, and the dialogue is particularly good. In the beginning we meet Dinah on the verge of leaving school, half child, half woman, ready to fall in love with an unknown young man who speaks to her in the train, yet as ready to abandon that love when the young man eventually proposes to her elder sister. Love comes to her in due course, strangely interwoven with and interrupted by her friendship with Flavia, whose youth has been spoilt by the discreditable publicity attached to her mother's name. Flavia feels that she has inherited nothing but badness and is constantly fighting against it, till in the end the chance comes to her to make atonement. Miss Inskip has a sure touch when dealing with the younger generation ; she knows this generation and presents a true and arresting picture of the sunnier aspect of life—the aspect of a fresh, healthy girl who has just left school and is eager for romance and quickly responsive to beauty.

WHATEVER GODS MAY BE. By André Maurois. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

This ingenious and light novel is so well done that it is saved from being a flippant trifle, and almost turned into a significant picture of the sentimental male heart by the author's sensitive touch. We know that M. Maurois can say wise and semi-wise things gracefully, so that the neat aphorisms to be found in a rather complicated love story are not surprising as they would be in an English novel. Even if Dr. Joseph Collins had not done the translation into such clear and easy English, one would not think that " Whatever Gods May Be " was other than a novel by a Frenchman. From the self-revelations of the man who tells a woman he has fallen in love with (all the story is told in diaries and letters) of his sentimental debut as a fifteen-year-old schoolboy in love with a married woman, to the last phase, which is described by his wife (and second love), it is Gallic. The frail fabric of the story indeed could not have been sustained except by a manner. When the sentimental egoist dies, his loving wife writes : " It had been soon, Philippe, just as you had wished and it was a great pity, my dear love. Had I been able to keep you I believe I could have made you happy. But our destiny and our desires rarely play in unison." That is the last paragraph of the book. True love thwarted never becomes more than " a great pity."

The Bookman's Table.

ODDS AND ENDS OF MY LIFE. By Ann Estella, Countess Cave. With illustrations. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)

This is a comfortable book, as personal as a letter to a friend, wise from experience, kindly from memories, shrewd from observation, and charming from an instinctive knowledge of salient details. The trials and joys of childhood are as vividly recounted as the larger doings of later life. Lady Cave declares that her ultimate destiny was settled by a remark made by her Aunt Elizabeth : " To think that after all these years in our service Emma should leave me to marry a barman, and be constantly demeaning herself by drawing beer for drunkards." This remark lived in the child's memory and was astonishingly quoted a year or so later when her father was regretting that he had not gone to the Bar. " To be constantly demeaning yourself by drawing beer for drunkards," she mused aloud. There followed an explanation, and the Bar career looked so rosy that the child determined to marry a barrister and aim at the Woolsack. The ambition was achieved in 1922. In twenty-two chapters Lady Cave writes about her young home life, her love of collecting, her relatives, servants, dogs, dreams, of dress and of gardens. Half a dozen illustrations add charm to a book which itself has all the interest of a vivacious conversation.

The Palace of Westminster.
From "Odds and Ends of My Life," by Countess Cave (John Murray).

AFGHANISTAN: FROM DARIUS TO AMANULLAH. By Lieut.-General Sir George MacMunn, K.C.B., K.C.S.I., D.S.O. 21s. (Bell.)

Popular ideas on the smaller countries of the East are so fallacious and reveal so complete an ignorance, that one welcomes the publication of any such book as this. Afghanistan indeed has been unusually lucky in its present historian, for Sir George Macmunn not only is thoroughly acquainted with his subject, but he possesses an unpretentious and exceedingly readable literary manner. The author gives us here a brief historical sketch of Afghanistan's troubled past and a detailed account of its more recent history, especially in reference to the reign of King Amanullah and the last revolution. The book is indeed quite astonishingly up to date. Sir George writes with an open mind and with an attractive frankness where his personal opinions are concerned. He is particularly enlightening on the subject of the religious and social reforms which King Amanullah tried to introduce, and he defends Anglo-Indian policy on the North-West Frontier in an acute and broad-minded statement. The book is one that should be read by all who are interested in Asiatic problems.

MISS BARRETT'S ELOPEMENT. By C. Lenanton. 7s. 6d. net. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

When this kind of book is well done, it holds in its pages far more than the interest of a novel. "Miss Barrett's Elopement" is the story of the early life of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, her family surroundings, her invalid years, her courtship and marriage; and to us in this later century it comes as a fascinating chronicle and a revelation. We knew Robert Browning's poems, we knew Mrs. Browning's poems. We vaguely knew that Elizabeth Barrett wore drooping curls, was a comparatively helpless invalid, and had a stern father. We had read that Robert Browning and she loved one another, and that she rose from her couch, eloped with him, lived afterwards in Italy, and was never forgiven by "Papa." But Mrs. Lenanton makes of the lay figures of brothers and sisters living beings with emotions, hopes, disappointments, pretty frocks, romances, friends, and the occupations and amusements enjoyed by young men and women when Queen Victoria was young. Such attractive glimpses she gives us too. We see Elizabeth (before her invalidism) attired in a white muslin gown sprayed with rosebuds, a pelerine of moss-green cashmere with imbecille sleeves, and a French cottage bonnet tied with pink ribbons, standing on the pavement, outside the Barrett home in Wimpole Street, with Miss Mitford and William Wordsworth, preparatory to stepping into the hired carriage to drive to see Hogarth's house in Chiswick. We see her, standing by the table in her room, in a white dress, arranging flowers, to surprise Robert Browning when he called. He had never before seen her stand, and did not know she could. We learn that she took drives and even little walks, to train herself as it were for her desperate elopement, revealing her secret to nobody but her faithful maid, Wilson. We leave her as she reaches the arms, at last, of the husband she had stolen out to marry a few days before. Mrs. Lenanton has handled a difficult piece of work with great success. She holds us intensely interested fro. the first page to the last, and sends us to the poems of these great lovers with renewed interest.

SOME NEW YEAR GIFT-BOOKS.

ARTHUR MEE'S JOHN BUNYAN.

7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

With this third book—the story of the "Wonderful Tinker and His Three Great Books, in His Own Words," Mr. Arthur Mee completes his Children's Library, in which we have already his "Children's Bible" and "Children's Shakespeare." The Bible, Shakespeare and Bunyan he groups together as "a trinity of books unmatched in all the world, a shining and immortal possession." He says, "There has been no other literature so rich as ours, so universal, so unfailing, and there are no three books in all the literatures of three thousand years to stand by these." After giving briefly the story of John Bunyan and his world, he goes on, using Bunyan's own words, to present to children "The Pilgrim's Progress," "The Holy War," "The Story of His Own Life," "Grace Abounding," and finally rhymes, sayings and stories from Bunyan's half forgotten books. There is a coloured frontispiece and seventy illustrations in gravure—the whole making a beautiful and intensely interesting volume that is certain to be one of the most popular of this season's gift-books.

Mr. Arthur Mee.

WILLY POGANY'S MOTHER GOOSE.

7s. 6d. (Nelson.)

All the favourite nursery rhymes are here, with numerous additions and adaptations, also a rhymed and illustrated alphabet. But the chief glory of the book is the large number of delightful coloured illustrations, large and small, as well as many black-and-white by Willy Pogany. That such a distinguished artist should devote so much time to the youngsters' entertainment is evidence of the importance they have achieved in the great festival of Christmas. The quaint characters, fantastic houses and intriguing animals are joyously depicted, and many of the pictures are a sheer delight in their excellent finish and delicate colouring.

TOO BIG FOR THE FIFTH.

By R. A. H. GOODYEAR. Illustrated by FRANCIS C. HILEY 5s. (Ward, Lock.)

Sidney Frond has the originality to argue that games at public schools should not be compulsory. He often shirks them, and this habit involves him in a good deal of unpopularity. However he has an excellent reason for his frequent disappearances from the playing field—a reason which we shall certainly not give away—and he is reinstated in the good graces of his fellows when it is discovered. Mr. Goodyear is always well worth reading and his somewhat unlikely story is told with so much spirit that it is not until one has come to the end that one begins to feel some doubts as to its probability.

CAPTAIN ALLEN GARDINER, OF PATAGONIA

By JESSE PAGE. 2s. Illustrated. (Pickering & Inglis).

This new addition to Messrs. Pickering & Inglis's Bright Biography series tells the inspiring story of Captain Gardiner's missionary services and his heroic death "on bleak Fuégia's strand." Gardiner had many affinities in character with General Gordon and, as Mr. Page says, "it was his destiny, as it was Gordon's, to deal single-handed with the wild children of barbarism," and to perish at his post waiting for the rescue which came too late. A Life worth writing and worth reading.

MORE HEROES OF MODERN ADVENTURE.

By T. C. BRIDGES and H. HESSELL TILTMAN. With 32 illustrations. 7s. 6d. (Harrap.)

The success of Messrs. Bridges and Tiltman's earlier "Heroes of Modern Adventure" has, one is glad to note, encouraged them to produce a companion volume. These extraordinary records of human bravery and endurance are in the highest degree inspiring and the new book is at least on a level with its predecessor in the quality of the adventures dealt with. Here are the tales of the attempt to climb Mount Everest, of Sir William Seagrave's motoring "record," of Bert Hinkler's lonely flight to Australia, of Frank Sutton's exploits as a Chinese general, of the crossing of the Kalahari Desert, and a dozen more. Among the lesser known exploits one of the most striking is the story of "Dad" Fairbanks, known as the "Saviour of Death Valley" in California, a dreadful waste for which the authors make the claim that it is the hottest spot on earth. These true stories are all excellently well told.

THE RIVALS OF THE CHALET SCHOOL.

By ELINOR M. BRENT-DYER. With 4 illustrations by NINA K. BRISLEY. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

Miss Brent-Dyer has had no little success with her stories of a school in Switzerland, and it is not surprising that her book this Christmas is in the same vein. Her present tale describes how the Chalet School found a rival in a new establishment purely for English girls in the same place and how the Chaletians managed to expose the plot of St. Scholastika's to ruin them. It is written with much brightness and with complete knowledge of local colour. Here is a girls' school story with a difference.

JOHN TRUSTY.

By S. G. HULME BEAMAN. With 12 illustrations in colour and many in line by the Author. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

In "John Trusty" Mr. Hulme Beaman introduces a book of a new and original kind that will surely delight all its child readers—and, besides, every sensible adult who comes across it. The story, which describes the farcically improbable adventures of a boy in Elizabethan times, is good and one that keeps you entertained from start to finish. The illustrations, drawn to a strange but extraordinarily effective convention of woodenness in the characters, are even better. They are not only delightfully funny but sometimes really beautiful. In every way "John Trusty" is a satisfying and satisfactory book—one of the jolliest creations of which it is possible to conceive.

THE THIRD ROBIN FEATHERSTONE.

By L. C. DOUTHWAITE. With 4 illustrations by PERCY TARRANT. 3s. 6d. (Chambers.)

Mr. Douthwaite's new public school story possesses an originality of a somewhat uncommon kind. His hero is a Canadian, and the author describes the humiliations into which his ignorance of English customs involves him with sympathy and insight. Young Robin Featherstone's school life was not made any easier by the additional fact that he appeared to be involved in the misdemeanours of a senior member of his family. The ensuing mystery and the way in which it is cleared up show the author's resource and ingenuity. "The Third Robin Featherstone" is an effective and readable school story with greater literary pretensions than most of its kind.

"Elizabeth and Me."
From "The Sweep and the Daffodil. By Mabel Constanduros (Alston Rivers).

DUDLEY AND GILDEROY.

By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD. 8s. 6d. net. (Ernest Benn.)

One thing is certain—you can never have read a book anything like this before. To say that it is the entertaining adventures of a parrot and a cat who run away from their home in a manor house to London conveys no idea of the freshness and charm of "Dudley and Gilderoy." The story is written with great distinction and skill, and wit and humour, and Mr. Algernon Blackwood shows a rare understanding and sympathy with the two whose biographies he has chosen to write. "Dudley and Gilderoy" is a remarkably fine piece of work.

THE LAND OF LET'S PRETEND.

By CLIFFORD CARTER. 2s. 6d. (Quota Press.)

Devoted little listeners to the Children's Hour on the B.B.C. will be glad to possess some of the stories about the Mabel they know so well on the wireless—Mabel "of the little snub nose which gets ink at the end in cold weather just like yours or mine, not very tall, not very short, in fact just like most other little girls of eight." These are fairy stories; bright and simple. We like the description of the basket full of things that Red Riding Hood brought from the Fair. "There's an alarm clock for the Sleeping Beauty, some arrows for Robin Hood, some oil for Aladdin's Lamp, and some magic for the Fairy Queen."

The Messenger of the Moon.
From "The Meeting Pool." By Mervyn Skipper and R. W. Coulte (Mathews & Marrot). Reviewed in the October BOOKMAN.

BOYS AND GIRLS WHO BECAME FAMOUS.

By AMY CRUSE. 7s. 6d. (Harrap.)

What an excellent foundation is laid by gaining the children's attention in the attractive way Miss Cruse has adopted. No child could fail to be fascinated by these stories of the early days of twenty-seven famous men and women. The interest so caught is not likely to be easily lost, but rather to remain, and prove a real source of inspiration to them as they grow older. We would like to have mentioned all twenty-seven, but can only name a few in order to give some idea of the diversity of interests represented: Thomas Edison, Madame Curie, J. M. Barrie, Booker Washington, Charlotte Brontë, Bertrand du Guesclin, Helen Keller, Dickens, Sybil Thorndike. With each in turn the reader enters the magic circle and shares their difficulties, joys and problems in the most intimate way.

THE WRENFORD TRADITION.

By DOROTHEA MOORE. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. (Nisbet.)

It has been said that while writers for boys can be easily found, the writers of stories for girls are difficult to discover. It is obviously a problem to fit the modern schoolgirl into any of those well worn romances which did good service in the days before the War, but Miss Dorothea Moore succeeds in painting the girl of to-day and making her adventures emotionally interesting. "The Wrenford Tradition" is the last of a long series of girls' books, which now runs to nineteen volumes, from her pen. Miss Moore's values are the right values, and this story is free from any mawkish sentiment and entirely devoid of snobbery. A delightful tale and Chrys Stannard a most lovable heroine.

SILVER MAGIC.

Edited by ROMER WILSON. Illustrated in colour and line by VIOLET BRUNTON. 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)

There used to be a comic song in the nineties, when songs, at least seen in retrospect, were comic, the burden of which declared that "you shouldn't judge cigars by the picture on the box." How often has the publishers' description of a book on the dust-cover misled the hungry reader! Mr. Jonathan Cape however, in his description of "Silver Magic," has not said a word too laudatory. Last year Miss Romer Wilson produced a collection of fairy stories, taken from all countries, under the title of "Green Magic." "Silver Magic" is the second volume of the series. It is "a collection of the world's best fairy tales from all countries," and though this may sound almost blasphemous, we think it is even better than the similar volumes Andrew Lang used to issue. There are twenty-two stories in all, with a very charming introduction on giants and dwarfs. It would be difficult to speak too highly of Miss Brunton's illustrations.

The Sheltering Hills.
From "When He was Just a Little Child." By Lucy Diamond (Oxford Press).

CAPTAIN COPPERNOB.

By LAWRENCE R. BOURNE. With frontispiece in colour and many line drawings. 2s. 6d. (Oxford Press.)

Mr. Bourne has a real gift for the story of full-blooded adventure and in his third volume recounting the adventures of his hero, Walter Buckland, he is in admirable form. "Coppernob" is now master of a sailing-ship bound for Australia via Panama. Japanese and Russian villains have invented a directional ray which they intend to use in a private war of their own against British power in the Pacific—and have taken passage on the ship. How they are outwitted by that lusty fighter Coppernob makes an engrossing melodramatic tale which many fathers will not be content to allow only their sons to read.

RIVALS OF THE REEF.

By PERCY F. WESTERMAN. 6s. net. (Blackie.)

Shortly after Colonel Bambrough became the tenant of Trewarro House, an ancient mansion on the Cornish coast, he discovers an old chart made by Amon Dry, the buccaneer who built Trewarro, showing the island where he had concealed his treasure. The colonel is severely injured in a motor accident, but he sends out an expedition under Joshua Dry, a descendant of the buccaneer, including his son Nigel, his chum, Dick Lavington, and their tutor. The treasure is brought home after many adventures with sharks, giant apes and storms, and after the many plots of clever rivals have been circumvented. Mr. Westerman tells his story in admirable fashion, the characters being pleasantly natural, and an underlying vein of humour serves to relieve the tension of the more desperate moments. Altogether a rousing yarn.

THE BOOK OF THE CAT JEREMIAH.

(Animal Folk-Tales)

Edited by FRANCESCA CLAREMONT. Illustrated by GLADYS M. REES. 3s. 6d. net. (University of London Press.)

A book of short folk-tales about animals that teachers will find useful is "The Book of the Cat Jeremiah." Besides a number of folk-tales including "Why the Owl does not come out in the daytime," "Why the Sole has its Mouth on one side" and "How the Robin got his Red Breast," there are descriptions of games like "Fox and Goose" and "Tiggy, Tiggy Touchwood," and a number of rhymes about animals. Gladys M. Rees's illustrations are charming.

THE SCOUT'S LIFE OF BADEN-POWELL.

By W. J. BATCHELDER and DAVID BALFOUR. With an introduction by LORD HAMPTON, D.S.O., and 12 illustrations from photographs. 5s. (Collins.)

However great may be his shrinking from personal "advertisement" and his ability to put his wishes in this direction into effect, it is nevertheless an extraordinary thing that so little has been written about the life of one of the most remarkable living Englishmen, the author of a movement which even before the War was world-wide and which now possesses flourishing organisations in every civilised country and in many that are still considered savage. If "B. P." had been any other than what he is, one can imagine how the market would have been flooded with "lives" and character sketches and general laudations. While one admires the mental attitude which has produced this restraint, it is good that the silence should have been broken. Messrs. Batchelder and Balfour have tackled their subject most tactfully and have produced an excellent and very readable book. We can heartily recommend their "life." It is altogether an inspiring story.

DUSTY: The Story of a Dog and his Adopted Boy.

5s. (Nash & Grayson.)

Dedicated "to all dog lovers, especially those boys who have been adopted by dogs," this story of Dusty, told in pictures by Carl Anderson, with a few comments by Isaac Anderson, shows that he took his responsibilities seriously, and provides the merriest entertainment for young and old, whether dog-lovers or not.

LITERATURE IN NEW ZEALAND.

By W. S. Dale, M.A.

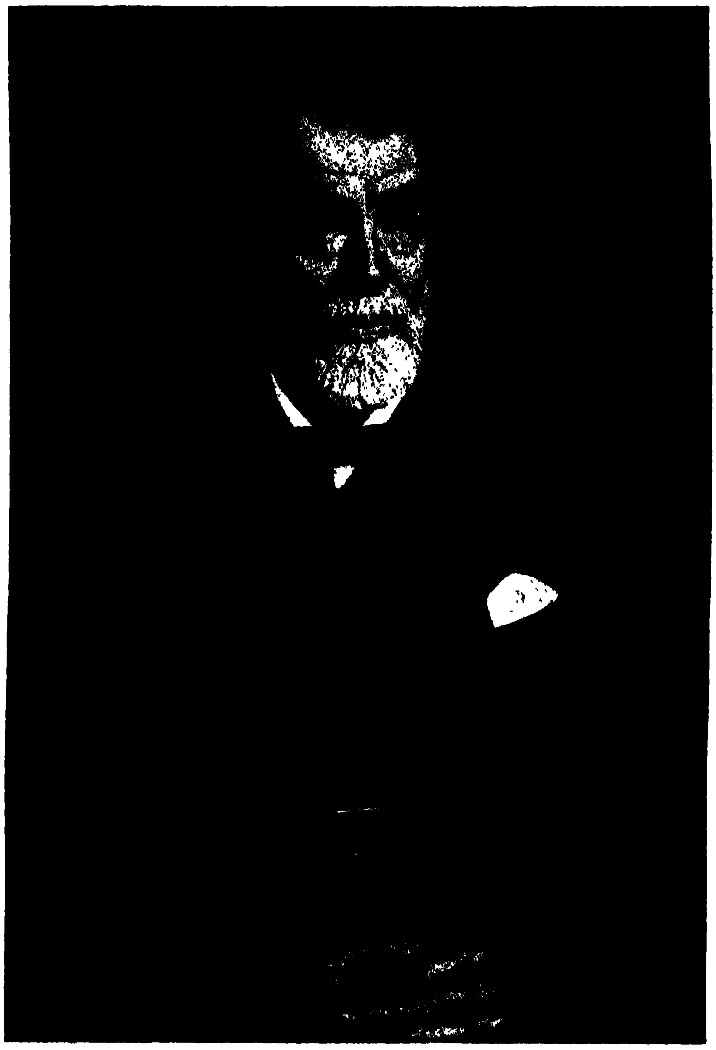
It is but some seventy years since the first verse of any real merit was published in New Zealand, and a very much shorter space marks the publication here of the earliest novel. There are moreover several other unique phases of our literary life which must be considered. To-day most of our authors of any worth are women—a striking contrast with the middle nineteenth century when, despite the necessity for pioneering effort, the laurels rested with the men. As sociologically New Zealand attempts many experiments, it may be that in the field of authorship we are following precedent, but of this the future must judge.

In making a brief survey of the verse of this little land, an indication of the attitude and outlook in the sixties may be obtained by realising that some of the settlements in the South Island were simply a section of the strata of English society transported hither. It is because of this that Alexander and Currie, in their little volume, "New Zealand Verse" (1906), say: "There existed a tradition that it was a good thing to write poetry." To-day it is safe to say the tradition persists even more strongly than in those pioneering days. The adherence to this axiom however has not produced a consciously united effort to develop a school of style such as is so noticeable in Australia. The whole corpus of English literature, with its myriad influences, has directed the genius of our writers who have given response as best suited their character. Finally it must be realised that while the North Island was embroiled in conflict with the Maori, the settlement of Canterbury was free to indulge in literary work unfettered or uninfluenced by the new movements of the later fifties.

Of these early Christchurch writers Bowen is probably the best. His verses are not free of a tinge of homesickness noticeable in "The Old Year and the New," while in "Battle of the Free" there is a marked patriotism finding tongue in the final stanza. Following hot upon this came the work of the squatter-governor Broome, who of all our poets captured the Pre-Raphaelite sentiments of the sixties. In "A Temple Service" his style is well sustained, but the modern palate does not appreciate the cloying voluptuousness of "women large-lipped and long-eyed; their damsels dear with loves beyond our own," hence he has been relegated to a minor place in our poetry.

Portrait by Howard S. M. Coster The Hon. W. Pember Reeves, author of "The Long White Cloud; A History of New Zealand," etc.

Towering above these like a mighty Colossus is Domett, politician, poet and friend of Browning. Because of "Ranolf and Amohia" he must always be reckoned a New Zealander, though he had written three books of verse before coming here. The idyll is unfolded in some five hundred pages, but alas! the reading is not easy, for the machinery clanks too loudly through long metaphysical musings; Homeric conflicts are spoilt by useless philosophical digressions, but ever and anon shine out gems descriptive of that wildly impressive scene round Rotorua. With strong, deft strokes he paints the everlasting beauty of the bush; he catches the cadences of waterfall and the sweet lilt of the forest birds only to weave them into a warm, rich thing of beauty. His idyll won instant recognition at the hands of both Browning and Longfellow.



The last of the poets of our nonage is Bracken. He made use of a variety of style and of subject. Unfortunately, like many more of our minor poets, he does not manifest any ability to maintain true style throughout, often descending to mere verbiage in the latter phases of his poems. "Not Understood," which has a certain popularity even to-day, is of all his works the only poem which is readily linked with his name.

For a period there appears to have been a lull in our literary world. Effective settlement in the North was being accomplished. Nature thus assumed, for the time being at least, a kindlier aspect. No longer a covering for the marauding Maori, it whispered to the native-born of strength and beauty. Responsive to these influences, the reaction is recorded by Anne Glenny Wilson, McKee Wright, Mary Colborne-Veel, O'Regan, Adams and Reeves; and in this transition period women's names appear for the first time. Anne Glenny Wilson is reminiscent of Thomson, especially in "A Winter Daybreak":

> "Now from the shuttered East a silvery bar
> Shines through the mist, and shows the mild day-star.
> The Storm-wrapped peaks start out and fade again,
> And rosy vapours skirt the pastoral plain."

Pember Reeves gave us that intensely patriotic song, "New Zealand," but he too felt the call of the bushland. "The Passing of the Forest" and "The White Convolvulus" breathe that abiding love of Nature that time and space cannot efface. The delicacy of treatment suits the theme most admirably; moreover the personal note indicates the close kinship with his native soil which earlier writers did not so clearly show.

Portrait by Alfred Emery Cal..e. Samuel Butler.

Arthur H. Adams (gone to Australia and unfortunately now lost to us), inspired by filial affection, does battle royal in defence of our changeless bush. Our seasonal passings a e marked by no falling leaf or vivid green bud. This very fact did not ease the heart weariness of the earliest settler, but with youthful arrogance "The Dwellings of Our Dead" rings out on a triumphant note:

> "Our brooding bush shall fold them
> In her broad bosomed peace."

Differing completely in style and treatment is Adams's prelude to "The Nazarene." Almost an ode, the nobility of theme demonstrates that here is a poet of no mean order. As Bracken and Domett had used native historical material, so did Adams and, like Bracken, his efforts were not quite successful. For some strange reason Maori lore loses much of its beauty as soon as the natural poetry of the language is broken up. If therefore we are disappointed in "The Coming of Te Rauparaha," we must blame philology rather than the poet. O'Regan, whose best verse is found in his sonnet, "Life's Vigil," reveals a delicacy of conception and a trace of mysticism which maturity might have strengthened. Potentially a genius (his work was unusually promising for the work of a boy), he died at the early age of twenty-one.

David McKee Wright, poet and parson, was the precursor of the "up-country" school of which B. E. Baughan was a most able exponent. His work is shot through with that genial camaraderie so typical of station life. "In Town" serves as a mask to recall those happy days of rabbiters in Otago; wistful regrets, as the old runs are broken up into smaller farms, find voice in "Arlington." There can be no doubt that his influence on his contemporaries was not inconsiderable, for his style was simple and direct; he wrote of the things he knew and so glorified them.

Mary Colborne-Veel's work is marked by a personal tone "A Song of the Sandhills" is probably one of the best things she has written; it is a direct contrast to "Her Secret," in which the theme is similar to Drinkwater's "Mrs. Willow" but not so well done. Tuneful on a melancholy note is "Saturday Night," when,

> "Far from the haunting shadow of pain,
> Two by two, again and again,
> Strephon and Chloe together move,
> Walking in Arcady, land of love."

These writers of the second phase of our literary life show distinct promise; it is true that some scarcely rise above "minor" place, but they serve to show the changing attitude in relation to subject matter. At the time the colony was gravely vexed with the activities inseparably connected with pioneering work; our literary life was in a backwater; the eddies which were then apparent have now grown bigger, bearing seaward those who to-day are establishing firmly both poetry and prose upon these early beginnings.

Blanche E. Baughan developed the earlier work of Wright, seeking inspiration in the struggles of the early settler. Thus "The Old Place" is the reflection of the titanic efforts of fifteen years brought to naught, and is typical of pioneering life. There is not visible however any concerted or spontaneous effort to carry this phase forward. The charming little lyric, "The Greatest Gift," is worthy of mention if only for its beauty of conception. Like most writers, she felt the call of the sea, but no one, strangely enough, has felt the inspiration so entirely as Will Lawson, whose "Red West Road" should live long in anthologies; "Greasin'" shows the influence of Kipling and should not escape notice. But while we read his lines we feel that the scene and the subject are not applicable alone to New Zealand—the new note is perceived—that of a universality. As this grows, we find within the last two decades a lack of national stamp upon our poets which has been transferred in part to the novelists. But it is safe to say that there has been an equivalent gain because of this essentially British influence. Eileen Duggan who, like all true poets, writes but seldom, has given us in "Sea Prayers" a very gem in conception; it comes to one like a whispered orison, stealing down the aisle of some old-world village church. Both Dora Wilcox and Isabel Maud Peacocke exhibit a predilection for this cosmopolitanism. The former's "The Last of the Forest" bears no inherent stamp of New Zealand; it could conceivably have been written of Canada or of America. Bearing company with these two is another woman, Jessie Mackay, whose "For Love of Appin" is one of the finest pieces in Scottish dialect published in this country. "A Folk Song" is well done, the spirit has been caught in a charming manner, while "Slumber Song," a lullaby, shows that the Gaelic spirit is still blazing within.

Arnold Wall, in a volume, "London Lost and Other Poems," makes his verse appeal equally to the Old World as to the New. "Reform" and "Under Which King" were in fact first published outside New Zealand—the former in Sydney, the latter in London.

To Anderson there must be paid a tribute for his exquisite vignettes of bird and bush; they are delicate things meriting wider reading. Alice Kenny, whose work has attracted attention for its style and treatment, shows in a clear-cut manner the desire to write for people rather than for a country. This sentiment is made explicit in the preface to Alan Mulgan's "The English of the Line." The author "has never seen England," he says, and notes that too seldom have we appreciated the men of the Old Land in attempting to write of the new. He typifies the trend of to-day when communication is quick and our population has become "a-travelled." Poetry must appeal to the whole of the English-speaking world; there cannot be built upon the columns of the last century an entablature to suit our Anglomania. "To L. H. B.," by Katherine Mansfield, is symbolic of this wider outlook, this firmer touch, this great awakening to the world claim of genius wheresoever it may be found.

There is no wealth of material in the dramatic world as in that of poetry. Four dramatists claim New Zealand origin, but of these, two—namely Rex. Hunter and Arthur H. Adams—are no longer living in New Zealand, so that they do not really represent our playwrights. Mona Gordon, an Auckland writer, sought inspiration in the Punic Wars, publishing as a result "Sophonisba." Mulgan, whose verse has been noted for its virility, has written and published "Three Plays of New Zealand." These are distinctive because they deal with the social problems of this country. It is indicative of the power of this writer that he successfully wrote round the social values in their transition as represented by colonisation. The possibilities of the future cannot be gauged; much manuscript exists but, as in our early poetry, the material used is essentially local. Whether there is sufficient genius in this to warrant world-wide recognition must remain, for the time being at least, a moot point.

If our poets trick out in a new dress the sentiments of the Old World, if there be but few playwriters in New Zealand, our novelists, at least in their first works, manage to give a new turn to the story. They have no tradition to follow; they identify themselves with the land; the necessities of the environment are adapted to meet the demand of the plot. Some will continue to be read; other novels will suffer the fate of countless thousands and perish within a short space. In prose as in poetry the tide flowed from the South Island northward. So slowly indeed has the tide flowed that only in comparatively recent years have the writers of Auckland become known.

The first contribution New Zealand made to literature was indirect and traceable to Dumas, who obtained from a Doctor Maynard his diary after a voyage to these waters in a whaling vessel. The material so obtained was utilised in "Les Baleini." Samuel Butler, in "Erewhon" (1867), idealised the new country. "Beyond the Ranges" was a dream, Utopian perhaps, but nevertheless a dream holding possibilities which yet may be fulfilled. Wellington was associated, as early as 1845, with Charlotte Brontë through Mary Taylor, the "M. T." of "Mrs. Gaskell's Life" and Rose York of "Shirley." She was probably the first to enter the field of Letters, for from her little shop she wrote interesting and amusing letters to Haworth Parsonage, telling stories of the little struggling colony, receiving replies by the infrequent and unreliable sailing ship.

The first novel of any real merit dealing with the "earlies" is "The Greenstone Door." It is semi-historical in its setting, and is of not inconsiderable merit. The tale of the pioneers has been taken up by Jane Mander, who wrote "The Story of a New Zealand River," as well as two other volumes. Her style is virile as befits her subject, and while the plot is not complex there is sufficient to maintain the interest throughout.

Elizabeth Milton (Mrs. Lusk), whose new novel, "Wand'ring Wood," has just been published by Messrs. Mills & Boon.

"A prophet is without honour in his own country" is demonstrated by the fact that, receiving scant support from her own people, she left for America with the avowed intention of writing no more of New Zealand. With her departure it may be said that there are none now writing novels of New Zealand life.

Rosemary Rees, who has some four or five novels to her credit, is a writer of a different calibre. She has not the virility of Jane Mander or the scintillation of Katherine Mansfield. Her fiction is really the conventional story in a setting suitable to our conditions. She desires neither to propound a theory nor to depict pioneering life, and because of her ability to avoid preciosity she has been well received. Jean Devanny, who sprang into prominence overnight, saw her first novel, "The Butcher's Shop," banned in her native land. She has the cosmopolitan touch which is so necessary if social problems are to be discussed. There can be little doubt of her claims to celebrity. Incidentally, she was included in the "best" short stories of 1927. A lack of polish in her style has provoked our critics, hence the assertion of grossness and realism, but social topics are not as a rule discussed by enthusiasts in "drawing-room" style. She too is leaving for England shortly, and so another gem is lost from our literary diadem. Bolitho, whose first novel, "Solemn Boy," also failed to please the critics here, has shown that England offers what these islands grudge. It must be admitted that he is at times provocative, even arrogant, both in his style and in his assertions, but there is a freshness and vigour which cannot be ignored. The trend his work is taking will, however, prove of inestimable value in bringing the literature of the colonies before England, and for that service alone he deserves thanks.

Indication of the power to assimilate local colour is amply shown in "Waif's Progress," the first novel of Isabel Maud Peacocke, known hitherto as the author of most delightful kiddies' books. She has absorbed the "spirit of the place," and her book contains some excellent vignettes of people and character. She is thus typical of our present writers who aim at giving a series of clear-cut, well drawn impressions rather than to write with a certain impersonality and with rushing action—they are writers of the mind rather than of the body.

The fixed star in the literary firmament is Katherine Mansfield, the able exponent of the short sto:y. Fame came to her too overseas. But there is yet left a large number of writers who will demand attention. Our progress in this form of fiction is actually sounder and more solid than that across the Tasman Sea, where the trend is to polish less and give fuller, more obvious action. From the point of view of subject matter our short story might have been written within the purlieus of London or New York. It is an error to assume that we are bounded mentally by the broad belt of sea which washes our shores. In variety it is safe to say that our writers have explored all fields with a goodly measure of success. The style is brilliant with polish ; there is a more subtle appeal because of a certain keen psychology behind the work. It is modesty alone that does not display 'o a larger reading public the easy, skilful style where the mechanism and technique are more often of greater worth than the content. Strange though it may seem, the writers of this school display far less action than their confrères elsewhere ; they are content to study the emotions and their reactions rather than to give vivid, swiftly moving scenes so loved by certain writers. The truth of these opinions will be tested shortly when an "Anthology of New Zealand Short Stories" is published by Messrs. Dent. Our essayists are few. The press represents to a considerable extent the scope for such writers, and as a direct result the newspaper columns are of true literary merit. Dr. Rutherford Waddell has given us from these sources some ten booklets, lofty in style and established in popularity. Outstanding as an essayist is Charles Wilson, whose "Rambles in Bookland" and "New Rambles in Bookland" won instant recognition and appreciation. They represent the high-water mark in their kind, for he has the mature mind, able to criticise, withal to temper his criticism with considered praise. He writes of "Master Novelists" with the same facility as he discourses on types of books.

Portrait by Nellie F. Ferner, Auckland. Miss Isabel Maud Peacocke, whose "Tatters" and other books for young readers are published by Messrs. Ward, Lock.

"Home," by Alan Mulgan, the playwright and poet, is destined to live beyond our time. These impressions of England, as a colonial sees it, rank him as an essayist worthy to keep company with Guedalla and G. K. C. Containing more than mere sentiment, these essays reveal a sincerity and much of the artist. Bolitho's classification of Mulgan as "as good as the second average in England" must be discredited when it is remembered that J. C. Squire saw fit to write the preface to this book (published by Longmans), and the press hailed it with delight. Mulgan's consummate skill will influence those who enter the field of belles-lettres, for his scholarly articles in the press are models of style.

There remain two women who have made a mark in this field and who cannot be ignored. Isabel Maud Peacocke has long been recognised as our premier essayist among women. Her work will stand closely critical examination ; there is an attention to detail and some pretension to a style not generally seen in the newspaper world. Her contemporary, Elsie K. Morton, has published her articles in a volume, "Along the Road." They are excellent descriptive work, showing an eye for beauty and sureness of touch, while a gentle philosophy tinctures the whole.

This purview of the literary field will, I think, show that our women have done and will continue to do much to mould form. The production of fine literature demands not only thought and imagination, but a meticulous care in choice of phrase ; it needs the analytic mind in which detail and exactness of expression are properly weighed. All these are attributes of the mentality of women and (our society as yet having no leisured class), it has fallen to them, even more than to men, to bui'd up our literature. Of the thirty-one authors represented in Messrs. Dent's forthcoming book of "New Zealand Short Stories" thirteen are women, and though Katherine Mansfield remains chief among them, there are stories by Winifred Tennant, Esther Glenn, Helena Henderson, Nora McAuliffe, Lucie Wynne, and others that would give distinction to any anthology of this kind that even the old country could produce. The contributors of the other sex include Arthur H. Adams, B, E. Baughan, Sir George Grey, Pat Lawler, and Will Lawson, and the general level of these stories is remarkably high. Year by year there is an ever increasing number of graduates of potential genius leaving our universities. The contacts of that life of learning, of culture, must be reflected in a broader vision, a more scholarly outlook, which shall in due season enrich the literature of New Zealand, and give it beauty and splendour as well as its own distinctive character.

Mr. Hector Bolitho.

THE ELDERS, OURSELVES, AND OUR CRITICS.

By William Gerhardi.

CRITICISM is among the most satisfying activities in life. It enables, among other things, an inferior to look down upon his superior. The range of criticism is indeed unlimited. The critic, if he so chooses, can inquire into the private life of the author under examination in order to substantiate a theory: this, he may point out, argues an early frustration; that, some potent humiliation; this is the consequence of sexual excesses in middle life; that, of some secret inhibition. The critic, while he metes out punishment for an author's literary failings, can exhort him to turn a new leaf morally. "Drop the gin, my boy," he says, in so many other words, in the obscure and decorous language of criticism.

The lot of a great artist is truly terrible. While he lives, his life is deduced from his works. When he dies the procedure is reversed, and his works are illuminated by an unsparing inquiry into the life he has led. And all the time the critic, a self-appointed little god, sits in judgment of him. The corpse of a giant like Goethe or Beethoven has fattened many a critical worm.

By a curious paradox, all writers, professors, scholars, students of literature, bookish persons who have a general interest in, a universal love for, books are the hangers-on of literature; while the great masters who hate most books which differ from the kind which they are passionately eager to impose upon the world, bad judges, blind judges, propelled by a sense of beauty so strong that they are unwilling to be deflected from their course, are the life and spirit of literature, but for whom the others would have no plausible justification for pursuing their vocation. A professor's opinion, according to Tchehov, was that not Shakespeare but the commentaries on Shakespeare were the thing. And I remember how my tutor at Oxford, whose subject was English literature, inquired one morning of his pupils what they intended to do when they went down, and being told that, like himself, they intended to teach other men literature, looked really shocked: as if he though they were not making proper use of his instruction.

Now, though it is true that great artists, by virtue of the fact that their heart is in their work, are more prejudiced judges than intellectually leisured consumers and tasters, it is nevertheless true that the opinions of those who can themselves do something are alone interesting. What Goethe said about Byron; Tolstoy about Tchehov; Byron about Wordsworth or Keats is, in the enlightened opinion of posterity, more than a little unsound. But it is interesting. It is more interesting than what even the ablest of professional critics might say, though his estimate is likely to be nearer to that of the future, when, however, to discover his writings among a pile of forgotten criticism will be one of those obscure curiosities indulged in by students incurious of contemporary realities. What happens is this: the opinions of mere critics may survive as they approach the opinions of another thousand of their tribe, all of whose names do not survive their opinions. But Tolstoy's absurd opinion of Shakespeare would have perished but for Tolstoy, who survived to rescue an opinion in itself not immortal.

It is a common complaint of critics that contemporary literature is in a bad way. But do they realise that critics of every age have made the same complaint? Goethe had been writing thirty years when Wieland, an older man, complained that German literature was in a bad way. The same was written at the time of Pushkin and Gogol. It only proves, I think, that criticism is chronically in a bad way.

The function of criticism is to discover new facets in a work of art, of which the author himself is but dimly conscious. A discovery which, when it is brought to his notice, makes him say: "And that's true too." It must be admitted, however, that controversial and intellectual literature, such as that of Swift or Shaw, does not offer such opportunities to the critic. The tradition of Butler and Shaw, which mistakenly identified sociology with profundity and utilitarian economy with natural grace, is, however, beginning to wear a little thin.

Close on Mr. Shaw's heels came Mr. Wells, the most richly endowed of that generation but intimidated by the utilitarian example of the other. Which in Mr. Wells is double the pity. It was natural for Mr. Shaw to disdain art for art's sake, since his art was a whip which he could not reasonably flourish for its own sake. Mr. Wells was different. Here was a rich, human, essentially poetic nature, simple, profound, humorous. But he chose to force it, harness it for social service. With paradoxical results. His hasty temper would get away with him while he was proving his point and by exposing his bias defeat his own end and all but ruin the general artistic effect of a novel. On the other hand, such felicities, beauties and profundities as emerged inadvertently, while Mr. Wells was not looking, would not only save his books but would prove of greater sociological value than his more conscious attempts in that direction.

And this is the double justification of authentic literature: that while giving pleasure it cures. Gogol and Dickens, at their artistic best, accomplished more for social reform than all the social reformers of their time put together. Genuine literature resents conscious intimidation, and unless a poet is sincerely one-sided (like Kipling) he fails at being a poet at all. The great poet is concerned with one thing and one thing alone: the mystery which envelops the human soul into whose caverns he descends unconsciously, noting the strange things he finds there. "And," says Proust, "around such truths reached in oneself there will always float an atmosphere of poetry, the softness of a mystery which is but the vestige of the penumbra we must have traversed, an indication, marked exactly as by an altimeter, of the profundity of a work."

The quotation is a piece of poetic criticism. It is poetry in a sentence designed to define poetry. It gives us the feeling which he wishes such methods might yield. "For," he explains, "such profundity is not inherent in the subject, as some materialistically spiritual novelists imagine who are unable to penetrate beneath a world of appearances and whose high-minded intentions, like those virtuous tirades one is accustomed to hear from people who are themselves incapable of the smallest effort of kindness, must not blind us to the truth that they have not the strength of spirit even to rid themselves of the banalities of a form acquired by imitation."

Schiller, while writing talented poetry, was urged by high-minded philosopher to bear in mind philosophical and sociological considerations, the claims of the Absolute and the needs of mankind. Feeling that such intrusion of the conscious would spoil the quality of his poetry, he wrote to Goethe desiring the great man's opinion on this question. And this is what the great man wrote in answer, confirming, so to speak, Proust's view a hundred years before Proust arrived at it: "The art of literature requires from its practitioner a naïve, easygoing attitude confined to, and in love with, the things of this world, beneath which the Absolute lies concealed. Demands from on high destroy this naïve and fecund state of mind and pass off for literature something which, once and for all, is not literature."

It is indeed hard even for a born poet to keep to literature, for there is a curious blight on all creative activity: a tendency to dream rather than do. Though he feels it is his one means of being equal to himself, a writer involuntarily postpones his real work, clutching at every irrelevant task but his own (his own being, according to Proust, to decipher the inner book). "Every outward event," says Proust, "whether the Dreyfus Case or the War, has furnished writers with an excuse for not deciphering that book; they had wished to ensure the triumph of right, to refashion the moral unity of the nation, and had no time to think of literature. But these were nothing but excuses, for they had no genius, or not enough of it; that is to say, no instinct. For it is instinct which dictates the true task, while the intelligence supplies the pretext for eluding it. But no excuse avails in art; good intentions count for nothing. At all times the artist must obey his instinct; which explains why art is of all things the most real, the most austere school of life, and the true Last Judgment."

And now having fortified literature as literature against assaults from writers with an arrière pensée, let us inquire historically and sympathetically into the causes of this failing in our immediate predecessors. Mr. Wells flowered at a bad time, being caught in the reaction against what then was mistakenly believed to be "Art for art's sake." Now for any normal healthy artist, devoid of political ambition, it would be difficult to conceive for what other sake but that of the art in which he finds his happiest expression he should write, paint, build, sculpt, or compose (and if he aspired to sell his commodities to sell them on the best available terms that did not, in spite of Mr. Bennett's cherished notion, make him primarily a merchant). But the men who took the name of art in vain—Stevenson and Wilde and Pater and George Moore—indulged in something so superficial that there would have been no visible art about their performances did they not take a proper pride in polishing their surfaces, since they had no depths to descend to. This strenuous floor polishing, an infinite capacity for taking pains to make their surfaces as shiny and slippery as possible, they called "style." And since one kind of varnish is so like another and will suit any flooring, they would take a side glance, learn the trick from a neighbour, imitate, compare—which they called "playing the sedulous ape." Had there been any depth in them, any real value, they would have known that there is but one thing an original artist can have in common with another—originality. They would have known that style is the leaves of the tree. No tree, no leaves. A writer's style is the measure of his personality, and cannot be acquired consciously. It shows unmistakably what you are: gives you away for what you are. Mr. Churchill's style, for example, full of bombast and armageddons is a platform style which, when you read it in a book, makes you smile. Lord Birkenhead's style, so agreeable and effective when listened to at a public meeting, shows up pitilessly the stuff he is made of when examined in an article. Only a great comprehensive spirit will produce a great comprehensive style. No ornament from outside will hide a man's nakedness. After Shakespeare, after Goethe, Tolstoy, Tchehov, Proust, this is obvious. But it must have been less obvious when Mr. Wells, who wanted to shake up England, stir up the world, was requested to lower his voice in the temple of art so as not to disturb the floor polishers, and he gazed down on them, a little awed, a little amazed, on the men who would not look up because their devotion to art was so great that they must remain on their knees, polishing, polishing, till the style of their piece of parquet outshone that of other competitors. And that astute, competent man, Arnold Bennett, also looked, and I dare say it was one of the many " things that have interested him." To such early intimidation by the stylists we must ascribe Mr. Bennett's exaggerated admiration for Mr. Shaw's " English prose style " as a thing-in-itself, and Mr. Bennett's frequent assertions that so-and-so either can or cannot " write English "—as if there were a certain way of writing English. Mr. Wells, who more often than not is inclined to praise a novel on sociological grounds for the " waste " or " incompetence " in certain quarters which the author (all but unaware of it himself) is assumed to be exposing, nevertheless has his queer literary moments, as when, in the course of attacking Mr. Shaw's irresponsibility in the columns of the Sunday Express, he has a word of praise for the beauty of Mr. Shaw's English prose style : " I know enough of it to know how well Shaw does it " (or similar words), as if there were a definite, special way of doing it suited to everyone. This from the most gifted writer of the day. Mr. Bennett, who has a rich nature of nicely balanced qualities, reflects a smiling style flexible with tolerance, tenderness and gentle humour, only spoilt by a sort of perky knowingness, but redeemed again to some extent by the kind of irony which insists on the dire seriousness of these remarks of his while also laughing at himself or any man who would speak thus seriously. Whereas Mr. Shaw's nature expresses itself in more or less good humoured invective confined to showing up persons who are more fools than knaves. His style, limited to the purpose, is a cold, rigid, colourless, strait-laced, but a persistent, long-armed style which reaches out and gets the culprit by the throat.

Enough, then, of style ! It is the nature of the man which is his style. The more facets he has to his personality, the more facets there will be to his style. But there are innocents who when they say " So-and-so cannot write English " mean that he is apt to make slips in grammar. I have heard two distinguished novelists say this of each other, each unaware of what the other had said of him. There are at least three replies to make to such a charge. Ask the ass who makes it to correct your grammar for you ; it is probably his strongest point. Further, grammar has been made for writers ; not writers for grammar. By all means break it, when it proves inconvenient. Goethe, in his old age, confessed that had he been able to start all over again he would have paid no heed to grammar, but would have concentrated on the most vivid and flexible expression possible. And it may be a comfort to writers accused of bad grammar to know that they are in good company. Among those accused by the critics of their day of faulty syntax are Goethe (who, with Luther, is the founder of modern German), Pushkin (the founder of modern Russian), Gogol, Tolstoy, Tchehov, Gerhart Hauptmann, Proust, Conrad. None of them apparently could write German, Russian, French, or English. They are read all the same ; but where is the irreproachable prose of their critics ? We can barely remember their names.

But literature, whatever some readers may think, has not ended with Mr. Galsworthy's " Swan Song." The untimely death of Katherine Mansfield, who had such an eye for the vivid, the living, the humorous, the essential in life, real simplicity and a deep feeling for the universal current which feeds the individual, expressed with a sensitive, a beautiful economy of language—her death, at the age of thirty-three, is an irreparable loss to literature. But no one who reads, for instance, Mr. Hugh Kingsmill's " The Return of William Shakespeare " (recently published by Duckworth) need mourn the past when our own generation yields fruit like Mr. Kingsmill's.

The Germans use the word " Dichter " to distinguish an imaginative writer of prose whose imagination is of a quality to engage the forces of the soul and who is thereby lifted to the rank of poet—a term formerly confined to writers of verse. I wish somebody—Mr. Bennett understands this best—would popularise the use of the word " poet " to designate the poetic quality in English prose writers, as a substitute for the unpalatable " creative writer," " literary artist," and so forth. It would help distinguish authentic literature from so much which is merely controversial and intellectual.

NEW ZEALAND FICTION.*

New Zealand is turning out a type of fiction all its own, and good robust fiction it is, full of the atmosphere of wide spaces, soaring mountains, galloping horses, courageous women and strong, hard-working men. Mr. Walter Smyth's " Bonzer Jones " is the story of a girl whose father dies, leaving her an impoverished sheep-station. A syndicate is trying to get the land, a man in the township of Henderson wants it for himself, and the girl is surrounded with enemies when a stranger, sent by her uncle, comes to her rescue. Her conflicts with this man, who is fighting her battles and whom secretly she loves, make a first class romance. " The Girl from Mason Creek " is also an open-air novel, brimming with adventure. But Miss Elizabeth Milton, another New Zealand novelist, whose " Love and Chiffon " has met with such success, writes more in the sentimental vein, and her new book, " Wandring Wood," shows how a girl from the Bush came to London and was stranded there all alone—inexperienced in the ways of a big city, a prey to its many dangers. Her own wisdom and pluck brought her safely through, however, and " Wandring Wood " should please those readers who enjoyed the author's earlier work.

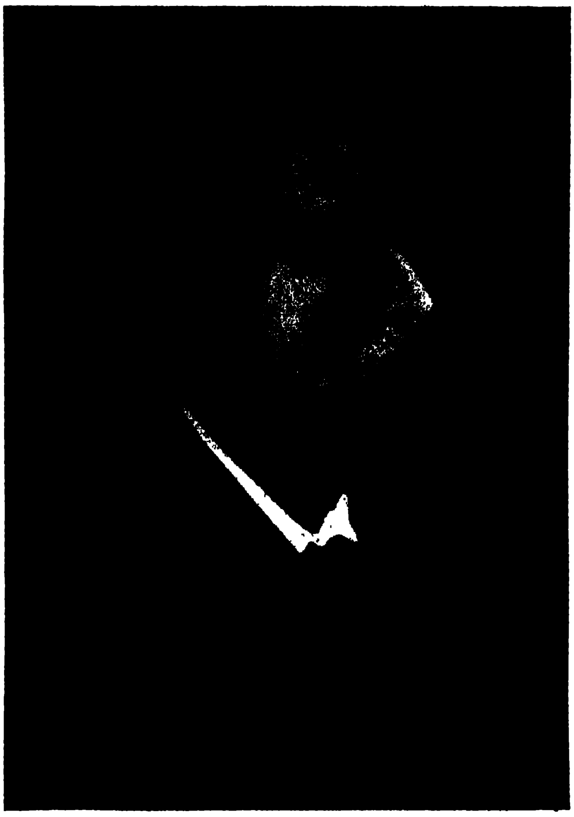
ISLE OF ILLUSION.



By George Gibbs. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

For writers and readers alike the lure of the uninhabited island and the cast-up lovers remains as powerful as ever. In his " Isle of Illusion " Mr. Gibbs gives the idea a decidedly novel twist and springs an ingeniously dramatic development upon us. Phil and Rita are both victims of an overwhelming Mississippi flood which flings them ultimately on to a hillock containing a deserted clapboard house. In these strange surroundings their love romance grows apace until at the moment of rescue Rita learns that Phil is the man who has imputed forgery to her late father, and is trying to filch his lands. Mystery and romance are deftly interwoven in the ensuing story.

LAFCADIO HEARN.*

BY EDMUND BLUNDEN.

THE Japanese are grateful to the memory of Lafcadio Hearn, not because he was a perfect professor or a consistent friend of individuals, but because he produced more and better books on Japan than most sojourners have done. It is many years since he died (the twenty-fifth anniversary is just past) and he has become almost legendary. Whether young Japan will enlarge the legend I do not know; I did not notice that it was being assiduously cultivated by the average student with his eagerness for new heroes and books. Meanwhile, Professor Ichikawa, of the Imperial University, Tokio, a master of the art of book-collecting, is forming a Hearn library as a memorial in the scene of his chief professorship, and besides has edited, with his characteristic minuteness of research, some unpublished writings by Hearn. The volume which he now sends out contains not unpublished writings but what were almost as closely concealed—articles from the New Orleans Item and Times-Democrat, of 1878 and following years. There is a sense in Japan, I fancy, that England does not esteem Hearn as highly as he deserves, and the endeavour to do him honour is the keener on that account.

Lafcadio Hearn.

One thing about Hearn is certain. He was capable of hard work. The occasional sickliness of his taste did not prevent him from persistent industry. Whole masses of lectures, cleverly taken down from his dictation, have been and are to be published in Japan. His second son, Mr. Inagaki—there is a photograph of him in Miss Bisland's "Life and Letters of Lafcadio Hearn" (1906)—who teaches English himself, has edited a series on Shakespeare, given in 1899. Hearn came early into his field, and his friendly, fluent method was valuable. The main point was the human interest of a literature so far away, in several points, from the youth of Japan, and he did not lose sight of it. He was able to drop in at intervals a hint from Japanese life or literature, well calculated to make his hearers more at home. Sometimes his explanations are garrulous without much else, as when he interprets the notion that Shakespeare's father sold gloves: "You may ask perhaps what people in a country place could want with gloves. Very probably there were gentry in the neighbourhood who might have needed gloves of a stylish sort; but it is likely that most of the gloves were leather, and archers' gloves may have been part of the stock-in-trade. But this is theory." He generalises: "The playwrights before Shakespeare nearly all wrote immoral or brutal plays. The dramatists after Shakespeare cannot be called, with few exceptions, moral dramatists at all."

The disadvantages of Hearn's wandering life and perplexed temperament are apparent in his writings on English literature. He worked with incomplete information. It is the fate of all of us, but Hearn particularly had small chance of reading steadily and widely before making a statement. He accepted what he thought "a working knowledge," and the effect is seen in hasty paraphrases of erratic "literary history." In that, Japanese scholars of English literature have often followed him, and his guidance has led astray. The intense and charming reliance which the pupil in Tokio places on his teacher, when he has once convinced himself that the teacher is in earnest, has that danger in it. Here again the new generation may have a new habit of mind. There are those in Japan who have not only the cordiality of approach which Hearn so notably laboured to communicate, but a strong wish to master the whole of a subject; those who have looked into Marlowe and Peele, and could explain what gloves are used for in English hedgerows and gardens. If Hearn were to lecture to-day and refer to "Shakespeare's ordinary work—a work teeming with faults, faults of a hundred kinds, faults such as no Victorian poet would dare to make," he would be buttonholed as he walked between the gingko trees by a couple of students inquiring what "faults" were meant, and what laws of art Shakespeare finally breaks.

It may have been a little hard to persuade Hearn, once outside his class-room, to give these further enlightenments. Behind the legend there still exists the biographic recollection of a doleful little man, preferring to pace up and down in the rain rather than enter the restaurant of the professors, noisy with conversation and laughter.

Among the American writings of Hearn sent over to Japan by Professor Mordell and accompanied by his introductory essay and Professor Ichikawa's preface, a review of "Leaves of Grass" may be mentioned. It is Lafcadio in wrath. "Mr. Whitman's Muse is at once indecent and ugly, lascivious and gawky, lubricous and coarse."* I hardly like to run the risk of shocking the pious shade (for THE BOOKMAN is to be seen in the room of his old English Department at Tokio), but I will whisper it: one of my students possessed a copy of "Ulysses," and thought Mr. James Joyce an eminent author! And Whitman was the sort of subject that the most rural student would choose for his thesis.

But you never know where to have Hearn. Despite his counterblast to "Leaves of Grass" you find him in a letter of 1883 saying: "I have always secretly admired Whitman," and blaming the newspaper proprietors for his secrecy, which took so odd a form.

The Hokuseido Press issues these volumes of Hearn, I understand, without the usual motive for publishing—a profit; in honour of him rather, and towards the completion of a general idea of his works. They are evidences of the progress of Japanese book-production on Western lines; the printing, with its American characteristics, is sound, and in Professor Ichikawa's volume especially it is handsome. Few misprints have been allowed to slip by. One trouble exists at present in respect of books in English published in Japan. They cannot easily be procured here, and letters to Japanese booksellers do not always make the desired contact. An effective agency is required; for there appear from time to time in Tokio books, such as those noticed now, likely to be required in English libraries.

VIRGINIA WOOLF.*

By R. ELLIS ROBERTS.

THERE are few things in criticism which puzzle me more than the demands that novelists who are women should respect the limitations of their sex. The advice seems to me strictly meaningless; and yet like so much nonsense difficult to rebut with precision and propriety. It is either a platitude or an impertinence. It may mean that a woman novelist had better keep within the range of her own experience, fancy and imagination—that is, had better do what a novelist who is a man will be advised to do; or it means that women are by nature less fitted to generalise from their personal experience than are men, that therefore they had better remember their inferiority, or, by Gad, sir, we'll stop reading them. It would, of course, be foolish to deny that women, as men, have the limitations ot their sex; it would be foolish to deny that women are less given to philosophic generalisation than are men: but there is no evidence that this failure—if it is a failure and not a quality—is due specifically to the fact of their feminity. And if we are to stress thus ridiculously the physical facts of an artist, it must be obvious that women will always have a greater range of intensity than men, for no man can have a physical experience comparable to child-bearing. "But," argue the anti-feminists, "no woman can draw a man; no woman can do this or the other." Investigated, this charge generally dies down to the fact that a great many men, including this speaker, do not like women's novels; the mere fact of their disapproval has obviously no critical value. It is a mere admission of the critic's that he is so ridden by sex-prejudice that he cannot conceive it as possible that, to take an extreme instance, Charlotte Brontë's Rochester is no more essentially ridiculous than Thackeray's Amelia. There is no reason in nature why Jane Eyre's ideal strong man is any sillier, any falser than the ideal dewy, rosy girl of hundreds of men novelists. A man may disapprove of a rhinoceros, but his sternest disapprobation will fail to make the beast a myth. At the moment the anti-feminist will be well advised to drop this particular demand; for if he persists he will not unfairly be liable to the accusation that his attitude is one of masculine envy, for of modern English novelists, if one named the first dozen, not a small proportion would be women.

Of these certainly one would be Mrs. Woolf. Her position is unchallengeable, and at the outset it should be said that no man novelist of her generation has so succeeded in uniting the claims of tradition with the need for experiment. Her first novel, published fourteen years ago, showed this distinctly. She had not in "The Voyage Out" found her medium; the tradition is accepted a little too deliberately, the experiment has at moments the air of being made for its own sake; but the book showed, and was commonly admitted to show, that we had in Mrs. Woolf a novelist who was as sensitive to the demands of her form as she was exigent about the content of her story. For Mrs. Woolf always has a story to tell. For the essence of a story is suspense; and I know few modern books which give one a greater sensation of suspense than "Mrs. Dalloway," "Jacob's Room" and "To the Lighthouse." Of course suspense may be caused by very different things. We get dulled, if we live in cities, to the daily suspense of the traffic; and the most magnificent omnibuses may pass us, and we get nothing but a sensation of noise or annoyance. I suppose those of us who lived in London from 1914 to 1918 knew no suspense, outside the world of the imagination, like the suspense of the air-raids. Where would the bombs fall? Would any airplanes be hit? Would our men crash? And the answer—sometimes a great, hideous noise almost beside us, sometimes a falling flame in the distant sky, was greeted with the shock of suspense relieved. There is something in Mrs. Woolf's work of the celerity and the remoteness of an air-raid. We do not always see whence the stroke comes, how her suspenses are resolved and her surprises effected. There is an admirable example of the aeroplane resolution of suspense in "The Voyage Out." Mr. and Mrs. Dalloway, people who are public personages and so escape self-examination by continuous self-exposure, have come on to the boat where are Mr. and Mrs. Ambrose, Pepper and Rachel, Helen Ambrose's niece; there has been enforced juxtaposition, and the storm, and then the Dalloways leave the ship. On the night before they disembark Richard Dalloway kisses Rachel, and we are left, disturbed, wondering; and the problem is resolved in the liveliest way by the conversation of Rachel and Helen next day. Suddenly and with an exquisite swoop the book, which is a history of people's souls, is advanced, amazingly advanced on its way; and we learn to know Rachel better, and Helen better just as we should if we were travelling with them. Helen, with her imaginative realism, treats and enlightens Rachel's distress and romanticism. And with what exquisite humour and tact is the final word uttered: Helen's

Mrs. Virginia Woolf.

"conclusion was that she would very much like to show her niece, if it were possible, how to live, or as she put it, how to be a reasonable person. She thought that there must be something wrong in this confusion between politics and kissing politicians, and that an elder person ought to be able to help. 'I quite agree,' she said, 'that people are very interesting; only— —' Rachel, putting her finger between the pages, looked up inquiringly. 'Only I think you ought to discriminate,' she ended. 'It's a pity to be intimate with people who are— well, rather second-rate, like the Dalloways, and to find it out later.' 'But how does one know?' Rachel asked. 'I really can't tell you,' replied Helen cordially, after a moment's thought. 'You'll have to find out for yourself. . . . D'you think me very unsympathetic?' Rachel reviewed the points which Helen had certainly failed to understand; they arose chiefly from the difference of nearly thirty years in age between them, which made Mrs. Ambrose appear too humorous and cool in a matter of such moment. 'No,' she said, 'some things you don't understand, of course.' 'Of course,' Helen agreed. 'So now you can go ahead and be a person on your own account.' The vision of her own personality, of herself as a real everlasting thing, different from anything else, unmergeable, like the sea or the wind, flashed into Rachel's mind, and she became profoundly excited at the thought of living."

"The confusion between politics and kissing politicians"—there at its plainest you have the point on which the anti-feminists rage. They enjoy and profit by that confusion, in its infinite variation and complexity. "He for God only, she for God in him," is their real creed, the creed which Christ and St. Paul denied, the creed which is so strong that it still gets heart-allegiance from Christians. Of course it is true that a man could not have written Mrs. Woolf's books - but would he not be proud if he could!

This new uniform edition is to consist of at least eight volumes; I hope we shall soon have another volume of criticism from her, and perhaps one volume might include "Mr. Bennett and Mrs. Brown" and "A Room of Her Own."

PULLING STRINGS IN CHINA.

By WM. F. TYLER. 15s. (Constable.)

Few men who have qualified in our Navy in early days and gone on to help a foreign Power like China have retained the sense of adventure, and a true faculty of expression. Mr. Tyler, after serving in the China revenue fleet under the late Sir Robert Hart, joined its Navy, then its Customs Marine Department, and wound up as an adviser to the Chinese Government. He has much of interest to tell concerning the country's collapse in the war with Japan, especially the battle of the Yalu River, the siege of Wei-hai-Wei, and the Boxer rebellion. He follows these first-hand experiences up with valuable accounts of the Chinese revenue system which has caused so much trouble in the past, but may prove a steadying influence once more for putting this unhappy land on its feet again. But for the general reader, the book will prove absorbing because of Mr. Tyler's appreciation of the human element throughout; and the many astonishing episodes he gives us from real life show what a knack he has of seeing drama in unexpected ways.

MR. CROFTS, THE KING'S BASTARD.

By LEWIS MELVILLE. With 23 illustrations and a map. 18s. (Hutchinson.)

One of the earliest mistresses of Charles II was Lucy Walter, a handsome young Welshwoman whose easy morality had led her to Holland, then the hiding-place of the royal house of Great Britain. The son born of the union was acknowledged by Charles, who, in rather a haphazard way, afforded him patronage and protection throughout the remainder of his life. Thus arrived on the scene the subject of Mr. Lewis Melville's latest historical study. Better known as James, Duke of Monmouth, he is a figure gallant enough to outward seeming, but an unlucky man—and a singularly unsuitable champion of Protestantism. Mr. Melville's story of his life is carefully compiled and is written with the readableness that the public has come to expect from him. The pathetic failure of the rising in the west has been well handled, in a couple of chapters presenting the military point of view, by Major Reginald Hargreaves, M.C. Here is an excellently produced volume that should appeal as much to the curious general reader as to the historical student.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

FEBRUARY, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 14th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the seven Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

That they may be available also to Overseas Competitors, Competitions I and II will be the same each month until further notice, but the subjects for all the other Competitions may each month be changed.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS.: the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best Limerick beginning: When the wind blows in March, the March hare . . .

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best sentence of not more than two hundred words into which the largest number of book-titles mentioned in this issue is intelligibly introduced.

V.—HALF A GUINEA for the best enigma on any letter of the alphabet after the manner of Catherine Fanshawe's famous enigma on the letter H: "'Twas whispered in Heaven, 'twas muttered in Hell," etc.

VI.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author and Publisher at head of each review.

VII.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

RESULTS OF COMPETIONS FOR JANUARY.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to Eadgyth Sowter, Hill View, Banbury Road, Stratford-on-Avon, Warwickshire, for the following:

SECRET BEAUTY.

Hugging this secret beauty to my heart
I walk in joy;
The mortal fret is banished far apart
No longer to annoy;
And trumpet calls from height to height are hurled
Across the shrinking darkness of the world.

Oh but to stay and dwell a little space
With such content.
Never to lose the land of light and grace
In frequent banishment,
Ever to feel the flame of beauty burn
And never, never, never to return!

Yes, for our beauty's hidden, day by day,
Too shy, too rare,
In gentle words we think and cannot say,
In dreams we cannot share:
And we must walk our several ways apart
And keep the secret beauty in the heart.

"A DAY."

Thank You, God,
For a day to remember
All my life—
A day in September.

For the hills,
And the haze,
And the smell of the sea,
And the air
And the way it has with me.

For white sails on the sea,
And white clouds on the sky—
For a day to remember
Till I die.

(Jenny Pollock, Carlisle Road, Londonderry.)

"IT'S AN ILL WIND . . ."

My love is coming! Oh, how sweet,
How bright she looks to-day!
My love is coming down the street
To meet me on the way!

Blow, blow, cold wind: your freezing powers
Still have some saving grace—
Your breath, that is the death of flowers,
Brings roses to her face!

(John Bellchambers, 40, Highgate Hill.)

SEA MEMORIES.

When only memory remains, O Sea,
I shall remember your great murmuring;
Recall your restless, boundless, energy,
The perfect rhythm of your symphony.

In fancy see your tremulous breast aglow
As though a host of jewels glittered there,
Emerald and Sapphire playing hide-and-seek,
Diamonds imprisoned in your ebb and flow.

When you lay flushed in sunset's deepest rose
A shimmering pathway to the molten sky,
The grandeur of your fleeting splendour,
I shall remember, at each day's swift close.

(Mary Burry, 9, West Road, Clapham Park, S.W.4.)

A PRAYER IN BEHALF OF ALL MINOR POETS.

(By One of Them,)

Lord keep us from the littleness
That blights another's small success.
If our poor friend should write a song
Let us not carp: "That line's too long";
Or: "Why not finish with a rhyme
The third line there which ends in 'time'?"
Let us remember always, please,
This life holds very little ease;

Nor let us ever try to spoil
The small result of so much toil.
And oh, let us remember, too,
Whatever else we may not do,
That only the completely wise
Have any right to criticise.

(Winifred M. Heath, 1005, West Sixth Street, Los Angeles, California.)

We also highly commend the lyrics by J. Kilmeny Keith (Ealing), Melfin W. Jones (Cardiff), Liam P. Clancy (London, N.W.), Madeline S. Baker (Bath), Constance Maunsell (Dublin), Vera I. III.—The Prize of Three Books for the best twelve lines of humorous verse written to the given rhymed endings is awarded to Margaret Owen, Cherryoak, Whitstable, for the following:

MISS JOHNSON IS FRIGHTENED.

At darkest hour of witching night
From her warm bed uprising,
Alarmed by something flashing, bright,
And noises most surprising,

Miss Johnson searched her house in vain,
'Twas empty. What a blessing!
Yet cats outside, like souls in pain,
Are yowling. How depressing!

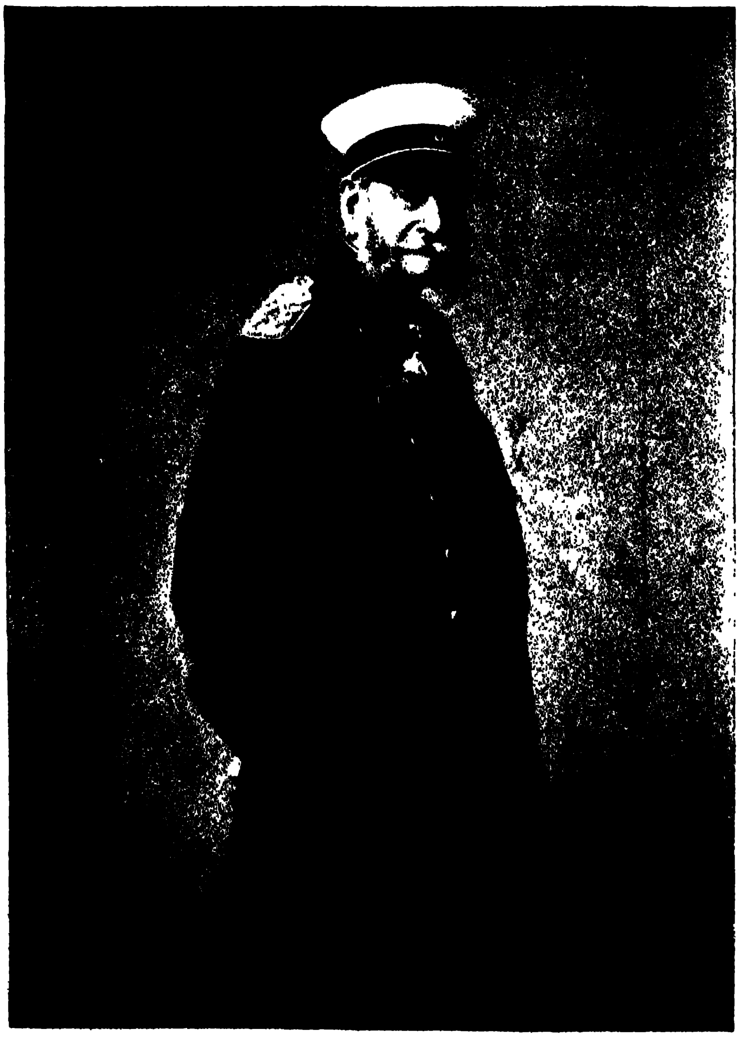
Ferdinand Magellan.
From the engraving by Crispin Van de Passe.
From "Ferdinand Magellan." By E. F. Benson (John Lane).

She peers out at the lonely street,
Oh, Heavens! An obese man
Is at her gate. Her heart doth beat.
Ah! 'Tis but a policeman.

Miss Johnson hears a clock strike one,
A cock crows. Oh, how splendid!
Another dawning has begun,
The darksome night is ended.

We also select for printing:

ELIXIR.



Just take one pellet late at night,
And one on your uprising,
'Twill give you vigour, health and sight,
Results will be surprising.

Your purchase will not be in vain,
But prove to be a blessing.
'Twill take away the slightest pain
And woes the most depressing.

The man and woman in the street
(Especially the obese man),
The man whose heart has ceased to beat,
The M.P., cook, and policeman;

Come along all! Just try but one,
You'll vote that they are splendid;
Rejuvenation once begun,
Continues till they're ended.

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best appreciation of any novel published last year that has not been sufficiently appreciated, is awarded to J. Kilmeny Keith, 64, Gordon Road, W.5, for the following:

THE DISINHERITED. BY MILTON WALDEMAN.
(Longmans.)

In the welter of novels dealing with sexual reactions and repercussions, it is perhaps not surprising that this notable book has escaped a good deal of the reputation it merits. It deals with the straining of a successful business man after an ideal hitherto unglimpsed and even undesired. The sudden illness of his son, and its possible fatal culmination, brings Walter Michaelson, the flourishing American lawyer, face to face with an urgent need for something more enduring than material satisfaction. He finds his answer in the Jewish faith of his ancestors, and, like all true explorers, sells all he has—wife, name, success, family—to purchase the field containing the treasure. We bid him farewell with his face turned steadfastly towards that city which is the national source and ultimate horizon of his race.

We also select for printing:

DEWER RIDES. BY L. A. G. STRONG.

This first novel, which was published last June, seems, in spite of its fine qualities, to have attracted little attention The title is taken from a Dartmoor legend of the Demon Hunter of Souls of the moor. This monster occasionally rides about with his devilish pack of hounds, and all who know the legend like to be safely indoors when he is abroad. Dick Brendon, the hero, is a queer mixture of weakness and strength, and after an unhappy love affair he degenerates in character, and dies hated by his neighbours. With remarkable skill the author has shown the power of race and of superstition upon the different characters. Rare, too, is it to read such a good description of a boxing match as that between Dick and a professional. The funeral of old Pellow reminds us of some of the best of Mary Webb's writing. "Dewer Rides" is a powerful theme powerfully treated, and the freshness of its conception places the book far above the average novel of to-day.

KITH AND KIN. BY EDWARD BOOTH.
(Duckworth.)

Fashions may alter, but elemental passions remain unchanged, and in this drama of jealousy Mr. Booth treats of a problem which has tormented mankind since the days of Cain and Abel. It is the age-old story of an Elder Son and a Younger Son, with the slanderous, rumour-rife tongues of villagers forming a Greek chorus. Rude and uncouth though the accents of these northern countrymen be, yet their speech, shorn of artificialities, is ripe with accumulated wisdom and ancestral saws. Into the mind of each of the brothers in turn do we look, suffering with him the slights, real or imagined, which he is called upon to endure, and striving with him for the favour of a sorely-perplexed sire. Most beautiful, amid these blinding mists of hate, shines out the mutual love of the Younger Son and his wife, whose union, at its outset haphazard and earthly, becomes so refined and spiritualised, by years of adversity shared, as to reach heights little short of sublime. To the trivial-minded, or to those who seek after sensations, this book will make little appeal; but to the discerning eye and the sympathetic heart it offers riches in abundance.

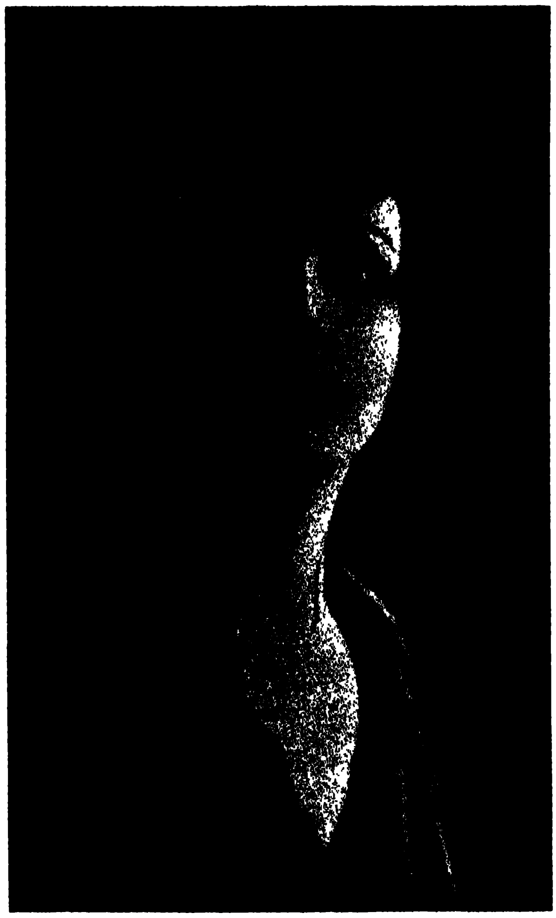
(Eileen Newton, Hildawell, Southend Gardens, Whitby, Yorks.)



Miss Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton) justly urges the claims of "Brittle Glory," by Wallace B. Nichols (Ward, Lock); Keith Baddeley (Chesham) of "Karl and Anna" (Peter Davies); John P. Coghlan (Dublin) of "Brothers and Sisters" by I. Compton-Burnett (Heath, Cranton); Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport) of "Crisis," by Claude Houghton (Thornton Butterworth); Miss J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), "The Sleeping Fury" by Martin Armstrong (Gollancz); Miss B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), "An Unvarnished History," by Gordon Daviot (Ernest Benn). Several competitors think that novels by several very popular authors, and of novels that have sold from 4,000 to 6,000, and one that has sold over 10,000 copies still have not been sufficiently noticed. We also specially commend the replies of May Belben (Wimborne), I. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), Dallas Kenmare (Barnet Green), Cyril R. Edgeley (Clapham), R. K. Spedding (Liverpool), H. Parker (Mitcham), Alice Newell (St. Albans), Marjorie Darrah (Prestwich), Fred W. Flear (Harpenden).

V. THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best reply to the question: "Need literature be 'literary' in order to be great?" is awarded to Emily Davis, 23, Mornington Road, Ranelagh, Dublin, for the following.

It might be argued that anything which has attained the rank of literature and greatness is, for that reason, literary. But, for the present purpose, it is assumed that "literary" means, in addition to lucidity, a scholarly, polished style of writing. What, then, is great literature? Written words in which live something of abiding human interest. And what gives the words their life? The deep feeling of the writer. Like an uncut diamond, the full beauty and worth of the work may be lost owing to the rough exterior; but no polishing will produce the lustre of the diamond unless the diamond is there. "The Pilgrim's Progress" is not "literary" in the usual acceptance of the word. It has been criticised, not only as crude both in manner and matter, but as inaccurate and inconsistent. Still, it survives as great literature, because it is the irrepressible voice of the struggling human soul. If Bunyan had waited to deliver his message until he had cultivated a style worthy of it, it is quite possible that the soul, which has made it immortal, would have been driven out in the process.

We also select for printing:

Some great books have been produced by men who neither possessed nor desired literary accomplishment, but felt it incumbent on them to make a record of events or experiences which appeared of supreme importance. Such a man was John Wesley: such events and experiences make his journal the unique production which it is.

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Miss Ursula Bloom, whose new novel, "The Passionate Heart," is published by Messrs. Hutchinson.

Wesley's sole object in writing the book was to preserve an unadorned statement of his daily work, and he had no wish to attract any readers who were not interested in that work. The story of his unceasing travels is so impressive, the episodes of that pilgrimage are so dramatic, so poignant, that his blunt simplicity is the ideal method for their presentation. Who can read unmoved the description of the lunatics at Kingswood, or the description of the serene, triumphant preacher, borne along by the mob at Wednesbury? Innumerable are the manifestations of that human heart to which he held so infallible a key. Not a page but reveals the man who lived, and spoke, and would gladly have died, to turn his hearers from the ways of evil and guide them to salvation and peace. This is surely Literature, however unliterary.

(G. Pitt, 86, Wyndham Crescent, N. 19.)

Many competitors name Bunyan's "The Pilgrim's Progress"; several suggest Dickens, others Marryat, "Alice in Wonderland," Dorothy Osborne's letters, O Henry, Defoe, Burns, Pepys, Mandeville, Henry Kingsley (to say nothing of others) and, rather surprisingly, the Bible, Shakespeare, Dr. Johnson, Hardy, and three or four novelists who are by some considered among the most distinguished of living literary artists. We specially commend the replies by E. Sweatman (Reading), B. A. Billing (Manchester), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), I Alun Jones (Quorn), M. E. Arthy (Esher), Ivy F. Sewell (Walthamstow), M. K. Whitfield (Cirencester), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), A. M. Lockley (Birmingham), Mrs. E. S. Elton (London, S.W.), May Belben (Wimborne), K. D. Paxton (Edinburgh).

VI.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best 100-word review is awarded to B. Noël Saxelby, Saxon House, Carlton Road, Whalley Range, Manchester, for the following:

CAPTAIN SCOTT. BY STEPHEN GWYNN.

(Bodley Head.)

This book increases both one's admiration for the leader of a great endeavour and one's understanding of how the fitness for that leadership was acquired. Scott was no tough, daredevil adventurer, but a sensitive, highly-strung man, who took his apparent weaknesses and by sheer will controlled and trained them to his service. He did not dash blindly into adventure: everything was highly organised, risks were calculated—and then deliberately taken. The final disaster was mainly due to the refusal of the leaders to abandon sick comrades—an end that will be remembered longer than a triumphant return.

MISS WELBY AT STEEN. BY ARCHIBALD MARSHALL.

(Collins.)

Almost it might be called "A Good Girl's Diary," for in this her secret journal the little governess, Ellen Welby, gives us not only an attractive picture of English country-house life at its best, but also an intimate portrait of her honest, clear-sighted self. So vividly does she depict the daily round at Steen that we see it with her eyes, and bask, as does she, in its beauty and friendliness. And if Miss Welby tends, occasionally, to emphasise her own virtues, she does so with such engaging candour that she is but endeared to us the more!

POACHER'S MOON. BY ALMEY ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

(Hodder & Stoughton.)

All that she wanted she had to have, and riding rough-shod over everyone, with a look of the suffering martyr on her face, Carlotta did her best to wreck the lives of everyone with whom she came in contact. When in addition to this masterpiece of a study in character, there occur those exquisite descriptions of the lovely Chiltern country, some of them well worth committing to memory, one realises the discovery of a novel extraordinary, and waits expectantly for more.

KENYA MOUNTAIN.

By E. A. T. DUTTON. Illustrated. 21s. (Jonathan Cape.)

We have Mr. Dutton's assurance that, outside the pages of the Royal Geographical Society's Journals, no previous work has been devoted exclusively to Mount Kenya which, when the attempt here described was made to reach its summit, had only been conquered once in previous history, and that by Sir Halford Mackinder thirty years ago. Briefly it may be said that the attempt made three years since by Mr. Dutton and his associates was unsuccessful in that its objective was not attained, the spoils of victory falling while the present volume was in preparation to three young Englishmen who succeeded where the author and his friends had failed. But as Mr. Hilaire Belloc testifies in a characteristically impassioned preface, Mr. Dutton writes so well that his chronicle of failure "reads better than a success; it makes one understand the heaviness of the task and the peculiar courage of the author in undertaking it." Certainly the narrative is very vivid, and the manner of its presentation framed on grandiose lines fully worthy of the subject. The genius loci of the peak, ofttimes referred to in the text and accepted without question by Mr. Belloc, along with a whole hierarchy of "gods below the earth also," will conceivably be gratified that the first and foremost published account of the mountain's mysteries and grandeurs should take a form so sumptuous as this large quarto, beautifully printed and produced, embellished with weighty appendices by scientific and other authorities of eminence, and illustrated with superb collotype reproductions of Mr. J. D. Melhuish's photographs.

THE LIFE OF SOLOMON.

By EDMOND FLEG. 12s. 6d. net. (Gollancz.)

A chorus of critical praise welcomed the English translation of M. Fleg's "Life of Moses." The present companion undertaking has been rendered by Miss Viola G. Garvin. She tells us that the new theme is "part history and part fable," while the previous work breathed the spirit of innumerable Talmudic legends. Both incorporate there and here from Biblical narratives; both are in the Biblical manner, or in that rather of old Jewish Midrashim. These characteristics are preserved in the present luminous version. M. Fleg, who is of the Jewish faith, knows the Solomon of legend, as well as of the Bible and of Jewish history, outside the sacred texts. His pages are rich in Oriental romance, in jewelled lights, in perfume and flame of thought. They are an extravaganza of magic and demonialty; the old Grimoires and Keys which pass under the name of Solomon are as faded moonlight and water before their fire of carbuncles and the reds and violets of their wines. But a golden thread of purpose draws all together into a unified whole. We see the king in his majesty of power and wisdom, in his pride and the fall of pride, in the days of evil bondage, when he "went from woman to woman, from debauch to debauch," even to the doom thereof, when a devil reigned in his stead and he himself knew beggary. But the repentance of Solomon followed, and the penitent returned to throne and palace. There came at long last his decreed day of death, when the prophet's spirit overshadowed him and he saw in a vision the invisible temple of an age unborn, and the advent of Messiah. It seems to us a very real Midrash.

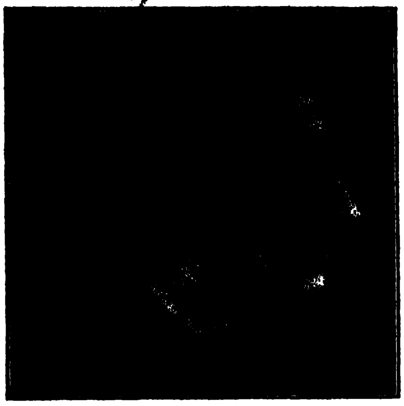
BOOKS AND THEIR WRITERS.

TRADITION AND EXPERIMENT.

By St. John Adcock.

NO young optimist should blot the word "impossible" out of his dictionary until he has tried to compile an anthology that will satisfy everybody. Then he will feel modest enough to acknowledge that the lexicographers knew best and have furnished him with a word that is at times indispensable. Mr. Harold Monro has bravely attempted that impossible task in " Twentieth Century Poetry,"* and if he had entirely succeeded might have credited himself with the performance of a miracle. He has done so well, anyhow, that many will be contented with what he has achieved. Having read or reread " about six hundred volumes," he has chosen seventy-seven poets, and winnowing out of each from one to nine poems has brought together a total of two hundred and forty as a harvest of what seems to him best in the poetry of this century. For the new issue of his welcome and admirably edited annual, " The Best Poems of 1929,"† Mr. Thomas Moult has found that during a single year seventy-two poets have written verse well worth preserving; so the fact that from the larger area of thirty years Mr. Monro has selected only seventy-seven should indicate that he is not easy to please. And certainly among the poems of his choice there are many charming, many beautiful things, with not more than a just proportion of such as are at least remarkable for those experimental, revolutionary qualities of structure and utterance which have come to be recognised as peculiarly characteristic of really " modern " verse. There are poems that may not, to your private thinking, be of undeniable merit —there were bound to be—but it is an interesting collection, and if it does not strike you as being thoroughly representative of the century, that may be either because Mr. Monro's taste is too delicate, is not sufficiently catholic, or your own not sufficiently exclusive. Perhaps an anthology of this comprehensive cast, if it is broadly and fully to represent the poetry of a period, rather than the limited personal preferences of the anthologist, could be more impartially compiled by a critic who was not also a poet, and so would have no very natural bias toward a kind of poetry he wrote himself nor against a kind he could not or did not write.

However this may be, when you have learned from Mr. Monro's introduction that, in order to settle his chronological boundaries, he resolved on " a general rule, with the elder poets, to include those only whose Collected Works had been published within the century," it is unsettling to discover that he includes seven poems by Dr. Bridges, whose Collected Poems appeared in the nineteenth century, and none by Kipling, Arthur Symons or William Watson, though their Collected Poems were not published until after this century began. It is true that one learns too from the introduction that Mr. Monro classes " some of the more famous poets of the moment " as poets of a decade and not of the century: " so to each decade its poet; centuries think in different terms." An impressive dictum, but I fear this classification ought to have proved fatal to the claims of several who are enshrined as century poets in this Valhalla. As specimens of last century poets whom he dismisses as belonging to a decade, Mr. Monro names, among others, Alexander Smith, and is not deterred by his knowledge of either from linking him with the egregious Tupper. The maturer work of Smith has had to suffer from the popularity and half-deserved ridicule he won with the boyish stuff he wrote when he was twenty. But one or two of his lyrics—" Glasgow," say, and that passionate, strangest of love-lyrics, " The Night Before the Wedding "— would make not a few of Mr. Monro's selection seem by contrast anæmic and inconsequent. For all that, I do not deny that Alexander Smith was only the poet of a decade, but his acceptance as such, if we test some of this " twentieth century poetry " against his, carries obvious implications.



Mr. Harold Monro.

I should misrepresent it however if I did not emphasise that, taken simply as a collection of recent verse, a collection of Mr. Monro's favourite poems, there is very much in this book that is well and sensitively chosen and will give delight to all discriminating readers. Indeed, it goes without saying that an anthology containing poems by Rupert Brooke, Masefield, de la Mare, Alice Meynell, John Davidson, W. H. Davies, Siegfried Sassoon, Gerard Hopkins, Elroy Flecker, Abercrombie, Ralph Hodgson, Humbert Wolfe, Hardy, Yeats and, to say nothing of others, a sonnet and a brief poem by Wilfrid Gibson, one exquisite lyric by Noyes (whose " Bird-Song," by the way, is technically, and in thought and feeling, about the best of Mr. Moult's " Best Poems of 1929 "), one by A. E. Housman, one by Edmund Blunden, one by Gordon Bottomley, one by John Drinkwater, one by John Freeman, one by Chesterton, eight by a poetess of moderate gifts, and three by Mr. Monro himself, is a book rich enough in poetry to be a pleasing and a valuable possession. It is only when you come to consider it as an adequate assembly of the representative poetry of our century that you begin to hesitate and ask questions.

For instance, you read " Oread," by H. D.:

> " Whirl up, sea,
> Whirl your pointed pines,
> Splash your great pines
> On our rocks,
> Hurl your green over us,
> Cover us with your pools of fir."

* 3s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus). † 6s. (Jonathan Cape).

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Miss Edith Sitwell.

You read "Sehnsucht" (I am quoting each of these in full):

> "Because of body's hunger are we born,
> And by contriving hunger are we fed;
> Because of hunger is our work well done,
> And so are songs well sung, and things well said.
> Desire and longing are the whips of God—
> God save us all from death when we are fed."

You read "The Sunflower," by Peter Quennell:

> "See, I have bent thee by thy saffron hair,
> O most strange masker,
> Towards my face, thy face so full of eyes,
> O almost legendary monster.
> Thee of the saffron, circling hair I bend,
> Bend by my fingers knotted in thy hair,
> Hair like broad flames.
> So—shall I swear by beech husk, spindle-berry,
> To break thee, saffron hair and peering eye,
> To have the mastery?"

Poor Sir Richard Blackmore was not more banal, yet the satirists of his day laughed him into a figure of fun. Our milder age is less exacting; when some of its new poets can acquire little else it tolerantly encourages them to make virtues of their deficiencies, and, unfortunately, the large number they have of these swells them with a sense of greatness, until somebody is humane enough to puncture it. You read the twentieth century poem of "The Dead Bird," the seven lines on "Autumn," "The Horseman," and a score of others that are curiously lacking in idea, in beauty of thought or phrase, sometimes in a sense of humour which, in a flat-footed effort named "The Flight into Egypt," might have saved the poet from writing of how Mary would—

> "bare your maiden breast to his mouth,
> "The suckling, to the conscious God balanced upon your knees"

—and you wonder whether absolutely nothing finer, more significant than these tin-whistle pipings can be distilled from the pages of such poets as "A. E." (George Russell), Gerald Gould, Aldous Huxley, Crosland, Muriel Stuart, Katharine Tynan, Charles Williams, Martin Armstrong, Maurice Baring, Charles Dalmon, Belloc, Stephen Gwynn, W. M. Letts, Sidney Lysaght, Rose Macaulay, Violet Jacob, Susan Miles (decidedly one of the best of the "modernists"), Max Plowman, John Presland, Rachael Annand Taylor, Horace Shipp, Frank Kendon, Margaret Woods—who are all of this century and all ignored. Surely our century is not yet so rich in poetry that it can afford to dispense with all these, in addition to Watson, Symons and Kipling? Their absence exaggerates our poverty when one makes inevitable comparisons between the poets of this century and the one that preceded it.

An anthology covering the last thirty years of the despised Victorian era would contain the names of Browning, Tennyson, Arnold, Swinburne, Rossetti, Patmore; an anthology limited to the first thirty years of the nineteenth century would give us Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron, Crabbe, Shelley, Keats and something of Blake—though as the critics had not then made up their minds about Blake and Keats we might have been given Mrs. Hemans and Rogers instead. Which thought should chasten us and make us the more careful in these days not to let our sleeping judgments betray us into similar errors. Mr. Monro's anthology is, once again, excellent in many respects, but, if I may be forgiven for expressing what, rightly or wrongly, I honestly think, by several of his inclusions and several of his omissions he makes our twentieth century poetry in the bulk, beside that of those other two anthologies, appear smaller and more inferior than it actually is.

Following passing fashions in literature, for fear of not seeming up to date, all we like sheep have gone astray at times, but that will not excuse us for condoning mistakes, even when they are not our own. So let me confess that I have been appalled at the gush of extravagant eulogy divers of our leading and lesser critics have lavished on a recent book of measurable merits by an established writer eminent enough to overawe the lesser ones, but not to mesmerise the others, so I am driven to account for it by assuming that their standards of criticism have fallen into disrepair and let them down. There has been too much lately of this rapturous hailing of important geese as swans, and it behoves each one of us to look into himself severely and put right what is wrong with his works. If our standards were not defective we should not—some of us—be troubled with such confused notions of what we mean by "modern" poetry. You will notice we have what are called very advanced poets who write deft little snatches of verse in the tradition of the very ancient poets of China; while others who write in the more recent tradition of our own greater poets are labelled old-fashioned.

There is a lot of sad nonsense of that sort talked about these matters, and for a corrective you should read (and you will read with enjoyment) the sound, sensible, lucid exposition of the virtues of tradition and of experiment in poetry in the essays contributed by Edmund Blunden and Edith Sitwell to "Tradition and Experiment in Present-Day Literature."* There you will find Miss Sitwell, perhaps to your surprise, judiciously crowning Tennyson's "Tears, Idle Tears," as "one of the loveliest short lyrics in the English language." She is not invariably so orthodox, but is as candidly and fairly critical of experimental as of traditional verse. To illustrate one phase of her argument Miss Sitwell quotes a long eccentric poem " about an elephant," and you may think she is unduly lenient when she admits that it is " not a first-rate one," and is " fearfully obscure " ; you may think it illustrates the vices only and not " at once the virtues and the vices of modernist poetry " ; but her argument is now and then happier than her illustrations. She says an illuminating word, though not the last word, of Matthew Arnold when she refers to his " chilblained mittened musings " ; and submitting certain " modernists " to drastic scrutiny she remarks that they have discovered many things, " but not poetry." On the whole Miss Sitwell puts the case for experiment forcefully and well, and ends by defining poetry as " not the result of reason nor of intellect. It is the flower of magic, not of logic." No rational being is opposed to experiment ; he only protests when he is asked to admire quite raw experimental poetry as if it were the finished article, and will not blindly receive pretentiously crude verse as poetry when the modernist seeks to do the trick by clever conjuring, instead of by magic, with intellect instead of with feeling and imagination. All verse-writing is, in fact, an experiment, and only when the experiment succeeds is the result a poem.

Mr. Edmund Blunden.

* 7s. 6d. (Oxford Press).

That, I take it, is the sum of Mr. Edmund Blunden's teaching in his discerning and ably written chapter on " Tradition in Poetry." He concludes by indicating the influences that, consciously or unconsciously, aided Coleridge in the fashioning of " Kubla Khan," and shows that, for all its inspired originality, it was an experiment that had its roots in tradition. The Quarterly sneered at the poem as without genius and " utterly destitute of value " ; but later critics have arrived at a different opinion, and now, adds Mr. Blunden, " we may stand looking for a ' Kubla Khan ' of our days, and if our poets are as traditional as Coleridge, we may receive one."

Mr. R. H. Mottram.

In the past, at all events, the poets of a century, or part of a century, have never spoken all in one manner, or with one voice ; little groups have flocked together and done so, but they have always been of a minor order. Wordsworth was a great experimentalist ; he broke the tryanny of the Georgian formalists and restored to poetry its old beautiful simplicities of movement and of language ; but in all his greater work he exercised that freedom gloriously within traditional limits.

In this same volume tradition and experiment in the novel, in the drama, biography, and criticism are dealt with by R. H. Mottram and J. D. Beresford ; by Ashley Dukes and C. K. Munro ; by A. J. A. Symons and Osbert Burdett ; by Rebecca West and T. S. Eliot. I like the uncompromising boldness with which Mr. Mottram declares himself " incapable of dealing with the novel as though it were some recondite literary form existing only in the world of art. To me, the novel is not only a literary form, but an article of merchandise and an item in the well-estimated family budget, where it figures under the heading of ' amusements.' " He tells you what brought him to that point of view, and of course it does not involve a denial of the art of the novelist—but he is too natural an artist himself to treat it fussily or portentously —and he traces the development of that art from Richardson down to Wells, Bennett and Galsworthy, who continue to practise it, he observes, within the lines of a tradition that " is by no means ossified and insular." All these essays on tradition and experiment in the literary arts are suggestive, provocative, interesting, and tend to convince you, if you are not convinced already, that it is as foolish to despise tradition as to discourage experiment ; though all experiment is a waste of energy unless it is an intelligent extension of tradition and not merely an ignorant departure from it. No doubt it is possible for the ingenious to cultivate blue roses and black lilies, so the gardener who feverishly digs and waters his plot and tries to grow such flowers without seeds is not a subject for unkind criticism, but for medical attention.

ANOTHER DAY.

By JEFFERY FARNOL. 7s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)

Mr. Jeffery Farnol may choose for his literary domain a somewhat artificial type of romance, but within that domain he certainly rules supreme among modern writers. The hero of his latest story is a young man who, bereft of memory, is found lying unconscious across the corpse of the man he had threatened to murder. He is also a champion boxer and a fearless breaker of horses. The goddess of his destiny is a Sussex beauty whose face is " deep-eyed, vivid of mouth and framed in bronze-gold hair cut close, sleek and shining like a gold helmet." A pale and wistful American woman is her rival ; while in Derek Ryerson there is a thoroughly hard-boiled villain, in Uncle Ted a lovable old American gentleman, and in the wee Patience, sister of the golden goddess, a very attractive, if somewhat precocious, child. With these characters, and with scenes ranging from the Sussex Downs to the underworld of New York, Mr. Farnol succeeds in giving us another good mystery yarn.

HETTY'S SON.

By FLORENCE KILPATRICK. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

It would be surprising to learn that Mrs. Florence Kilpatrick had not one eye on Mr. Ivor Novello and the talkies when she wrote this dramatic account of a handsome young man's fortunes and misfortunes. The beginning of the story, when John Tredegar, on the eve of leaving school to go up to Oxford, is expelled because of his association with a girl, is strongly reminiscent of a film in which Mr. Ivor Novello starred not long ago. But the story of course continues differently, and John's adventures as library steward on the Andalucia, and later in South America, would give any movie hero plenty of chances for first-class acting. This is the third " Hetty " book ; at the end of the previous one Hetty died at the birth of her son, but to this son she has bequeathed much of her wild, warm nature, and so her spirit lingers, running like a will-o'-the-wisp through the history of his growth from boyhood to manhood, his love for three women and his ultimate reconciliation with his father and stepmother.

THE BOOKMAN'S DIARY.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

Two of the greatest War novels we have had so far are the two latest—Mr. Tomlinson's "All Our Yesterdays" (reviewed on another page) and Mr. Richard Blaker's "Medal Without Bar" (Hodder & Stoughton). Both have a breadth of vision and sympathy, an understanding of the real significance of things, and a sure artistry in the handling of their material that make much in our recent ultra-realistic War books—which apparently cannot achieve effects without overloading their pages with crude details of abhorrent sights and obscenities of dialogue—seem hysterical by comparison. You have enough of the visible horrors of war, the shattering of human creatures by scientific methods of slaughter in "Medal Without Bar" to turn the most stupidly rampant non-combatant into a confirmed pacifist. But these things are here the more poignant, more terrible because you are brought to such an intimate acquaintance with certain of the men who are thus ruthlessly smashed and blasted out of existence. If you want to be convinced of the sheer brutality and insanity of war, read "Medal Without Bar." It confirms all we have heard of the muddle and incompetence in the higher commands that too often sent men uselessly to inevitable death; there is no lack of humour in it, grim and otherwise; it pictures, too, the unbreakable courage of men unused to warfare, the heroism, self-sacrifice, the wonderful comradeships that were fostered among the insensate carnage of battle and touched the whole shameful business at times with something beautifully human and ennobling.

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. Richard Blaker.

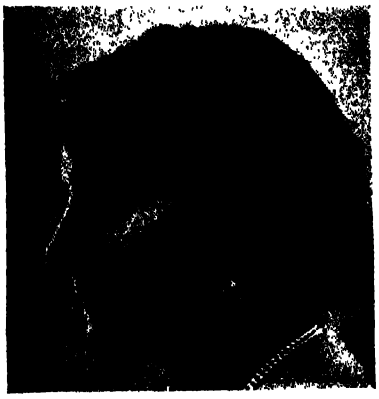
One suspects that, like Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. Blaker is autobiographical; that though his principal character is not modelled on himself he has given him his own experiences. When the War broke out Charles Cartwright was a solicitor, aged thirty-six, and partner with his father in the firm of Cartwright, Mollison and Cartwright. His wife was old Mollison's daughter. He knew that if he joined up the Old Boy and Mollison could carry on without him; his wife and two sons would be provided for and, things being so "convenient," the idea that he might try to keep out of it was unthinkable. He joined an Officers' Training Corps, where the Adjutant was a young Mons veteran, minus one eye and one hand. The Adjutant, Henderson, and Cartwright grew very friendly and, having influence in high quarters, Henderson is prepared to get him a permanent "cushy" job in the home service. Cartwright is opposed to this, and after delays, for which the intriguings of his wife and Henderson's are responsible, he is sent to France as lieutenant in a battery of artillery. The story that follows of the Somme fighting is the vividest, most grimly realistic story I have read of what was done in that direful sector by the men behind the guns. But the interest of it all takes hold of you chiefly because of the quiet cunning with which Mr. Blaker has drawn the characters of Cartwright—sensible, reliable, kindly—his brother officers, their batmen, sergeants and other of the men; you are made to know them so thoroughly and are so drawn to them, as they were drawn to each other, that you feel it almost as a personal loss when one after the other of them is suddenly wiped out, until scarcely any remain of the original battery except Cartwright himself and the boastful, likeable, superstitious Whitelaw. You fully understand how, after he has been invalided home, as soon as he is better, though he dreads going, Cartwright refuses opportunities of getting "cushy" jobs and has to go back out of a deep sense of loyalty to that glorious fellowship. There was none of the "far, far better thing" about this feeling; it was simply that he had become "something of the blood and the bone, the haunch and the hoof and the guts—of the battery."



Cartwright, being older than most of the officers, is genially nicknamed "Uncle"; and one of the things that haunts me is a saying by young Reynolds (otherwise "Renny"), who is given to quoting the poets on appropriate occasions. After a time of stress he has been drinking overmuch and will not settle down. He rouses, sits up, and addresses himself to Cartwright who is trying to sleep:

". . . 'Uncle, we've come out —of the Valley. And who are these?' He looked about the hut. '"These, sir," a fellow like you would say, "These are a lot of gunners." But the proper answer, ancient Uncle of mine, is "These are they which came out of great tribulation. . . ." What a spanking word that is, Nunks; "tribulation" . . . Uncle,' he said, 'by God, it's true! They shall hunger no more—neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat. . . . If we get through to the end —out of the other valleys and tribulations as we've got through this lot —there won't be a damned thing left in the world to upset us, and excite us, and make us get the wind up. I dare say we'll be able to smile at things, now and again; but it will take a hell of a lot to get a tear out of us. . . . "These are they which came out of great tribulation . . ." the generation of the broken-hearted. Men who have sighed all their sighs and shed their ultimate tear. I wish I could impress you as much as I've been impressed myself, blast you! But perhaps I'm late; it sometimes seems that you have discovered all these things some time ago. Good night, brother officer.'

"'Good night, fellow-gentleman,' said Cartwright. He too was a little thoughtful now. 'You have rather impressed me, if it's any satisfaction to you,' he said. 'I think that's a pretty sound idea.'

"'Good egg!' said Reynolds. 'I just shot an arrow into the air—well—good night.'"

Mrs. Aceituna Griffin,
Author of "Genesta" (John Murray).

Reynolds was one who did not get through to the end; but you can believe after reading this book that many who did have found there was truth in his rhetorical outburst. If you miss "Medal Without Bar," you will miss one of the finest, most deeply interesting of all the War books.

A collection of "New Zealand Short Stories," edited by O. N. Gillespie, will be published this month by Messrs. Dent. There is a wide variety in the stories, but every one of them is of New Zealand life and character. None of New Zealand's story-writers are better known in this country than Katherine Mansfield, but there are tales in the book by B. E. Baughan, A. A. Grace, G. B. Lancaster and others that will rank with the best work of this kind that has been done in recent years.

"Plume of the Arawas," a novel by another New Zealand author, Mr. Frank O. V. Acheson, is also to be published by Messrs. Dent this month. It is a stirring romance of the New Zealand Maori, written by one who has a lifelong knowledge of that remarkable race. An admirable account of native life in New Zealand towards the end of last century was given in "Maori Witchery," by C. R. Browne, issued by the same publishers last autumn. The author tells of his perilous adventures among hostile tribes and what he saw of the Maori people, their manners and customs, while he was engaged as a Government surveyor in opening up the "King Country" for the Main Trunk Railway.

The new novel of Major C. P. Wren, "The Mammon of Righteousness," which Mr. John Murray is publishing this month, is not another romance of India or Africa, but a mystery story of a very unusual kind.

Messrs. Eveleigh Nash & Grayson have done a good service in publishing all that is best and most interesting of the famous Diary of Charles Cavendish Fulke Greville in "Leaves from the Greville Diary" (21s.). The Diary covers the reigns of George IV, William IV, and the early years of Victoria. Greville was a shrewd observer, a witty idler, who was easily admitted behind the scenes in the best social and political circles of his time, knew all about nearly everybody that mattered, and gossiped about them in his diary unreservedly. The selection has been made by Mr. Philip Morrell, who contributes a preface and an admirable introductory essay. An appendix contains some interesting letters from Granville which have not hitherto been published.

Mr. Frank Stafford,
Author of "Beset," recently published by John Long.

Mr. Gilbert Thomas, who has done work of distinction both as poet and essayist, has completed a new volume of essays, "Calm Weather," which will be published shortly by Messrs. Chapman & Hall. As his title suggests, Mr. Thomas's essays are of a quiet and thoughtful cast, and deal largely with "those first affections, those shadowy recollections" which return to us, as Wordsworth says, "in a season of calm weather." It is a book of varying moods and impressions, including intimate autobiographical chapters concerning childhood, Public School life and the author's early days in London with Messrs. Chapman & Hall (who, by the way, celebrate their centenary this year). All the essays have appeared in the Spectator, Nation, Manchester Guardian, British Weekly, Good Housekeeping, and other journals.

I heard with great regret of the death last month of Mrs. Agnes Croysdale, the elder daughter of Mr. William Blane, C.B.E. Under the name of Agnes Blane, Mrs. Croysdale was the author of several very successful plays, including "The Half Sister," which was produced in London, at the Apollo theatre; "The Third Eye," a powerful study in the mental derangement of a famous doctor, produced at Nottingham; a comedy, "A Family Affair," which was produced with a London cast at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, and afterwards on tour with brilliant success in other provincial cities. By her early death the stage has lost one of its most promising dramatists. She had several other plays ready for production—one, a comedy, called "Sin and Angels"; another, "The Moon and the River," written in collaboration with William Holles; had dramatised two well-known novels, Dorothy Conyers's "Two Impostors and Tinker," and Gilbert Frankau's "Gerald Cranston's Lady," and was making arrangements for their production this year. Many of her plays had an African colouring, for she spent much time in South Africa, where her father, whose name is familiar in anthologies of South African poetry, lived for many years. She also wrote much charming verse and I understand a Memorial volume of this is in preparation.

Mrs. Agnes Croysdale.

A study of Mr. Lloyd George, by Sir Charles Mallet, has just been published by Messrs. Benn. Sir Charles writes as "a member of the Liberal Party," and, though studiously polite, his analysis of his subject's personality, record and policy is frank and searching.

I hear from Mr. Sydney Walton, of the Yorkshire Evening News, that Dr. T. R. Glover, the well-known scholar and public orator of Cambridge University, has written some Latin verses in the mediæval manner reviewing Miss Waddell's "Mediæval Latin Lyrics" (which we review on another page), and that the Baptist Times is offering a prize for the best translation of them.

The Cambridge Press has in preparation a new edition of the "Plays of Nathaniel Lee," Dryden's contemporary and occasional collaborator. This will be edited, with an introduction and notes, by Miss C. M. Maclean.

The hitherto uncollected criticisms and reviews of Katherine Mansfield are to be published shortly by Messrs. Constable, under the title of "Novels and Novelists."

Messrs. Constable are publishing also "Strength of the Spirit," a new novel by Leonora Eyles.

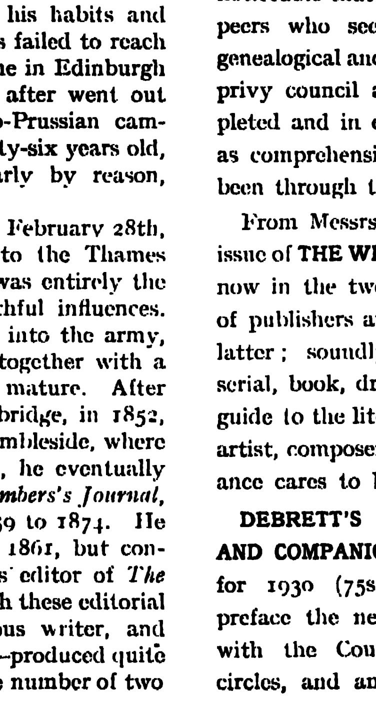
Emil Ludwig's "Abraham Lincoln" is to be published early this year by Messrs. Putnam; who have also in the press the Memoirs of Prince von Buelow, the German statesman and Chancellor.

A translation of "The Spiritual Writings of Charles de Foucauld," the Hermit Apostle of the Sahara, will be published this spring by Messrs. Burns, Oates & Washbourne.

The Index to Volume LXXVI of THE BOOKMAN will be given in our next issue.

BOOKMAN.

TWO CENTENARIES: HENRY KINGSLEY AND JAMES PAYN.



Two men destined to be notable in the annals of literature entered the world this winter-time a hundred years ago. Henry Kingsley, born on January 2nd, 1830, at the Rectory of Barnack, in Northamptonshire, was the fifth son of the Reverend Charles Kingsley; but as his father became Rector of Chelsea in 1836, Henry's youth mainly passed there amid surroundings which he excellently depicted later on in his book, "The Hillyars and the Burtons." His brother Charles, the future author of "Hypatia" and "Westward Ho!" was eleven years his senior and already a force in the religious and literary world as Henry grew up, but very differently—restless, wild, and self-indulgent. Henry Kingsley left Worcester College, Oxford, in 1853, without taking a degree, owing to mysterious circumstances which have never transpired. The gold-digging fever had him in its grip, and he went off to Australia like so many of the muscular and unstable young men of that time. But he found no fortune in the mines, though many adventures were his in that far unknown country as labourer, stockdriver, and trooper in the mounted police. His relatives heard nothing of him for five years, and then suddenly he reappeared in England, rather to their disconcertion. But he was provided with a cottage next to the dwelling of his now aged parents at Eversley, and there he proceeded to write, or rather finish, that vivid novel, "Geoffry Hamlyn," which recounts so much of his adventurous time in Australia. By the influence of his brother Charles, the book found ready acceptance by the firm of Alexander Macmillan in 1859. It was succeeded by the even finer "Ravenshoe" in 1862. "Austin Elliot," "Leighton Court," "Silcote of Silcotes" were all good, but by 1869 deterioration in both his habits and brain had set in, and his subsequent stories failed to reach the same high standard. He was for a time in Edinburgh as editor of The Daily Review, and soon after went out as war correspondent during the Franco-Prussian campaign. He died in Sussex, in 1876, but forty-six years old, his bright promise extinguished thus early by reason, mainly, of his irregular habits.

Miss Georgia Rivers,
Author of "The Difficult Art" (Skeffington).

James Payn was born at Cheltenham on February 28th, 1830. His father, who had been Clerk to the Thames Commissioners, died early, and the child was entirely the son of his mother in the matter of youthful influences. He was sent to Eton, and intended to go into the army, but for reasons of ill-health this project, together with a later one to become a clergyman, did not mature. After taking his degree at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1852, Payn adopted journalism. Settling near Ambleside, where he saw a good deal of Harriet Martineau, he eventually moved to Edinburgh to join the staff of Chambers's Journal, of which periodical he was editor from 1859 to 1874. He had taken up his residence in London in 1861, but continued his editorship from there. He was editor of The Cornhill Magazine (1883–1896). All through these editorial periods, and before, he was a voluminous writer, and between 1852 and 1890—thirty-eight years—produced quite sixty books, which at times appeared to the number of two or three in a single year; novels, poems, essays, recollections poured from his pen. Payn's most popular novel was "Lost Sir Massingberd" (1864). "By Proxy" (1878) was remarkable for its humour. "The Talk of the Town" (1885) was based on the career of W. H. Ireland, the Shakespearean forger, and describes the sensational production of his "Vortigern" at Drury Lane Theatre in 1796. There are over forty other novels by Payn. He was also for many years reader to the publishing firm of Smith, Elder, and in this capacity the unfortunate memory attaches to him that he rejected "The Mayor of Casterbridge" and "John Inglesant." On the other hand, he praised Rider Haggard's first story, "Dawn," though his firm did not publish the book. James Payn died at Warrington Crescent, Maida Vale, on March 25th, 1898, beloved by a wide circle of friends for his kindliness and charm as a man.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS.

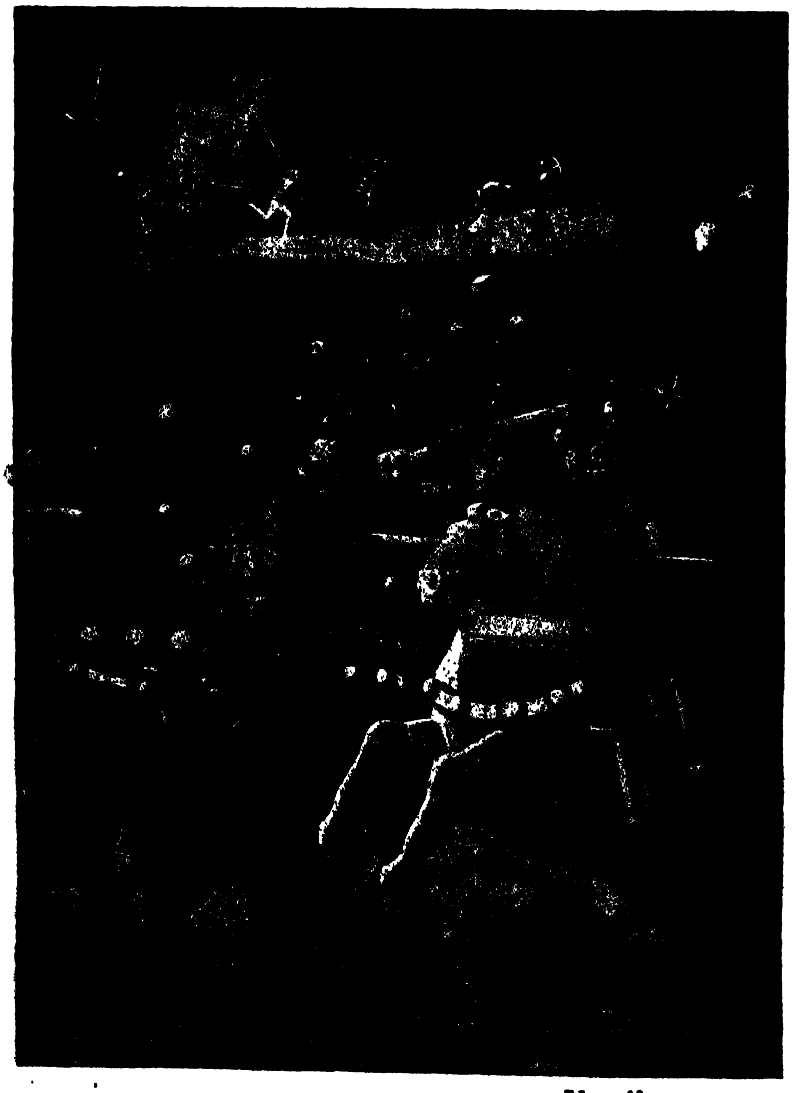
The 1930 edition of Burke's PEERAGE AND BARONETAGE, PRIVY COUNCIL AND KNIGHTAGE (£5 5s.; Burke's Peerage, Ltd.), carefully brought up to date, is a welcome and invaluable addition to every reference library. You get an idea of the extent to which last year's volume is now out of date when you find records here of twenty-six new peerages; twenty-eight new baronetcies; many new knights, and members of various orders, to say nothing of changes on the episcopal bench and elsewhere and, a very interesting and serviceable addition, a complete list of the present Ministry. It is noticeable that Lord Passfield is one of the very few recent peers who seem to dispense with coats of arms. The genealogical and heraldic history of our peerage, baronetage, privy council and knightage has been revised and completed and in every way the new volume has been made as comprehensive and reliable as "Burke's" always has been through the eighty-eight years of its existence.

From Messrs. A. & C. Black comes the new and revised issue of THE WRITERS' AND ARTISTS' YEAR BOOK (3s. 6d.), now in the twenty-third year of its usefulness. Its lists of publishers and periodicals, and the requirements of the latter; soundly practical articles of advice concerning serial, book, dramatic, film and all copyrights, makes it a guide to the literary, art and music worlds that no editor, artist, composer or writer who has once made its acquaintance cares to be without.

DEBRETT'S PEERAGE, BARONETAGE, KNIGHTAGE AND COMPANIONAGE, revised and brought up to date for 1930 (75s.; Dean & Son), gives in an ample preface the news of the year so far as it is concerned with the Court and higher social and Parliamentary circles, and among much other information includes an interesting table showing the number of hereditary and other titles that have been conferred each year for the last half-century. The largest number of peers created in any one of these years was twenty-three in 1919, though 1929 ran it close with twenty-two. Debrett has been carrying on its useful work for two hundred and seventeen years, and nothing could be more concise or complete than its genealogies and its wealth of information about those who have earned a place between its covers. The "Companionage" list alone fills nearly a thousand pages. Whatever you may want to know about the holder of any sort of title or honour is to be found in Debrett.

ART IN ITALY—AND ELSEWHERE.*

By Frank Rutter.



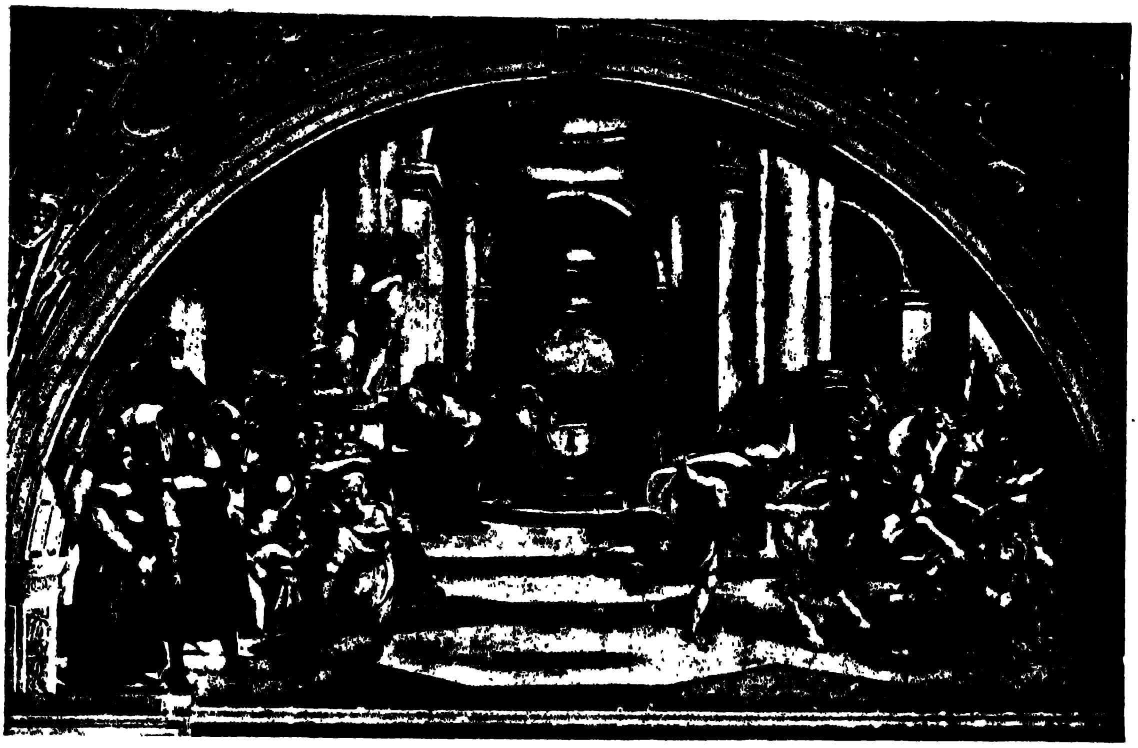
In matters of art it must be admitted that the Latin races have shown a distinct superiority over the rest of Europe; and of all the Latins the Italians have the longest and most glorious record. That is why the exhibition of Italian Art at Burlington House this month inevitably surpasses even the magnificent exhibitions of Flemish and Dutch Art previously held there.

But to enjoy this exhibition to the full and to understand it aright the visitor must have some knowledge of the conditions of life which brought these treasures of art to birth. A book which can be confidently recommended to intending visitors as a preparation for what they are about to see is Jacob Burckhardt's "Civilisation of the Renaissance in Italy." This famous classic, so delightfully written yet so instructive, has already passed through fifteen editions in Germany, and Mr. S. G. C. Middlemore's translation is from the last German edition, with additional notes. But though the text of Burckhardt's book has appeared in English before, the volume just published by Messrs. Harrap & Co. is the first to be illustrated. Valuable as the text is alone, it becomes doubly valuable when embellished with 240 well chosen and well reproduced illustrations, which are not only welcome in themselves, but supremely helpful to the better understanding of a book which is an acknowledged master-work.

A much smaller volume which is yet helpful and remarkably comprehensive in its brevity is "The Italian Renaissance," by M. Elie Faure. This distinguished French critic is apt to be more than a trifle rhetorical in his expositions, but the present work is a model of conciseness, and in the space of little more than fifty pages he presents an attractive survey of Italian architecture, sculpture and painting from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century. He ends with Tintoretto, and this leaves out Tiepolo, Canaletto and Guardi; but it is impossible to exhaust Renaissance art in fifty-five pages, and the marvel is not that M. Faure should have left anybody out, but that he should have got in so much. Further, he can legitimately claim that the later Venetians belong to the Baroque period and not to the Renaissance.

Of the extraordinary conditions of that time he has much to say supplementing his sixty pages of illustrations, and many of his sentences are as illuminating as flashes of lightning:

> "Assassination in person, or through a hireling, was an every-day occurrence. . . . In Florence there was a woman who offered an ex-voto to a saint as a thank-offering, because her lover, a monk, had been successful in robbing her husband. . . . All men distrusted each other through knowledge of their own proclivities. . . . Men's nervous systems became highly sensitive and able to react as rapidly as the harp string vibrates to the touch of the hand. Quick-wittedness is necessarily developed when it is required as a weapon . . . the general amorality matured the individual. . . . Men found they could rule by the mind as well or better than by physical force. A new passion was born, which was to know and create, and to protect those who had knowledge and the power of creating. . . . The humanities and the arts were developing by dint of the eagerness inspired by emulation, since the goal was glory. The most brutal tyrants, the Malatesta for instance, expended enormous sums on buying pictures, statues and medals, on founding libraries, on financing scholars, writers and artists."



Uccello

From "An Introduction to Italian Painting," by Sir Charles Holmes (Cassell).

That was the Renaissance, and if its achievements were great, the price paid for them was formidable. Nobody would wish to resurrect these conditions even on the certainty of producing another Raphael or Leonardo.

But, with all respect to the Renaissance, many of us are beginning to wonder whether its achievements were really so wonderful and worthy of admiration as those of three centuries immediately preceding, say, 1450. Does not the visitor to Burlington House—especially if his taste be refined—return again and again to the first two rooms containing the Sienese and Florentine Primitives? Does he not feel, after he has passed Botticelli's "Birth of Venus" in the third gallery, that the exhibition soon begins to tail off in beauty, in exquisiteness and, above all, in spirituality?

Holman Hunt, Millais and Rossetti are quite out of date with their Pre-Raphaelitism, it is the Pre-Giottesque works which most fascinate the advanced art students of to-day. Similarly we are coming to judge a writer on Italian art, to some extent, by the point at which he begins. If with Cimabue we feel that he has left a most important, and to some the best, part of the tale untold, Mr. A. F. Clutton-Brock scores a distinct point and earns respect by starting his brief but intelligent sketch of "Italian Painting" with Giunta Pisano (f.l. 1229–1255). He is properly sceptical of "progress" in art, and in his sixty-four pages of pamphleteering he studies belong to the spheres of history and biography rather than that of art criticism, Mr. Vaughan, while taking constitutional history to be the anatomy of nations, and political history to be its "organs of action," claims art history to be:

" that which in the body historical gives a sparkle to the eyes, a sheen to the hair, colour to the lips, and grace to the limbs."

This is his graceful and quite unnecessary apology only gets as far as Domenico Veneziano (1399–1486) on page 32.

Mr. Horace Shipp, whose larger " Italian Masters " has also been written with special reference to the current exhibition at the Academy, begins early, too, devoting a preliminary chapter to a Byzantine prologue before starting with Guido of Siena, whose " Madonna " is dated 1221. Apart from illustrations, Mr. Shipp's octavo contains 170 pages; but on page 85 he is already writing about the Florence of Michelangelo; so that although he has still to tell us of the Umbrian, Milanese, Venetian and other schools, he is less disillusioned about the Renaissance than Mr. Clutton-Brock. Mr. Shipp however is admittedly catering for the " general reader," and while his book contains little serious criticism or searching analysis of the qualities which make paintings great, he chats pleasantly about the painters and usefully reminds us of the historical background to the stage on which they strutted.

Altogether in another class is Sir Charles Holmes's " Introduction to Italian Painting." It is the work of a scholar, a great expert, and a landscape painter of originality and distinction; yet for all his erudition and profound technical experience, Sir Charles tells his story in a simple and delightfully lucid manner, so that his is a book which anybody can read and understand. It is quite the best short book on the subject that has yet appeared in English, and though limited to 145 pages it has by far the widest range. In a masterly chapter on " The Origin and Methods of Italian Painting," he sums up the achievements of Byzantine art, shows us the continuity of the classical style in mediæval Rome, and lays due stress on the real turning point in Italian painting; namely the coming to Assisi, to help in painting the frescoes at St. Francesco, of the thirteenth century Roman painter Pietro Cavallini. The unreliability of Vasari is now common knowledge, and modern research has established that it was Cavallini, not Cimabue, who was the real master of Giotto. Similarly, in his last chapter, Holmes writes of the Baroque painters of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries with a rare discriminating sympathy, contriving on his last page even to pay a tribute to Segantini, the great Italian painter of the nineteenth century.

The connection between art and history during the Italian Renaissance is admirably demonstrated by Mr. Herbert M. Vaughan in one of the lectures brought together in his " Studies in the Italian Renaissance." While these for adding to his histories of such families as the Medicis, Borgias, Farneses, etc., chapters on Fra Angelico, Cellini, Leonardo, Raphael and Michelangelo.

Meanwhile we of to-day have our own small achievements; and if we are a little uncertain how Epstein and Augustus John should rank as against Donatello and Titian, still leaving sculpture and painting aside—we have reason to be content with our achievement in etching and dry-point. Here at the present moment the Anglo-Saxon race can claim a distinct superiority over the Latins. There is no country in the world that can present so fine a quartet of living etchers as Great Britain, with Muirhead Bone, Frank Brangwyn, D. Y. Cameron and Michelangelo.

James McBey—to say nothing of Blampied, Briscoe, Brockhurst, Cain, Francis Dodd, John, Lumsden, Osborne, Rushbury, Sickert and a dozen others. All these and ever so many more are appreciated, and most of them included among the illustrations, in Mr. James Laver's book on British and American Etching. The literature of the subject is now so voluminous that collectors and students will be grateful to this alert young official of the Victoria and Albert Museum for giving in one volume so comprehensive yet concise a history. For those who desire to make further research an excellent bibliography is attached; but Mr. Laver himself covers the ground fairly completely from Hogarth to the latest American etcher of promise.

It is inevitable that opinions should differ about the choice of illustrations where the field is so formidably immense. Personally I consider the most serious absentees are Cruikshank and Wilkie among the earlier etchers, Robert Austin, Francis Dodd and Sylvia Gosse among contemporaries. There are many artists reproduced whose work is incontestably on a lower level than that of those just mentioned. But in the matter of reproducing contemporaries, Mr. Laver errs on the side of generosity rather than on that of insufficiency; and his kindness to certain American etchers closely approaches charity.

A translator's task is not unlike that of a miner's. A miner, surrounded by his material, enveloped in it, subdued by it, will be pardoned if he often is more aware of the arduousness of the task, the discomfort of his position, and the unnaturalness of the atmosphere than of the sheer mystic excitement of his task, the bringing to light the hid treasures which only he can see, and which, without his aid, we shall only know by lamentable hearsay. So the translator. He too must be pardoned if at times the task is too hard. Obsessed by the obstinacy of material, surrounded by words so alive and yet so inert, who can blame him if he fails to realise the excitement of his adventure and merely drags to life, for our dismayed inspection, poor little dejected copies of his startling and splendid originals? Yet how glorious it is when a translator arises who can combine utter recognition of the original with a complete power of reproducing its beauty! Fidelity is of little use unless there is love, and too many translators give one the impression that they love neither their originals nor their task. Their translations, when they are not mere journey-work, are by way of self-excuse—we, or at least those of us who are curious, want an explanation of their enthusiasms, or even of the way they spend their time, so they produce those pitiful little apologies that explain at once everything and nothing. "I have been faithful to thee, Const-rue, in my fashion," they diffidently quote; and we decide regretfully that it is not enough.

So a translator such as Miss Waddell gives to us an ecstasy of enjoyment not less acute than that conveyed by original poems. She has an elixir of life for these tattered, dusty, dishevelled or embalmed poets of the great Middle Age. They were of all kinds, saint, scholar, philosopher, vagabond, sceptic, devotee, lover and beloved—for centuries now, for most of us, they have been like those figures in glass cases which illustrate the costumes of bygone periods—perfectly deathly in their lifelikeness. The dusty, fly-specked glass is broken; and Miss Waddell has made them sing once more, as they sang, as they sing in the immortal day-spring of the poets' world. Alcuin, Abelard, Paulinus, the Archpoet, Petronius, Felix, Walafrid Strabo, the unknown lyrists of the Benedictbeuern manuscript—here are songs by all of them, and songs of earlier men who saw the false dawn in the light of the Roman Empire. Miss Waddell has been accused by some of modernising her poets. I am not a scholar, but I have enough Latin, and understand poetry perhaps rather better than the critics. I cannot always see in the Latin what Miss Waddell sees; but directly I have read her version, I can see that it is there. Others read the poet's Latin as well as she; she reads the poet, for her the strings of his harp, which were so often his heart-strings, move with a far, faint music, that can never be too thin or too distant for her ear to catch its loveliness and its rapture. And, hearing it, she can reproduce it thus:

"Summer to a strange land
  Is into exile gone,
The forest trees are bare
  Of their gay song.
The forest boughs are wan,
  Deflowered the field,
Withered that which was fair,
  Naked and bare
The happy greenwood is,
  Stripped by the cruel cold,
And silence grips the air,
  For all the birds are into exile gone."

It is a temptation to fill these pages with excerpts; but one more must suffice—these lines from the Dum Dianæ vitrea:

"Thrice happy sleep!
The antidote to care,
Thou dost allay the storm
Of grief and sore despair;
Through the fast-closed gates
Thou strealest light;
Thy coming gracious is
As love's delight.

"Sleep through the wearied brain
Breathes a soft wind
From fields of ripening grain,
The sound
Of running water over clearest sand,
A mill-wheel turning, turning slowly round,
These steal the light
From eyes weary of sight."

The most amazing thing about Miss Waddell's work is her infinite capacity to catch mood, rhythm and the emotional content of a poem. I will not say that she is always equally successful; I will not say that in all her versions she equals the Latin (a task not always possible in English); but there are no failures in the book, and the general level is so high that no one who knows what the difficulties are can avoid using the word genius of Miss Waddell's power as a translator.

She is also one of the most accomplished scholars we have. There may be people who know more of the Middle Ages—no doubt Mr. Coulton does, and perhaps so does Miss Eileen Power—but there is no one who knows the Middle Ages better. For Miss Waddell is a real lover—that is, she is not blind, but loves with a keen eye for imperfections, and with an understanding that knows that without proportion there is no knowledge, and no genuine affection. She can make the personalities as well as the writings of her poets clear to us; even on an author so discussed as Petronius she has something new to say. She has a delicacy of temper that is too genuine to be peevish at human imperfections, and she does not forget that saints are those whose good characters mankind has chosen to remember and sinners those whose bad deeds are kept alive by the same capricious power. This volume is the sequel to her "Wandering Scholars"; and it is to be hoped that it will have as great a success as that incomparable piece of imaginative reconstruction. With the two books near his hands, those of us who have sometimes been apt to shy at the bogy of the dark ages, will realise again and again that there was no such winter of men's minds, no time when there was no light.

WAR AND PEACE.

ALL OUR YESTERDAYS.[1]

A few years ago books about the War had fallen quite out of favour. There had been so many, and War-time miseries were still so fresh in everybody's recollection, that the public refused to go on reading about unhappy things it was trying to forget. Such a slump set in that books of this sort wandered, seeking in vain to get into print, and novelists were warned that if their novels were to succeed they must keep the War out of them. Now all that is changed. After a decade of semi-eclipse the War began to come back into popularity with the general reader. The new War books were very different from the old; they were written with a more and more daringly naked realism of description and dialogue; all the filthy things seen and heard in and around the trenches were poured into their pages unreservedly, and those that were worst in this respect became the best of the best-sellers. Reading them, one after another, left you with an impression that the whole War had been a long Walpurgis night of almost unmitigated horror and bestiality.

Into this barbaric riot comes "All Our Yesterdays," striking a note of quiet sanity, not mistaking the superficial for the essential, nor giving undue importance to essentials that belong to the background. Mr. Tomlinson does not rely for his effects on any copious and exact reproduction of that unconventional language which seems to have been common to soldiers on a campaign ever since my Uncle Toby fought in Flanders; the difference indeed between Mr. Tomlinson's work and that of the reeking War books, to which we have recently grown accustomed, is the difference between art and photography; he is more concerned to reveal the soul, the inner significance of things, than to horrify you with accumulations of raw facts such as any eye can see, or ear hear.

Beginning in East London, with the launching of a great battleship in 1900, Mr. Tomlinson pictures London during the years of the Boer War, the riotous harrying of pro-Boers, the terribly blatant glorying in victory, as on Mafeking night; and, touching in something of the psychology of that and the succeeding generation, shows the Great War as a natural growth from international ambitions, shoddy ideals, trade and territorial rivalries. You are made intimately acquainted with a group of East End characters—a revolutionary second-hand bookseller; a sturdy shipwright and his family; a kindly, broad-minded vicar; a clever, cynical, young Radical M.P.; a much-travelled journalist—and it is by following the fortunes of certain of these that, from 1914 onwards, you get the story of the War and what it meant to our own people, in the firing-line and at home. From the mud and blood and filth, the good comradeship and insane slaughter of trench and battle-field, you pass to the comfort, hospitality and dinner-table badinage of head-quarters, or the food shortage and wearing anxiety of the air-raided home folk.

Nothing could be more ghastly and terrible than some of the battle scenes. Langham, the brilliant Radical M.P., is a guest at head-quarters, come out to see something of what is going on. He suggests that the fighting men, escaped from factories and offices, are enjoying the slavery of military discipline and the adventure of it all; but Phipps, the war-correspondent, reminds him he has never seen "a casualty station on a bad day"; and one of the officers scoffs at the suggestion of adventure and declares: "The bloody war and its pus is just the outcome of the factories and the laboratories—an interlude, to fight over credits and customers—the serfs go from one part of the great machine to attend to another, by order." The edge is taken off the glory by such anecdotes as that of the girl at home, near child-birth, who as the old vicar distressfully reiterates, "died crying," when news came that her man at the Front had been killed. All through it is this larger human note that is stressed, not merely the brutal and abhorrent incidents, but the far-reaching consequences of the War. The story has its moments of devastating irony and bitterness; it has also a breadth of vision and beauty, a poignance of thought and feeling and language that rank it, as a piece of literature, second to none of the greater books of this kind that these latter years have brought us.

SHEPHERDS IN SACKCLOTH.[2]

Directly you open Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith's new book you find yourself immersed in the peace and loveliness of spring; the marshes "yellow with sunshine and buttercups," the young woods lifting "torches of green fire to the sky." But it is an illusionary peace, a peace that only externally touches the human lives of those villages on the Kentish border, shepherded by the grey-haired, kindly, simple-hearted Mr. Bennet; a peace that only externally touches Mr. Bennet himself. For Mr. Bennet is harassed by ecclesiastical differences which seem strangely trivial to the lay mind, and by his efforts to keep in with the great lady, Mrs. Millington, that his church may profit from her generosity. And there are deeper, more passionate elements at work in that tranquil setting of marsh and meadow. Theresa, Mrs. Millington's niece, a hoyden, carefree, sexless, with flaming hair and a face "in which youth and health glowed so brightly as to be almost enough beauty in themselves," is one of the most vital characters Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith has drawn. Misled by a passion she does not understand, she flickers like fire through the first half of the book, and when she dies it is like a light put out. The author goes on to tell how the young nonconformist preacher who betrayed her found redemption in scouring the country with a mission to bring souls to forgiveness, advertising his own sin, cheapening the young, ignorant, glorious love Theresa had given him, with his outcry: "O happy fault, which has brought me so great a salvation!" So tell us too of Mr. Bennet's fight over the question of the Sacrament, the sorrows and tribulations that descend on him; of theological disputes that seem —to the lay mind—singularly unessential to religion, but are important enough to Mr. Bennet and his Bishop. It is when Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith turns to the deeper, simpler aspects of life and death, we feel we are moving again among things that matter. Mr. Bennet, after his wife's death, goes for consolation to his old friend and parishioner, Mrs. Iggulsden, and they talk of their dead: "Peering into that invisible world, guessing and conjecturing with the simplicity of unquestioning faith, they were like two children who, their heads together, peer through the key-hole of a dark room. . . . Neither had the slightest fear or even a thought that on the opening of that door they might find only darkness." The characters are real and vivid : Poor Emily with her imaginary son, little Arthur ; Mrs. Bennet ; the old country folk with their unconscious humour and the tragedies and ironies of their lives ; not to mention Mr. Bennet himself and Theresa. And, as in life, the narrow interests of the parish mingle with and survive the soaring passions of human love and sorrow.

HUDSON RIVER BRACKETED.[3]

The curious title of this book alludes to a form of architecture found on the banks of the Hudson River, which opens the eyes of young Vance Weston to the mystic glories of the past and to the possibilities of his own future. For Vance Weston is what we must call—for lack of a less affected, self-conscious term—a creative artist. When at the age of nineteen, to recover from an illness brought on by a thwarted love romance, he was sent to Paul's Landing on the Hudson River, it was his first glimpse of the past. He had always lived in new towns ; his father and grandfather were real estate agents ; his mother, " a small, round-faced woman with a resolute mouth, had always stayed at home, looked after her children, fed her husband well, and whenever he made a ' turn-over,' bought a picture or a piano-cover to embellish one or the other of their successive dwellings." His grandmother had a passion to reform everything and a cheerful religious zeal. Between trade and religion, " Mr. Weston making clients come to the suburbs as his mother-in-law made them come to Jesus," Vance was brought up ignorant of all that later was to mean his life. The old house on the Hudson, and the swift intelligence and flyaway humour of Halo Spear, reveal him to himself. From that time on we see him developing his powers as a writer, marrying the wrong girl, while Halo, whom he should have married, makes her own mistaken alliance to help her family out of money difficulties. It is not easy for a writer to draw the portrait of a writer, but Mrs. Wharton has done it in a masterly way, giving as background the literary circles of New York, as well as Vance's home life and, behind everything, that strangely mixed family from which he has sprung. The characterisation shows her usual skill and sympathy, and Mrs. Wharton has always a spontaneous and refreshing humour.

JOHN TODHUNTER.*

Dr. John Todhunter, who died at the end of 1916 in his seventy-seventh year, was never a very prominent figure in literature. He had a genuine if slender talent for poetry, but no driving impulse towards it. He was a man of culture who loved the verses of the great poets and enjoyed writing verses of his own ; but though his taste was sufficiently pronounced to make him, while still quite young, abandon the profession of medicine for that of literature, he was, like many other men who were drawn into the Irish literary movement, essentially an amateur. And it is as an amateur that Mr. W. B. Yeats, who understands only a passionate and complete devotion to his art, has written of him, not without condescension, in " The Trembling of the Veil " :

> " There was [in the Bedford Park colony about 1890] John Todhunter, a well-off man who had bought my father's pictures while my father was still Pre-Raphaelite ; once a Dublin doctor, he was now a poet and a writer of poetical plays ; a tall, sallow, lank, melancholy man, a good scholar and a good intellect. . . . If he had liked anything strongly he might have been a famous man, for a few years later he was to write, under some casual patriotic impulse, certain excellent verses now in all anthologies ; but with him every book was a new planting, and not a new bud on an old bough."

Todhunter's first book of verse was published before Mr. Yeats was in his teens, but there is little in it beyond quite accomplished echoes of Shelley and Keats ; and though there is stronger imagination and more individuality in the poems which he wrote to interpret great music, no art can be very satisfactorily employed in the interpretation of another. When his first book of specifically Irish poems appeared, " The Wanderings of Usheen " was already known to the world ; so it may be that the older poet was influenced by the younger. In some of the Irish group printed in this new selection, which has been made by his widow and Mr. Alfred Perceval Graves, one seems to catch a hint of the Yeatsian cadence, and it was at Mr. Yeats's persuasion that he wrote a pastoral play, which was performed with no little success. He was too a member of the Rhymers' Club, of which Mr. Yeats was a leading spirit, and would sit at table at the " Cheshire Cheese " with men who were nearly all by many years his juniors.

Todhunter then was a sincere and graceful versifier, but definitely a minor poet ; and the question arises whether, half a generation after his death, it was worth while to revive a substantial body of his work. It may be allowed that it was, though perhaps a slenderer volume would have better served his memory ; and perhaps a reprint of the Irish poems alone, best of all. The Irish lyrics are full of that dim, sweet melancholy which, though it is the commonplace of the Celtic Renaissance, still has power to charm :

> " Oh ! the voices of the wind, the soft sweet voices,
> The melancholy voices of the wind,
> Bear me gently to the peaks of ancient vision,
> The lone and silent mountains of the mind . . ."

But the bardic tales strike an altogether more individual note. The source of these was Standish O'Grady's prose renderings of Gaelic legend, and like O'Grady himself—and unlike Mr. Yeats, who has never exactly attempted it—Todhunter did catch something of the primitive saga spirit. " The Death of Conlaoch " is a vigorous version of the legend which gave Mr. Yeats the theme of " On Baille's Strand " and is the Irish equivalent of " Sohrab and Rustum " ; but it is " The Doom of the Children of Lir " which stands out as by far the most striking thing in the whole volume. In this long tale of the king's children who were turned into swans for nine hundred years, their wanderings and sufferings and redemption, the poet achieved an atmosphere eerie and remote, of " perilous seas in faery lands forlorn." For once he came near to great poetry.

WOMEN–SAINTLY AND OTHERWISE.*

Women are decidedly the majority of the characters portrayed by Edith O'Shaughnessy and Karel Capek ; and they are viewed by the former from the American feminine, and by the latter from the Continental masculine angle. But the former characterisation is too limited ; for although Mrs. O'Shaughnessy dates her foreword from Bar Harbour, her insight is deeper and more comprehensive than any racial interpretation. Her pen is a wand, not an American writing instrument. And wands have no nationality.

On the " jacket " of " Other Ways and Other Flesh " is depicted an odd jumble of quaint yellow-roofed houses, a maze of yellow-tinged, steeply-stepped streets, all dominated by an amorphous yellow-tinged building which is obviously a church. Presumably this conglomeration is intended to suggest the dominant note of Rankweil, that " straggling, cornelian-coloured " town of the Austrian Tyrol where dwelt the " Other Flesh " of the book's title. The design was happily conceived. It does provide the reader with a helpful mental background against which to view those types of Rankweil womanhood to whom he is introduced. But why Rankweil more than any other ancient town of the Vorarlberg? The poignancy of the answer strikes the key-note of these pages:

* " Other Ways and Other Flesh." By Edith O'Shaughnessy. 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)—" Money, and Other Stories." By Karel Capek. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)—" The Meeting Place, and Other Stories." By J. D. Beresford. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

"During a generation it was to my mother and myself a curtained corner of existence behind which lay the tragedy of a son's, a brother's, life. Thence we would go back to the company of 'captains and kings'—to that other world of ours, only again and again to return, always to return, till the last time—after which one returns no more. . . ."

From the tender memories of those days these studies of Rankweil folk have been written. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy says she does not know why she has told one story rather than another; but the explanation is simple: her sympathy has been most arrested by a saintly quality in the lives of those Rankweil people whom she has added to literature. And that also explains why the majority are women. Even in "The Doctor's Story" it is the image of the Countess which dominates the picture. Naturally the writer's mother has a place in this gallery—a portrait touched with tenderness and love. And suggesting a reflection which will move all mother lovers:

"How rarely sons and daughters think of their mother as young! Indeed who, really, wants a mother to be young? There is something cheating about those vague visionings of her youth when she was thus and so—but not for them; something hooded, unembodied about her once-separated, entirely personal life, her unthinkable loves, as they cross the memory of grown children, who consider her most preciously in her ripeness or old age, in her 'motherliness.' If there be earthly recompense for woman's vanished youth it is in this nearly universal enshrining, homaging of them when their particular and personal life is over."

What the daughter found in that mother, the supremacy of the spirit over its circumstances, she discerned too in those women of Rankweil who live in these pages—in the sisters who managed the Inn of the Trout, in the tailor's wife whose motherhood was inexhaustible, and in the nun of the hospice whose story is akin to that of Evangeline in Longfellow's poem. It is because of that quality in these studies that they constitute a book which has all the ministering solace of great poetry, for here is "emotion remembered in tranquillity."

Women too are preponderant in Karel Capek's studies; but their chief quality is far from that of saintliness. The sisters of "Money" are avid for their brother's property and lie to wrest it from each other; Helena succumbs to sex; the woman of "Three" is a mistress for mercenary reasons; the landlady of "The Shirts" is a thief; the wife of "The Bully" is faithless. There is a dramatic power about these studies which justifies John Galsworthy's "unusual" and "power" and "flavour," but they would have gained had they revealed some of the humour of "Letters from England." And inasmuch as they all merely leave off instead of ending, they are hardly truthfully classified as "stories."

On the other hand, the contents of Mr. J. D. Beresford's volume are correctly described as "stories," for they do move to a completed climax. Perhaps the title story, "The Meeting Place," has been given pride of position because it was "one of the best-paid items" in the collection, and Mr. Beresford offers it to short-story writers as an example of the popular sentimental type; but he is balanced enough in his own judgment to prefer "The Man Who Hated Flies." But readers of all tastes will find something to enjoy whether in tears or laughter.

ITALIAN IMPRESSIONS.*

If I were seeking a companion with whom to wander abroad I should pray for such a one as Karel Capek. I had just returned from Italy with certain unconventional reservations and enthusiasms for that country confirmed or newly discovered; I met them one by one refreshingly set forth in Capek's delightful "Letters from Italy." These impressions startle us first by their non-acceptance of the conventions, and then by their immunity from any suggestion of the "bright young thing" attitude. They are not in any way self-conscious. When the author is enthusiastic he lets it be seen; you know he is the kind of person who could be almost hurt by too poignant beauty, and hurt more by insensitive people pretending to share his admiration. So he could travel unpremeditatively through Italy and jot down his always fresh impressions, ashamed neither of his ecstasies nor of his heresies. He can laugh at things, at people and at himself.

He commences with a list of "What Displeased Me"; item four reads: "St. Mark's. This is not architecture, but an orchestrion: one looks for a chink to throw in a sixpence so that the whole machine may give out O Venezia." He can create a scene or a mood in a phrase: "Vesuvius exhales a small mass of white wadding" which could hardly be bettered for description; or: "I shall not talk with you of art at Florence. There is far too much, so that the head spins round; finally one stares in stupefaction at a corner stone in the belief that it is a fresco," which cannot be bettered for impressionistic truth. This is safe from the pomposity of the ordinary guide-book, and though throughout Baedeker the stars in their courses fight against Capek one feels the soundness of his judgments. Somewhere he says: "Perhaps I have a spirit far too unhistorical; my best impressions of the antique are rather derived from the order of nature . . . a solitary laurus nobilis by a split column, an enormous black adder in the courtyard of the house of the tragic poet at Pompeii, the odour of mint and begonias—ah, the most beautiful and boundless in the world are not things but moments, seconds which cannot be detained."

The charm and the value of the book come from the sincerity of its spirit, and from the interwoven sanity and humour of matter and manner. When Capek says that Michelangelo fails us because he could not depict God resting upon the seventh day, or "with Botticelli there is always a deep, settled and lowering expression of colds in the head, since his angelic creations live in paradisaical coolness," there is this element of sound criticism behind the surface frivolity. His theory that Italy always swerves back to that exuberance of expression which we now call baroque is novel and worthy of serious attention.

Because of its method the style of the writing lacks that polish we ask of an artist, but its spontaneity is a compensating virtue, and Karel Capek's little book remains one of the most friendly and intimate of travel impressions. It is somewhat spoiled by half a dozen stilted little pen-drawings of places which fail to reflect the spirit of the writing.

SIX ESSAYISTS.*

Of the six volumes of essays before me, five are by well-known writers. Familiarity is the essence of friendship, and friendship is the essence of the essayist's art. It implies no deprecation of the other four authors, therefore, to say that Mrs. Woolf alone breaks new ground and gives us some surprise. I have paid tribute elsewhere to her latest book, and, in fairness to her and myself, I can only repeat in other words what I have already said. I say it the more gladly because Mrs. Woolf, especially in her novels, has sometimes left me a little uncertain about my own judgment. But "A Room of One's Own" leaves me in no doubt. It strikes me as being a book of pure and sustained inspiration, crystal clear in thought and expression, and presenting a point of view about the nature of women and the right relation between the sexes that is ahead of our own time, yet eminently sane and fundamentally traditional as compared with much of the hot-headed nonsense written upon the subject to-day. Mrs. Woolf recognises that the best women are those who have in them something of the man, as the best men are those who have an infusion of femininity. She believes, furthermore, that the highest creative art can only be attained by a union, in an individual of either sex, of the man-woman qualities. But that union cannot be achieved save when the man or woman is most truly, but least consciously, a man or a woman as the case may be. In other words, we need to get rid of the preoccupation with sex as sex. The sexes will, and should, be different; but we must dispel from our minds all hoary notions about superiority or inferiority. The best development of either sex depends upon that of the other. Men in theory are free, but in actual fact they are fettered by their patronising attitude towards women. Women on the other hand, though they have won political freedom, have still only begun to emerge from intellectual and spiritual bondage. Setting out to answer the question why there has never yet been a female Shakespeare, Mrs. Woolf finds the simple reason is that the highest imaginative work demands financial independence and "a room of one's own." Women as a class have hitherto lacked that independence, and the lack of it has fostered in them those mental and spiritual complexes destructive of the pure and sex-unconscious (though not sexless) harmony of being from which alone genius can come to full fruition. Mrs. Woolf raises many controversial issues, some of which might be disputed if space allowed. But her main thesis is thoroughly sound, and her method of exposition—with its semi-fictional setting, and its mingled fantasy, satire, and direct criticism—is extraordinarily charming and persuasive. "A Room of One's Own" does (only more gracefully and brilliantly) for the intellectual and spiritual freedom of women what Mary Wollstonecraft and John Stuart Mill did in earlier days for the political emancipation.

Roman Catholic propaganda has found its way by insinuation into Mr. Chesterton's more recent collections of general essays. In the present volume he has taken off the gloves and appears as a frank Catholic apologist. "I would undertake," he says, "to take any topic at random, from pork to pyrotechnics, and show that it illustrates the truth of the one true philosophy; so realistic is the remark that all roads lead to Rome." Many of Mr. Chesterton's readers will prefer the pork and the pyrotechnics to the Roman Catholicism; for, happily, if he cannot write about pork without writing about Rome, the converse is equally true. For myself, while I think that it too often obscures the pure and simple spirit of Christianity, I have an inherited or acquired passion for theological controversy, and I cannot help revelling in Mr. Chesterton's vitality and dexterity even when I most fervently disagree with him. Moreover, I admire his consistent good humour and (as controversy goes) his fairness. He has not forgotten that he once sat "at the feet of that admirable man, Stopford Brooke"; and it will interest BOOKMAN readers to know that he still has a good word to say for Bunyan, and that he criticises Mr. Noyes for his recent "excessive" attack. In a word, Mr. Chesterton—much as he will resent the suggestion—is greater than his creed, and in some of his essays (such as "The Spirit of Christmas") he raises us into a spiritual atmosphere in which Christians of every religious denomination or none may breathe.

Much oftener though I agree with him, I find Mr. Richard King a trifle flat after Mr. Chesterton. His gospel of kindliness and unsectarian spirituality is a little too serene and facile—a little too obviously adapted to the Society audience to which, in the first instance, the essays were week by week addressed. I seem to detect in it a lack of vital contact with reality. The book is more of a soporific than a tonic. Still, a soporific is the right thing "At the Close of Day." Mr. King's title is happily chosen; his pleasant, quiet philosophy is well adapted for the bedside shelf. He has, I know, many admirers, and they will not be disappointed in his new work.

In his introduction to "By Way of Introduction" Mr. Milne tells us that he no longer, as of old, writes a regular weekly essay, and he frankly explains that, in order to meet the demand of his publishers, he has collected into his new volume a number of prefaces written for other books, as well as a few book reviews and some contributions to public controversies in the Press. He deals, among other matters, with the art of Fougasse, "Saki" and Mr. E. H. Shepard; he discusses dramatic art and craft; he has much to say about (and against) spiritualism; and in lighter vein he writes about golf, village cricket and children's books. He gives us a whimsical chapter about his own poem, "The King's Breakfast," and, finally, he tells us why he has decided to write no more about Christopher Robin. Incidentally he calls our attention to the fact that Christopher Robin is actually mentioned in only three of the forty-four poems that comprise "When We Were Very Young." That book, Mr. Milne assures us, owes far more to the recollection of his own childhood and to his own later imaginings than to the observation of his son, who has attained a notoriety which he neither intended nor desired for him.

"Evoe," in his latest collection of Punch papers, again proves himself a sparklingly satirical and witty commentator on modern fads and foibles. He is always light and gay; but true wisdom sometimes underlies his humour, as when he exposes the fallacy that our modern inventions and "comforts" necessarily increase happiness. "The Toady's Handbook" is a clever skit on the "outline" treatises on every imaginable subject that pour so freely nowadays from the press. But Mr. Murrell, like "Evoe," is a genuine philosopher at heart. His little book is excellent fun; but behind the fun are real scholarship and a shrewd observation of human vanities.

GILBERT THOMAS.

JOHN FERGUSON.

Modern Scottish literature lost a singular and beloved figure two years ago by the tragically sudden death, at an early age, of my friend, Mr. John Ferguson, the Stirling banker-poet; and few books of poetry have ever achieved the curious and unpredictable success of his small collection of sonnets, "Thyrea," which, with a number of later sonnets, forms the contents of the welcome Memorial Edition of his work.*

Readers who saw in 1912 the first edition of "Thyrea," consisting of just seven sonnets, with the tragedies of a sanatorium for their theme, and failed to imagine the success so slight a volume was going to have, cannot be blamed. Who but Mr. Ferguson would have challenged the verdict of the reading public with a mere septet of sonnets? Yet no one perhaps was more amazed at the book's success and whimsically apprehensive of becoming a "best-seller" on the strength of it.

There were one or two, however, and notable amongst them the late Dr. W. L. Courtney, who discerned the uncommon quality of the tiny collection, and whose praise was in a measure responsible for the success it achieved.

> "Here," said Dr. Courtney, "is a booklet of sonnets which I warmly commend to the judicious reader. Mr. Ferguson has an individual note which gives distinction to his work. He confines himself to the sonnet form, which he handles with considerable ease and skill, and I think he is at his best when he deals with solemn themes. Read, for instance, 'L'Envoi,' or 'Chopin's Marche Funèbre,' or 'Beethoven,' and you will recognise the dignity of Mr. Ferguson's Muse and his capacity for august harmonies. But he has another aspect of his work to give us, a modern, up-to-date quality. . . . In this mood he does not hesitate to write a line like 'Twice nightly thus, for thirty bob a week,' or 'His biz and cackle done he gets a round.' . . . But to my mind he has never done better than in the last six lines of the sonnet dedicated to David Gray. I can only hope that of 'Thyrea' as well as of 'The Luggie' it may be said:
> "'Fragrant thy memory, and thy star shall be > Luminous among the lesser orbs of song.'"

* "Thyrea." By John Ferguson. With Introduction by St. John Adcock. 5s. (Melrose.)

The volume speedily developed and found its public in a fashion that seemed likely to answer Dr. Courtney's hope. It ran into no fewer than fourteen editions before its author's death—each of these a genuine new edition in that it contained additions to the original contents. All of these additions were sonnets too, and Mr. Ferguson continued his innovations and added to his initial hospital theme one or two other subjects equally foreign to the traditions of his form—incidents and impressions of vaudeville, pantomime, theatrical touring in the provinces, second-hand shops, and the like. Consider some of his titles—" The Star Lead," " At a Pawnbroker's Window,' " On a Chorus Girl," " The Circus Clown," " Christ at 'Aladdin,' " " On a Low Comedian," " Mr. Vincent Crummles's Pony," " On a Gymnastic Contortionist," " The Property Man," " The Wardrobe Mistress," " The Advertisement Columns of a Theatrical Newspaper," and " On an Equestrienne," and such lines as these:

John Ferguson.

> " He doffs his sceptre when the 'tabs' descend
> And hurries homeward to a midnight meal
> —A mug of porter and a sausage roll "— or

> " Defeat was in his eye and long despair,
> And gin-and-water written on his nose."

But compare them with the concluding lines of his sonnet on the gymnastic contortionist:

> " No proud theatric crown he strives to gain,
> Content and happy could he but remain,
> For ever lithe, if not for ever young."

If he did not hesitate to use stage and other slang, and the most deliberate prosaicisms of matter and manner, yet his final effects were always in keeping with the nobilities of the sonnet. The secret of his success in this experimentation undoubtedly lay in a very unusual understanding of the sonnet form, of which the fact that he confined himself to it was another aspect. He could not do otherwise, and understood the conditions of his power well enough never to try. Such self-understanding and restraint are literary virtues of sufficient rarity at any time.

Apart from his sonnets, Mr. Ferguson's only literary work was to edit David Gray's " In the Shadows " (work akin to his own " Thyrea," in subject if not in spirit or treatment), and do a certain amount of reviewing, mainly of poetry, for a Glasgow daily. He was a lean, tallish man who always reminded me of Mr. Cunninghame Graham in his distinction of manner and complete unlikeness to the Scot as conventionally conceived. His interests were excessively improbable in a Scottish banker; his manner, when he chose to doff his business mask and display his real character, had a volatile vivacity, a wealth of gesticulation, and a courtesy more Castilian than Caledonian; he was the soul of generosity, and many humble folks in Stirling lost their best (and least suspected) friend when he died. He had little or no opportunity for indulging his interest in theatrical life, and his literary friends were few and far between. His letters, of which I have a large collection, were written with a profusion of complimentary expressions and ceremonial mannerisms at the furthest possible remove from a business style, or any ordinary modern mode. All this was in keeping with the divers paradoxes of his personality and position—a banker and a poet (almost a contradiction in terms and certainly a very unusual combination—and in Scotland at that!); a sonneteer whose work was going into edition after edition, and yet in matter and manner was quite foreign to the preconceptions and prejudices in regard to poetry (and propriety) of the people in whose midst he was set, and concerned with kinds of experience and emotion totally unfamiliar to most of them; and one who was constitutionally incapable of taking advantage of the improbable success of his work by adding so much as one extra sonnet per annum to his slender output. " My God, Grieve," he wrote me every now and again, " my mind is a total blank. You will understand and pity."

The Memorial Edition of his sonnets will be welcomed by admirers all over the world. " Guid gear gangs in sma' buik," and of no Scottish poet's work has this ever been so true as of the poetry of John Ferguson—the only sonneteer of consequence Scotland has yet produced. Mr. Courtney hoped—and his hope was amply justified—that the second edition of " Thyrea " would enjoy a success equal to that of the first. Mr. St. John Adcock need have no fear but that his Memorial Edition will continue the process and give it another lease of life, for behind the odd themes of Mr. Ferguson's Muse a powerful and perennial appeal shows itself, just as, in his own sonnet on Blackpool, he discerned how:

> " O tinsel town, for ever clear and strong,
> Above thy halls of laughter and of song,
> Chants the portentous, the sagacious sea."

"MYSTERY AND ECSTASY AND STRANGE HORROR."

If we are to accept as a criterion the most widely applauded manifestations of recent months in literature the general reader is content nowadays with the mere facts of things. The spirit behind the facts, that alone makes them in any way significant, that enables us to perceive bigness and harmony where otherwise all is just discord and smallness, has been ignored and neglected. This of course is an indictment, and deliberately so, because the short-sightedness of the general reader has meant a deplorable lowering of artistic standards. It has also meant a cruel slighting of much of the contemporary literature that really matters.

Since for example the publication of " Medusa,"* by Mr. E. H. Visiak, I have carefully watched for signs that the so-called arbiters of current literature are " sitting up and taking notice," as the slang of the moment has it. But has Mr. Visiak's remarkable story been acclaimed by these super-reviewers? Have they stirred their followers to any noticeable excitement about it? Ask the publisher who was discerning enough to publish " Medusa "—the best sea-novel since Masefield and Conrad.

" Medusa " is described as " a story of mystery and ecstasy and strange horror." One need hardly add anything to that, for the imagination is stirred immediately. " Will Harvell, of Portishead," is supposed to have set down the enthralling narrative in his old age, Mr. Visiak being ostensibly the editor. The use of this ancient machinery is thoroughly justified; for it gives the real author scope for the beautiful round English with which he long since proved himself—in his well-remembered " Buccaneer Ballads " and " Flints and Flashes "—a magician. By round English I mean what Synge would call " full and ripe as an apple." One passage, taken at random, will illustrate it:

> " I took hold of his arm and shook him. The look upon his face was terrible to me. There was some significance in those eyeballs, that glared—or seemed to glare—on me as with some wicked and impetuous joy. My soul recoiled—yea, did start back with a loathing and shuddering motion. I violently turned from the sight. It now came into my thoughts, recollecting how I had been cast down by that monstrous savage creature into the orifice in the rock (as I have related), that this dreadful place was a sort of caravan under the sea."

The story reads warmly, strongly and thrillingly. I cannot indicate its nature in any better way than by quoting a few of the chapter titles: "Strange Mysterious Adventures Before Embarking," "The Voyage Commenced," "The Ghost Scare," "Violent Strange Behaviour of Obadiah," "Astonishing Mystery of the Pirate Ship," "Appearance of Lights in the Sea," "Gorgonian Terror." Beneath all this—and the actual pages the headings prepare us for so delectably—is something else, though, and it is through his symbolism that Mr. Visiak achieves his main triumph. "Medusa" is an incarnation of the wildness, the outlandishness, which results in the primitive and fundamental passions of human beings in conflict with the elements. It is poetry as well as a rattling yarn.

Mr. O'Neill's prose, being that of dialogue and exclamatory sentences, is naturally very different from Mr. Visiak's. But in "Lazarus Laughed"† the imagination is stirred in the "Medusa" way by this tremendous epic of the New Testament character whom Christ awakened from the dead. Lazarus has been vouchsafed a sight of the Beyond, and he returns to declare to the multitudes of old Rome that "there is no death, there is only God's eternal laughter." His message and the laughing certitude with which he delivers it actually drive away from a sensual, cruel and degenerate people the fear of death, and in a play of four acts full of colour, movement and spirit we see a world transformed, and yet at the end plunged back into its ancient misery and apprehension through the enmity towards Lazarus of Caligula, who can only reign triumphantly as long as the people around him are held in subjection by his cruelty and madness. Here again we have a deeper symbolism, and it is expressed most vividly in Mr. O'Neill's unforgettable tableau to a scene in Act III.

Mr. O'Neill has written nothing finer than "Lazarus Laughed." To appreciate the height to which he has ascended in the art of the drama we need turn only to "Dynamo," the play which is bound up in the same volume. "Dynamo" could have been written by at least one other dramatist—an American—of our day. "Lazarus Laughed" could no more have been written by anyone else than its author, than anyone except Mr. Visiak could have written "Medusa."

STUDIES IN LITERATURE.*

It is not perhaps altogether strange that in these islands it is the professors who save us from pedantry and professionalism. This is true in many branches of learning, but especially in the humanities—names come quickly to the mind: Verrall, R. Y. Tyrrell, Gilbert Murray, Walter Raleigh, and one who, living in the ultimate parts of the West, has always been at the centre of things—he who is King Edward VII Professor of English Literature in the University of Cambridge, Arthur Quiller-Couch. Having spent so many years in the making of enjoyable literature, Q. now spends his time in making literature enjoyable. The dumps and the glooms, the dry-acres and commaphils shall not win, if he can help it. As doughtily and vehemently as George Saintsbury, he pleads for the recognition of beauty, for the place of pleasure, for the glorious truth that all good literature is a source of happiness. In this new volume of lectures, essays and addresses, Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's appeal is as wide as ever. There is an extraordinarily sensitive introduction to the English elegy, distinguishing nicely and justly between the elegy which is classical in inspiration—"Lycidas" or "Adonais"—and the elegy inspired by more personal emotion, "the passionate direct Elegy"—Wordsworth's "Lucy," Cowper on "His Mother's Picture": the two papers that make up the study are a model of statement, insinuation, quotation and apt proportion. Any critic who could master the manner used by Sir Arthur in these two lectures would be highly fitted for his task; they make most modern critical writings, especially of the more pretentious critics, seem fumbling and misshapen. I only wish he could have found space to mention what has always been to me one of the loveliest and simplest of the direct elegies, general though it is—Charles Lamb's: All, all are gone; the old familiar faces. I am grateful however that he does praise and quote from that neglected poet, William Barnes, of Dorset; how we should feast and praise him if he only had been born north instead of west, and written in that Doric instead of in the softer speech of Wessex.

As an example of the felicity with which Sir Arthur treats subjects too often handled with an unworthy heaviness, I will quote a passage from the excellent lecture on Longinus, author of the treatise on the Sublime. The passage begins with a quotation from his author:

"As I have written elsewhere, Sublimity is the echo of a great soul. . . . The truly eloquent must be free from low and ignorant thoughts: since it is not possible that men with mean and servile ideas and aims prevailing throughout their lives should produce what is admirable and worthy of immortality. Great accents we expect to fall from the lips of those whose thoughts are weighty: and things in excelsis make a province for lofty minds.'

"Knowing this, and aware of it so well that even in the few by-ways of his tract this one truth never deserts his side, Longinus is equally sure that (whatever may be said for rhetoric) poetry is the right medium in which the greatest of souls reveal and express themselves: and his criticism of any poetical passage may equally be relied on for enjoyment (for gusto, if you will) and for sure judgment. He is not one of your finality men. For his age—whether we decide to assign him to the first century or the third—he is often quite curiously modern. To him the world owes, if by accident, an eternal debt for having preserved to it in this treatise, an exquisite lyric of Sappho's, even as it owns a like to Dionysius for having embalmed in his De Compositione, as it is called, that other marvellous thing of hers:

ποικιλόθρον', ἀθάνατ' Ἀφροδίτα

"But how 'modern' must have appeared, to any contemporary reader, the citation from the Pentateuch of the right way to make a God speak:

"'Similarly the legislator of the Jews, no ordinary man, having formed and expressed a worthy conception of the Godhead, writes at the very beginning of his Laws, God said— What? "Let there be light," and there was light: "Let there be land," and there was land.'"

Among the best of the other papers in this volume is an exquisite and just tribute to the genius of Dorothy Wordsworth. Lovely as these lectures are, I feel a little resentful of the limitations that this form has here imposed on Sir Arthur. I want far more. It is perhaps useless now to write at large on Wordsworth's attitude to and treatment of his sister, and Sir Arthur touches on this with the delicacy we expect from him; but I do wish he had had room to bring on this tenderest and most self-abnegating of creatures the genius for sympathetic reconstruction that he displayed in "Hetty Wesley." Perhaps, if he can get the leisure, Q. will give us a novel about Dorothy Wordsworth. It is interesting to note that Q., in an incidental remark on the relations between Wordsworth and his sister, supports a contention recently made by Mrs. Woolf in "A Room of Her Own":

"It is not of Comedy alone that we can say, with Meredith, that it flourishes only when women are on the road to an equal footing with men in attainments and liberty. We can say of literature in general that only when women are on the road to an equal footing with men and enjoy an equal liberty, have they anything like an equal chance."

The kind of fairness, of even-minded courtesy that shows itself in such a passage as that is characteristic of Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch as a critic. I have before now reminded this generation of readers that Q. was one of the earliest of our critics to welcome the younger generation and to find merit in revolutionary kinds of literature. The readiness to do this, nay, the very power to do it, depends on a quality which we are in danger of losing in criticism, the quality of cool-mindedness. Only the other day one of the more intelligent of our younger critics stated that, in his approach to Dante, he had naturally to cope with a prejudice against Pre-Raphaelite imagery, natural to his generation. It is a good thing that he should recognise this prejudice; but he should never really have entertained it. The first rule a critic of the arts must observe is that he is the judge of all works of art with reference to their own time. It is here Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch constantly and abundantly satisfies us; he can be trusted —and it is true of not many critics—never to denounce a man for his obedience to the limitation of his time or of his culture.

RE-ENTER MR. GALSWORTHY.*

Two Galsworthies are to hand: first, "The Roof," in the familiar little neat edition of the separate plays; second, more momentous, a complete volume of Mr. Galsworthy's dramatic work to date—momentous because it may imply (though one hopes not) that the author presents it as his final output in playwriting; also because it is a model of the way in which such a book can and should be produced. Readers may count themselves well served by Mr. Galsworthy's publishers—first in the two thick volumes of the Forsyte novels, and now in this collection of plays. Messrs. Duckworth's volume, at its very moderate price, is an achievement on which both the author and his publishers must be jointly congratulated.

And how well they read, these plays—both the old friends and the newer. The recent production of "The Roof" at the Vaudeville Theatre (on the not inappropriate evening of November 5th) found critics in two minds. Some were disposed to deprecate a lack of ethical ballast: as though a new "Strife" or "Justice" were demandable whenever Mr. Galsworthy re-enters the theatre. Others, contrariwise, found too much ballast—too much talk of "life," too much lurking allegory. I should be disinclined to read into "The Roof" more ethical significance than perhaps its author intended; I am not, certainly, prepared to believe that its climax of action (the heroism of the rotter Brice) is meant to sum up and to crystallise its whole moral gesture. We are given a series of vignettes, an assorted collection of characters whose common denominator is their mere accidental presence at the same hotel. We are shown them reacting in their different ways to a simultaneous catastrophe. They are interesting, entertaining, often highly amusing; need one ask more of them, or seek to cramp them too straitly into an allegorical waistcoat? I should prefer to take them realistically, rather, as little pictures of our civilisation, fulfilling their destiny of entertainment by their fidelity to type; for this they certainly do.

Only the frame that holds them, binding them into a play, has certain flaws in its realism. Old Gustave's bolt towards the upper regions for company, instead of towards the street for help, is the most serious of these. Another is the incredible depletion of the hotel staff at so early an hour. Another, in the last scene upon the actual roof, is the prolonged confabulation of the fugitives in mid-stage, when one feels their first impulse would have been to stampede to the parapet and shout " Fire ! " Was the producer nodding at this point? Should he not rather have let the parapet (in Shakespearean phrase) o'erhang and jutty his confounded orchestra; so that the victims could crowd towards it naturally, without giving us their backs? Firemen emerging from the orchestra, and the chute vanishing into its depths, might have made matters easier for both players and audience here.

But such small flaws on the realistic plane were more than compensated, even on that same plane, by the consummate excellence of the cast. Mr. Galsworthy has always been well served in this respect, no doubt because his truth to character inspires fine acting: and never better than here. As Gustave, Mr. Horace Hodges was consistently perfect, nor were the rest far behind. In their hands the story ran away with the allegory. I have no means of knowing if Mr. Galsworthy intended this to be so. At all events, cast and producer did: and had the last word in it.

SAINTS AND FAIRIES.*

If you want to step into the atmosphere of Ireland, to catch the mingled fancifulness and crudeness of its peasants which, welded together in these stories, evolve a philosophy that embraces all the religions and the " Dark Gentleman " himself, you should not miss the narratives Peter Pelican the Poet, Tom the Tight-line and Rafty the Tinker have to tell. Here you will find quaint Irish humour and whimsical Irish sentiment, centred on the Convent of the Little Sisters of Saint Francis, where wandering folk of the road came and went, and where stranger things came and went also, or came and did not go—such things as the Lady out of the Sea, and the pathetic Leprehcaun who wanted a soul, and the Banshee, and the Gentleman Who Was Sorry. That indeed, the last story in the book, is one of the most charming in a collection of stories, each charming and arresting in its particular way, and each told in an easy Irish style, touched with the magic of poetry. " The Dark Gentleman himself seemed to like being in the kitchen, but whether it was because the gentle Sister Agatha was doing the cooking, or because he liked to sit by the fire looking into the glowing heart of the coals, sorra a bit of me knows."

Mr. Shaw Desmond.

In the kitchen he encounters the Leprechaun, only visible to the sisters who have " the sight." " ' I do like to be lookin' at the sparks going up and out into the wide world,' says the Leprechaun. ' I'm rather fond of sparks meself,' says the Dark Gentleman. ' Are ye, Sir ? ' said Macdhuv, cocking one green eye up at him as though he had the understandin' of him, as they say. But indeed, right from the start Macdhuv seemed to understand the Dark Gentleman very well indeed. ' I am, that same,' said the Dark Gentleman, polishing his nails upon the legs of his trousers and thinkin' hard. ' 'Tis nice and warm down here, Sir,' said Macdhuv. ' 'Tis damned hot and lovely,' said the Dark Gentleman. . . ." Eventually the Leprechaun declares he will pray for the Dark Gentleman " ' at the gates of hell itself. . . . Sure, didn't the Good Lord give me a sowl itself and for why shouldn't I save that of another ? ' ' But not mine, Macdhuv,' said the Dark Gentleman as though he was in deep sorrow. ' Yes, even you,' said Macdhuv. ' There's hope for all, even for You Know What.' "

And in this wide tolerance, which includes the Wild Things too, you will find the summing-up of a simple yet profound philosophy.

DURAT IN EXTREMUM.*

Reviewers of War books must be getting—one of them certainly is—sorely gravelled to find generic titles for the articles which they are called upon to pen. " More about the War," " More Soldier Stories," " The Undying War " have come and gone. Still the spate of War books roars by unchecked. Rusticus expectat. What makes people, ten years after the War, write these books ? Who are the people who read them ? And by what literary " law " has it come about that they seem to get better and better every day ? For " Siberian Garrison " is one of the " great " books of the War. We must of course keep our heads. We must repress those rather tiresome symptoms of hysteria brought about by a perusal of " All Quiet on the Western Front " among those simple people who felt a delicious little thrill of wickedness at seeing unprintable words in cold type, and who really thought that details of the technique of field latrines were " stark realism." " Siberian Garrison " is on the same plane as " The Case of Sergeant Grischa," although as a book entirely different, no matter from what point of view it be regarded. Perhaps we can explain ourselves better by saying that Markovits is to the author of " Grischa " as Jane Austen is to Scott; and that to compare the books is to compare " Emma " with " Kenilworth." In " Siberian Garrison " there is very little " big bow-wow stuff." The story indeed deals but indirectly with the Great War. But there are in it the delicate artistry, the flawless perfection of etching, the quiet sarcasm, the humour and the irony of " Persuasion " and " Pride and Prejudice " all fitted to a story from which women are almost entirely absent and over which hover the black clouds of war.

The story, though written in the third person throughout, is undoubtedly an account of the personal experiences of the author. The son of a small Hungarian landlord, he qualified as a Doctor of Law, but from the first regarded letters as his true profession. Called up in 1914, he became an " aspirant "—or budding officer—and was taken prisoner in the great Russian push of 1915. By slow stages he was transferred to a prison camp in the Far East on the borders of Manchuria. Freed by the Revolution and the Treaty of Brest Litovsk, he and his fellows made their way by rail to European Russia, there however to be headed off by the civil war and forced back into Siberia as far as the Yenesei once again. Here they became involved in those amazing happenings when the Czechs who had deserted to the Russians went " White," and seized the whole Siberian Railway—and when later Admiral Koltchak was involved in awful defeat. It was nearly seven years before the author saw his home again.

* " Siberian Garrison." By Rodion Markovits. 8s. 6d. (Peter Davies.)—" Her Privates We." By Private 19022. 7s. 6d. (Peter Davies.)—" Retreat." By C. R. Benstead. 7s. 6d. (Methuen.)—" Plain Tales from Flanders." By Rev. P. B. Clayton, M.C. 3s. 6d. (Longmans.)—" History of the 14th Battalion, A.I.F." By Newton Wanless. 12s. 6d. (Melbourne: Robertson & Mullens.)

In this amazingly brilliant book there are three sectors of outstanding merit. There is the time when the author was called up, and he gives us in a keen, incisive and humorous way the play of action and reaction exerted in his mind by the opposing forces of patriotism and self-preservation. There is, at first, scorn for the slackers who have the effrontery to display an ostentatious regret that their country has passed them by. We had the same humbugs ourselves. "Gad, sir! If I was only ten years younger. Not all the soda, thanks." But on the morning of the medical examination he walks hard and far to puff up his ankles—he suffered from flat feet—and is bitterly chagrined at the surgeon's imperturbable calm when the anatomical imperfection is heatedly pointed out to him. Patriotism swells again when the author is in the training camp, and there is again scorn—this time at the clerks, the employed men and all the other wanglers and lead-swingers of which there seems to have been an amazing number in the Austro-Hungarian army. But after one night under fire at the front the author is glad to take a job in connection with the officers' mess, the Silver Medal for Bravery, Second Class, being held out to him as an inducement. All this is told with a directness and an unforced humour which seem to the writer of this review to be unique among the War books he has read.

It is however in the description of the prison camp in the Far East that the author reaches the full extent of his power. Nothing could be better than the sober etching of that microcosm where regular, reservist and Honved - or militia—officers of the German, Austrian and Turkish officers were herded together. There is nothing of enemy cruelty; as a matter of fact the Russians were extremely considerate, and the prisoners enjoyed at times something between comfort and luxury, although salmon morning, noon and night, and bacon from salmon-fed swine soon palled. The pettiness and the lack of humour of the German mind and the rebellion of the Hungarian intellect against it are exquisitely portrayed. When a theatre is formed and the female parts are given to young, girlish-looking officers a horrible wave of eroticism surges over those segregated males, but the incident is handled with such delicious humour and sarcasm that vice here loses almost half its grossness. The third outstanding period is when the prisoners are forced back into Siberia and food and money are, neither of them, forthcoming. The description of the formation of a community where the officers set up shops and works outside Krasnoyarsk, including everything from a timber yard to a casino, and from a bookbinder's shop to a brothel, is extraordinarily fine. This is a superb book; but seeing that the Odyssey ranges from the Danube to the Yellow Sea, from the Yellow Sea to the Volga, and thence back to the Yenesei, a sketch map is essential. Unfortunately none has been provided.

The title of the next book on our list is one of the neatest we have ever seen—though a little daring, for of course Guildenstern did not quite mean what "Her Privates We" might here be taken to denote. The hero of the book—again it seems that it is a question of autobiography, at any rate up to the last few pages—was of the "sa'ib" class and a man of considerable culture and education. He enlisted early in the Great War, and in spite of hints, suggestions and even positive orders to take a commission, managed to defer the question until Death solved the difficulty in his own ruthless way. The best way to describe this book is to say that it is very like what "All Quiet on the Western Front" would have been had Germany been on the winning side. There is the same character study of the "cannon fodder," there is the same kind of soldier talk—but it seems more manly somehow—and the same ruthless exposure of the beastliness of war without however the atmosphere of defeatism which characterises Herr Remarque's volume. "Her Privates We" is a book of immense power. It has interested the reviewer to try and discover the literary influences under which the author wrote. Shem, Bourne and Martlow are of course Soldiers Three; Martlow is a real instead of an idealised Ortheris.

Heavens! how simple, how Early Victorian, how Della Cruscan (as the rapturous damsel in "Patience" would have put it) seem the happy warriors of Kipling compared with the hard-bitten New Army heroes of Guillemont and the Somme! Sergeant Tozer is Jean from "La Débâcle"—but a Jean in an army where men did not throw away pack and rifle and scream "We are betrayed" when some heavy stuff came along. Glazier's monologue irresistibly suggested Bob Jakin talking to the Gleggs. And in the skilful presentation of quite commonplace incidents—for in this book too there is very little of the big bow-wow stuff—there is even a suggestion of Jane Austen. It may seem odd to bracket her with a book the title of which would have made her faint, every page of which has phrases Emma never knew, and every chapter of which bristles with words which would have sent all the Bennet ladies into a decline. But the bit about "the demure little person" on page 198 is Jane to the life. In one place we had a kind of Rosa Dartle-ish feeling about the eligibility of a major for the Military Cross.

Our heart went out to "Retreat" because the publishers have pasted in the front cover a very useful map, which has even got a scale. The story is of a parson from a peaceful English rectory who comes out as a padre to the Somme front, in 1918, arriving just a few hours before the Big Push. We have seen this book called a "great" one. Not great perhaps; but very good indeed. The types are, so we think, just a little overdrawn; the "pagan" officers are just a bit too pagan, and surely no English rectory in 1918 harboured a clergyman of such abysmal simplicity and of such an entire lack of a sense not only of humour but even of proportion. His character is well summed up by one of the "pagans" towards the end: "Like many another man has done in similar circs, he's got into his head that we're all monsters and that he's a martyr, when all the while we're just ordinary human beings and he's a damned fool." If ever there was a misfit it was the Rev. Elliot Warne, the bachelor cleric of forty-two, intense in his faith but without the nerve to be able to show that his faith was sufficient in the hour of physical danger. The book "grips" all through, and apart from the story itself it is a vindication of the Fifth Army against the politician who made it the scapegoat to save his own skin.

No one ought to read "Retreat" without having by him, or her, "Plain Tales from Flanders," by the Rev. P. B. Clayton, M.C., as an antidote. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Clayton is the founder-padre of the famous Toc-H. There is a curious similarity between the position held by the Rev. Elliott Warne, of fiction, and the Rev. P. B. Clayton of fact, for the former was attached to the mythical 200th Artillery Brigade, while the latter was, for portion of his war service at any rate, part of a real formation of the same kind. His work can therefore be contrasted with the futility of the padre in "Retreat." Quantum mutatus: This was a man. His book is a bundle of a man's memories, some sacred, some jocund, drawn from the private annals of Talbot House in Poperinghe—"Toc H. in Pop." for short. Let anyone read in "Plain Tales" the moving chapter "A Pyx in Flanders" and compare it with the dreadful incident narrated in pages 136–138 of "Retreat." And then let him be thankful that although there may not have been many Claytons in the War, at any rate there were but very few Warnes.

It is just a little hard on "The History of the 14th Battalion of the Australian Expeditionary Force" that it comes up for review with a batch, the other members of which are distinguished by such high literary merit. For this pretends to be nothing else but a plain unvarnished tale. Nevertheless such books as this are the raw material from which the great War novels are written—the stuff that dreams are made on—and no one knows better than the writer of this review the hard, unrelenting toil required for the making of the history of a unit in the Great War. The 14th Battalion of the A.I.F., which formed part of the 4th Brigade, numbered originally a thousand of the very flower of the youth of Melbourne. Here is the story—well and clearly told, with satisfactory maps—of its services in Egypt, Gallipoli and France. There is a good deal about the battle of Bullecourt, where the 4th Brigade was wiped out, which will be new to many people.

THE STRICKEN DEER.

As one who has recently travelled through the same province of life as Lord Cecil has chosen for this biography,* I have taken a particular interest in observing his reactions to the various circumstances of that life and in measuring them by my own. This however does not make the task of just appreciation and criticism easier, although it may ensure a deeper insight than a reviewer generally possesses into the difficulties with which Lord Cecil has had to wrestle in seeking not only to present in detail the facts of Cowper's life, but to illuminate them by understanding.

No one who studies Cowper's life intimately could feel anything but a deepening affection for him. This is indeed

> "a sight for pity to peruse,
> Till she resembles faintly what she views,
> Till sympathy contract a kindred pain,
> Pierced with the woes that she laments in vain."

Yet the more one loves Cowper, the harder it is to be just to those who, however unintentionally, added to his pain by inflaming his imagination or torturing his nerves. It is, in short, very difficult not to make John Newton the villain of the piece. For while admitting that he was in himself and in his dealings with many other folk a striking and estimable man, and even a great power for righteousness of a sort, I cannot but feel, after weighing all the evidence which has been advanced on his side, that the day on which he entered Cowper's life was a disastrous one. It is perfectly true that Cowper had lost his nerve long before he met Newton, and that Newton's creed did not in the first place drive Cowper mad. But in my opinion it contributed more than anything else to the return of his madness at a time in his life when he might have settled into a sanity, periodically threatened only by dark moods, and still worse it attached to this madness a theological formula from which he could never escape.

Lord Cecil however, who takes a more fatalistic view of Cowper's inherent weakness, is proportionately kinder both to Newton and the Evangelical Movement. Of the latter for example he writes: "It alone among the philosophies of its time took account of man's spiritual side, wove into the tapestry of his ordinary life his visions, his enthusiasms, his exaltations, faced and tried to explain the mystery of his existence, the omnipresence of evil, the inevitability of death. The merchant in the counting-house, the spinner in the factory, the old maid in the village, all felt themselves actors in the great drama of mankind's salvation. . . . Finally, Evangelicism—and in this also it was unique among the philosophies of its day—could satisfy the temperament of the artist. For it alone set a supreme value on that emotional exaltation in which the greatest art is produced, it alone made the imagination the centre of its system, and not a mere decorative appendage to it."

We may appreciate this tribute, while suggesting that the fundamental defect of Evangelicism was its failure to distinguish between imaginative ecstasy and sensational excitement. But a biographer of Cowper is not so much concerned with the Evangelical Movement in the abstract as with the immediate effect of certain evangelists upon an excessively sensitive and cultivated temperament. And Lord Cecil does not convince us either that Evangelicism was the only creed which could have cured Cowper's despair in the beginning or that it played so secondary a part in his return to the abyss.

But if we find in his treatment of this central problem of Cowper's life a certain want of searching force, it is the defect of most attractive qualities, chief of which are a consistent sympathy and fairness towards all the actors in this strange domestic drama, a refusal to exploit his subject, as it might so easily be exploited, in the modern ironic manner, and a talent for telling "straightforwardly the story of this extraordinary man" with a gentle animation. Few lives, as he writes, offer so much intimate detail. "From the mass of poems, letters and reminiscences that have come down to us we can reconstruct, not only the outward ordering of his life down to the way he spent each hour, but also the trend and fluctuation of his solitary thought."

* "The Stricken Deer, or the Life of Cowper." By David Cecil. 15s. (Constable.)

And admittedly Lord Cecil's biography would have been more satisfying as a work of art, if he had selected more rigorously, not only in dealing with Cowper himself, but with his friends. Hayley's life, and to a less extent Newton's, previous to their acquaintance with Cowper, are described at undue length. Occasionally too his sympathetic touch comes dangerously near sentimental softness, in such a passage for example as the following: "Compared with her sister's vivid and definite, her personality seems curiously undefined. Her poignant figure glows through Cowper's story with a lambent light of its own; but a tender mist of love floats round it, colouring its outlines. Our rare glimpses of her detect her in some beautiful attitude of regret or tenderness; but we cannot distinguish her features. Through the haze her eyes shine out like stars, yet we fail to discern their shape and colour. Perhaps love inevitably thus cloaks its object."

If however both his fidelity to detail and his feeling for his subjects results sometimes in a certain excess of elaboration and kindly diffuseness, in which the significance of Cowper's inner life is a little blurred, his treatment of the domestic surface is generally admirable. The only mode of life that exactly suited Cowper was, as he writes, "family life," if the phrase may be applied to a life without the responsibility of a family. And of such a life he has rendered an account which will enable any reader to share both its humours and its pathos, as if he were a member of the household.

Novel Notes.

THE MURDER IN ROMNEY MARSH. By Edgar Jepson. 7s. 6d. net. (Herbert Jenkins.)

The problem which young Inspector Carthew had to solve was the mysterious murder of Robert Garfield, a prosperous City man, who was found shot in a lonely parish of Romney Marsh. Garfield, it was soon discovered, had led a double life and had been the leading figure in the wholesale importation of cocaine by aircraft. The apparent affluence of Kate Bolsover, the stepdaughter of the local vicar, gave Carthew an important clue which ultimately led him to success, but before that many false trails were followed up, and suspicion had fallen with apparent certainty on a violent-tempered local farmer who loved Kate Bolsover. The story is full of excitement and unexpected turns, and the interest is maintained to the last page.

VILE BODIES. By Evelyn Waugh. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)

Mr. Waugh introduces us to his characters during a Channel crossing. They are all bound for London, where they indulge in endless parties of one kind or another. There are Adam and Nina; Miss Runcible; Lady Circumference; Mrs. Melrose Ape, the woman evangelist, and her troupe of performing angels who keep their wings in violin-cases; Mr. Outrage, the Prime Minister of this week, and Sir James Brown, the Prime Minister of last week, to name only a few; and there is Colonel Blount. We liked the Colonel because, for a brief page or two while we first visited him, we were hugely amused. The Colonel, for all his "sedentary life," was far more alive than any of them. But the pursuits of Adam Fenwick-Symes and his fellow gossip-writers were really "too sick-making," as Miss Runcible would say. Mr. Symes first had and then hadn't money, first was and then wasn't engaged, until our head whirled. Perhaps that was all funny and we missed the point. But in one passage Mr. Waugh shows himself worthy of his title of humorist--the description of the dirt-track racing when Miles Malpractice's friend was hit on the head by a spanner and Agatha Runcible took his place. Eventually she hit a village cross and found her way to a nursing home. If only Mr. Waugh had devoted his time less to being consciously funny and more to giving his characters character, his book would have been funnier; as it was we were not sorry when Mr. Waugh found his solution to it all and "the next" war broke out over Europe. If we really believed the world was peopled with Malpractices and Runcibles we should stop wishing to league the nations at once.

Mr. G. B. Burgin, whose new novel, "Out of the Swim," just published by Messrs. Hutchinson, is his 90th, and one of the very best he has written.

IT'S A GREAT WAR. By Mary Lee. 10s. (Allen & Unwin.)

Keen observation, tenacious recollection of a bewildering variety of minute details, and astonishing industry in recording what her eyes have seen and her memory retained, may be placed unreservedly to the credit of Miss Mary Lee. She has too a talent for little vignettes of incident or character analysis. She has certainly given her readers ample measure—nearly seven hundred closely printed pages. For the rest, it is obvious that she has written to the thesis of her own experience with the American army during the last two years of the War. And it may be granted that she has faithfully reproduced the "jerks" of her theory. Here is a sample of her manner:

> "Morning. Anne's back one long pain. Face burning. Her eyes hurt. You couldn't be sick. . . . You'd got to go on. . . . Get up. . . . She pulled herself up. 'How do you feel?' said Joan. 'Rotten.' The room swayed. It went black. Joan pushed her a little and . . . she was . . . in bed. . . ."

By far the majority of these six hundred and ninety pages are written in that manner, giving the reader the impression of riding in an obsolete bus with solid tires, bumping eternally over tramway lines or other excrescences. Hence the jerking and jolting become intolerably monotonous. And the "rhythm" which Miss Lee postulates as a necessary element in a war novel is entirely lacking. Once for a fleeting moment she does get near to the heart of things It is when she reports a conversation of a French officer who, relating his experience in dining with American officers, declared the writer's fellow countrymen to b "Barbarians" and added: "During all that repast, these American officers have not expressed one single idea." That indictment is the ultimate judgment of Miss Lee's book, which wears the golden aureole of a £2,500 prize.

CHARIOT WHEELS. By Sylvia Thompson. 7s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

Cressida should never have married her brilliant novelist, Lester Midge. She thought she was in love with him, but in reality she was only fascinated by his mind, and little by little she wakens to the man's essential coarseness, as for example when she reads the proof of his new novel and realises that nothing is sacred to him, not even their honeymoon: "Making a peep-show of our—love. Using it, like that in a book, for everyone to see. How could you want to . . . ?" Lester however drives cheerfully ahead, confident that Cressida is bound fast by affection to his chariot wheels, and it remains for Cressida's daughter, many years later, to open his eyes to the unpalatable truth. The weaknesses of Lester Midge are pilloried with much subtlety and irony, and Cressida is splendidly suggested as the type of sensitive "girlhood fostered in blinkers." An excellent novel containing many gems of characterisation.

HOW AMUSING! By Denis Mackail. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

After closing this volume of thirty stories, the reader must suffer a "hang-over" from a surfeit of humour, and the unbidden thought, "What a pity that they were made into a collection," bangs on the little grey cells. This is no reflection on the lightness of Mr. Mackail's manner, which is irresistibly funny, even when serious; there is always intelligent mockery in his telling. But the author's work stands out so much better in mixed company, the little dash of bitters in our drink, which, if taken at one gulp, loses something of the zip in its flavouring, if not in its effect. Apart from this regret for a mania for collections, we are glad to meet these old friends again, and some new ones too. The rich Mr. Clements, who upsets English and Continental hotel staffs as only a millionaire would dare; the poor, unhappy Professor, who tried to pay his debts; the fiery and loyal Admiral Bonchurch; solemn butlers and ridiculous young people all succeed in living up to the volume's label.

EARLY SORROW. By Thomas Mann. 5s. (Secker.)

This is an exquisite story of a child's grief, told with imagination and no fear of being accused of over-emotionalism. Anyone who is moderately sensitive and can remember his own childhood will confess that no disappointments were so grievous, no sorrows so heart-breaking as those which visited life when he was just becoming aware that to live was to make, and break, personal contacts. That these agonies of tempestuous grief when normally short-lived did not detract from their intense and exquisite pain. Mr. Mann, before he shows his child in despair, gives us in a few brilliant pages a picture of the family she lives in—a family full of affection, full of self-interest too, when only the father can perhaps gauge the depth of his Eleanor's grief. She is five years old, and at her older sister's party, a real man has danced with her—and then left her. That is all; but told so finely, so reticently that "Early Sorrow" is a little masterpiece.

WHO ARE YOU? By Henrietta Leslie. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

The vein of romance that Henrietta Leslie struck in "The Road to Damascus" has rather petered out in "Who Are You?", which concerns the gold of ideals and the Movement—the capital letter is the novelist's. Do Socialists still talk like this?--rather than the mere tinsel of human emotion. To heighten the interest the reader is warned of a dream that terrifies the sleeping hours of the beautiful Thea ("You're a very interesting girl, Thea, and I always enjoy talking to you"), but had George appeared at the door with an axe, things might have been more exciting; and also within the bounds of possible Socialistic behaviour of quite half the characters in the book. The stage moves between such very high West End and such very low East End, while the poor "backbone of England" is despised by everyone, especially by the "Panther." It all seems rather unfair when one considers that it is the "backbone" that will buy the book, and will find it worth buying, for Mrs. Leslie writes well; she is interesting; knows how to tell a story, and it says much for her skill that, in spite of their unreality, she makes even this story and its people interesting.

The Bookman's Table.

THE BLACK CHRIST AND OTHER POEMS. By Countee Cullen. 5s. (Putnams.)

If the fact that Mr. Countee Cullen is an American negro attracts our particular attention to his poems, they keep it on their own merits. Nor though " The Black Christ " itself describes a case of lynching and there are three shorter pieces grouped together under the heading " Colour," is there much evidence of race in them. Indeed in reply " to certain critics " Mr. Cullen writes :

> " Never shall the clan
> Confine my singing to its ways—
> Beyond the ways of man.
> No racial option narrows grief ;
> Pain is no patriot. . . ."

There is certainly intense sympathy with his own people manifested in " The Black Christ," a fervent and brilliant piece of work, swiftly moving and sure-footed, but the bitterness which is a frequent mood in the other poems is that bitterness against life itself which young poets of whatever race are apt to feel. Mr. Cullen has something of Rupert Brooke's determination to rid himself of illusion, and something of John Davidson's arrogant defiance of fate. His gift however is quite an individual one. Analogies can be traced, but no direct influences. His firm handling makes him particularly successful as a sonneteer, though he manages more rapid measures with equal mastery. And he is capable of remarkable felicities of diction.

NEW VERSES. By Arthur L. Salmon. 2s. 6d. (Foulis.)

We hope in an early issue to devote an article to the work of Mr. Arthur L. Salmon. In the meantime we extend a hearty welcome to his latest collection of poems, which lovers of meditation and of quiet beauty should on no account overlook. Mr. Salmon is a traditionalist who is never derivative or imitative. His vision is as individual as it is intensely sensitive and spiritual, and his music, with its grave charm and dignity, is entirely his own. Not that he is always serious. His poems of childhood are gay and light, albeit with an underlying wistfulness. But his characteristic note is that of a deep love of natural beauty—particularly that of his own West Country ; and from the natural he is led, by a gentle but vital mysticism, to the supernatural. He sees :

> " the eternal that the transient hides—
> Beauty and love and hope, and man's desire > Lighted at moments with transmuting fire " ; and his book will delight, console, and inspire all readers who themselves have stood upon the mount of vision and have seen magic casements opened.

SUNG BY THE SEA. By Anne Macdonald. Illustrations by Dorothy M. Wheeler. 3s. 6d. (Black.)

In this delightful book of sea lyrics for children are to be found some of the best verse Miss Macdonald has given us, fresh and dainty and as sparkling as the sea itself on a summer day. Quaint sea fancies, stories of naughty little girls and boys, dreams of childhood down on the shore—of these and other matters Miss Macdonald writes very charmingly :

> " If all the silver fishes in the silver sea
> Came swimming through the surf to have a game with me,
> I wonder, oh, I wonder, what that game would be ! " sighs one child. And, as children will, goes on submitting her whimsical ideas to reason, and wisely concludes that before she could join them in their play—

> " . . . I think I'd have to be > A little silver fish, and not a child like me."

The pictures are exquisite, both the coloured and black-and-white, but especially the black-and-white.

THE RED KNIGHT OF GERMANY: BARON VON RICHTHOFEN. By Floyd Gibbons. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

At a time when the War as a subject for fiction has achieved such popularity, it is interesting to read a story that might well be sensational romance, but is in reality a true account of the exploits of that wonderful German airman, Baron von Richthofen. "He was young and blond, shy and handsome, proud and serious," says his biographer. "He was courageous and knew it, gloried in it, flaunted it with his challenge to the world of his enemies." With reckless daring, he shot down eighty fighting planes,

Baron Manfred von Richthofen, author of "The Red Knight of Germany" (Cassell).

and in the end was brought down himself by a modest young Canadian, Captain Roy Brown. Mr. Gibbons tells his story briefly and dramatically. There are no waste words. In the reference to his childhood and the descriptions of his many fights gathered largely from the airman's own writings, we get a very definite picture of Richthofen's character. He was undoubtedly brave, and had too the courage of honesty, but killing was a joy to him; the War was a magnificent opportunity. When he was not killing men, he was shooting birds. From a psychological point of view, as well as for its exciting stories of air fights, the book is one of exceptional interest.

THROUGH THE SHEERES. By Alfred Ernest Beckett. 7s. 6d. (Drane.)

The "Sheeres," let us say at once for the benefit of the uninitiated, represent the whole wide world outside Sussex. If you do not belong to Sussex, then it naturally follows you are a "furriner." A pretty wide range is therefore suggested, but the Driver and Diana, in their "combination" of motor-cycle and side-car, managed to cover a very good sweep, between the time they left Eastbourne and journeyed via Godstone, Stamford, right up through Durham and Newcastle to Flodden Field, Edinburgh and back through the Lake District, finishing up at the Forest of Dean. A delightful sense of leisurely, care-free enjoyment of "the road" with all it yields of natural beauty, is mingled with entertaining associations by the way, and the various characteristic blends of hospitality. A frail craft the "combination" certainly was for some of the difficulties it had to negotiate, but by hook or by crook all were surmounted eventually, and all are related in the breeziest manner, and prove the game spirit of the doughty pair. The numerous sketches share the whimsical and light-hearted nature of the text.

BROWN EARTH AND GREEN. By Michael Walsh. 1s. (Dublin: Talbot Press.)

This little volume of mainly pictorial poetry has the gentleness of the country-side in it, the country-side which has its little cruelties and tragedies of which the poet is unaware. He has intuition, vision. He can hear the quiet heart of earth beating below the grass. He numbers none that are not gentle hours. He belongs to a sincere and gentle class, the pastoral poets who received their inspiration under the wide skies, in the fields under the mountains. Among the pastoral poets Mr. Walsh fittingly takes his place, and if he does not rise to the heights of the greatest among them, he escapes also their descents into primitive things. The book is strangely innocent with a winsome and tender pensiveness which is never melancholy. He is not wholly pastoral. He loves his fields, but he has also human loves and in so far his roots are in earth. It is a charming nature which reveals itself. Sometimes the human and the pastoral are at issue as in the tender poem to his father which opens the little book.

WHO'S WHO IN BURNS. By John D. Ross, LL.D. 10s. 6d. (Stirling: Mackay.)

The latest elucidation of Burns from the pen of that indefatigable enthusiast, Dr. J. D. Ross, a member of the New York Public Library staff, is one of the best things he has compiled on the Scottish bard. Here is a book that was much needed. To be sure, one can find most of its information in sundry other volumes, but that entails often considerable search, and the sources are not always at one's hand. This "Who's Who" has therefore made matters easier for all inquirers, and it is sure to receive a generous welcome from many for whom the life and the works of Burns are still a favourite and enthralling study. Burns formed many friendships during his short lifetime. These sketches present an accurate, if (in keeping with the character of the work as modelled on the familiar "Who's Who") somewhat brief account, of the men and women who filled so large a space in Burns's career, as well as of those who only touched it spasmodically and casually. The notices include close on five hundred names, thus constituting a very respectable dictionary and index to the numerous personæ, great and small, associated with the poet. There is, by the way, a curious error with respect to the blind minister, Dr. Thomas Blacklock, through whose instrumentality Burns was prevented from emigrating to the West Indies. Dr. Ross says that "after completing his theological course, Blacklock was disappointed of a charge on account of his blindness. Thereafter he made a living by teaching and doing literary work." The latter statement is correct, but not the first, for Blacklock was ordained to the parish of Kirkcudbright in 1762, and occupied that charge for the next three years. The Rhyming Friends of Burns consists of a number of Epistles inscribed to Burns during his lifetime in answer to Epistles of his own and in laudation of his genius. Bibliographical and biographical notes are provided by Dr. George F. Black, of the New York Library. There is an excellent glossary. The little volume is an interesting contribution to Burns lore.

FORTY YEARS AT THE BAR. By Edward Abinger. 18s. (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Abinger's memoirs are crowded with amusing battles of words between counsel and counsel, between counsel and judge. He himself has taken part in not a few rencontres of this kind, and he has not shunned telling us of many which brought the laugh against himself. He gives an account of one of the trials of "The Man who broke the Bank at Monte Carlo" with a fine zest; we are told of the voluble German mechanic with his "zylinders, bistons and granks," during whose evidence the prisoner "fairly danced up and down in the dock in his excitement." In order to get his notes passed across to Mr. Abinger, "Monte Carlo Wells" constantly attracted the attention of the usher "by tickling his bald head with the feathered end of a quill pen." Wells, among other things, had invented a new sardine tin-opener and a musical skipping-rope. Mr. Abinger asked the judge if he might give a demonstration of the latter in court. "You can do anything you like, Mr. Abinger," replied Hawkins with a deep sigh. "It is all rather like 'Alice'!" There is scarcely a single celebrity in the world of modern law who escapes mention, and the book contains twenty-six admirable caricatures, mainly by "Spy."

BURKE : THE FOUNDER OF CONSERVATISM. By A. A. B. 7s. 6d. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)

Arthur A. Baumann—he signs his preface thus, though only his well-known initials adorn his title page—is so vigorous and entertaining a writer that one could wish that he had given us more of himself and less of the ipsissima verba of his subject. For half this quite small volume is occupied by the "Letter to a Noble Lord" which, though it may be, as Sir James Prior (quoted with approval by Mr. Baumann) called it, "on the whole the most brilliant exhibition of powers perhaps in the whole range of English prose," is easily accessible in a variety of editions. Mr. Baumann's own essay fills but eighty pages, and that is hardly space enough in which to do justice to his theme. He has not however attempted anything like a complete study, but after a slight but suggestive aperçu of the life and ideas of the great eighteenth century statesman, he slips easily into an exposition of his own "thoughts on the present discontents." A. A. B., as everyone knows, is a very absolute Tory, who regards the present leaders of the Conservative party as its betrayers; and whether one agrees with him or not, there is no doubting either his sincerity or his gift for pamphleteering.

AT THE GATE CALLED BEAUTIFUL. By O. G. Whitfield. 3s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

It was a happy decision that made it possible for a wider public to share the privileges of the boys and girls in Mr. Whitfield's congregation. Covering an infinite variety of outlook, these fifty-two talks are arranged to follow, more or less, the course of the year. In the form of spoken, rather than written talks, they are ready for any emergency, or if preferred can form the basis for a fuller development. Unpretentious and homely, their very simplicity lends weight to their persuasiveness and readiness of understanding. Mr. Whitfield is not afraid of telling incidents at his own expense, if only they will open the way to a suitable application. All the talks make a direct appeal by their winning friendliness, and carry a distinct message. We can well imagine how useful the book will be to workers among children.

HAUNTING EDINBURGH. By Flora Grierson. Illustrated by Katharine Cameron, A.R.E., R.S.W. 20s. (John Lane.)

The pen of Miss Grierson and the pencil and brush of Miss Cameron have done real service in crystallising and preserving the legacy of the centuries as they have steadily passed over that city of almost incredible contradictions. "Old Edinburgh was a city of war close-clasped in the embrace of religion. A garland of monasteries, convents and churches enclosed the royal burgh, and of these barely a trace survives." Step by step, in both mediums, the vicissitudes are depicted, the royal embroilments, the religious upheavals, together with the foreign complications, the dire visitation of the plague, etc., until the present conglomeration of ancient and modern emerges. Its odd nooks and crannies, its wynds and closes—what a halo of romance, subterfuge and storm encircles them, and what diverting stories they yield. Stories which reflect social, political, religious, literary, and all manner of interests. Both author and artist have triumphantly expressed the glamour with which this remarkable panorama is so richly invested.

Books of the Month.

From December 15th to January 15th.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

A further collection of Mr. W. P. Pycraft's weekly contributions to the Illustrated London News now appears in more permanent form in MORE GLEANINGS FROM NATURE'S FIELDS (7s. 6d.; Methuen). The remarkably wide scope covered in this little volume will prove a no less attractive factor than the author's delightfully persuasive and easy manner of imparting the extensive knowledge he possesses. The everyday life of the garden, the seashore and the country-side, all come within his range, as well as several more obscure but vastly interesting problems, such as that of ancient "Rhodesian Man," a subject to which he has given a long and exhaustive study. The hundred illustrations are excellently produced and add considerably to a further enjoyment of the text.

Out of the cramped beginnings of a narrow Victorian home, Miss Ursula Bloom has, in THE PASSIONATE HEART (7s. 6d.; Hutchinson) developed the usual accumulation of complications. "Mamma," for it is impossible to call her anything else, was the orbit within which hovered her second husband, Mr. Jones, and her children Mary and Johnnie. To Mary belonged the passionate heart, and the reader follows her torments through a loveless marriage with an insufferable curate. Johnnie too makes a mésalliance, and continually interposes with his entanglements. There is good character drawing, but the story is rather tiringly sordid.

THE DIFFICULT ART (Georgia Rivers; 7s. 6d.; Skeffington) that Anna Maddox found so difficult was that of overcoming a morbid sensitiveness and "growing up" in a natural manner. Bereft of her mother when a baby, she had developed an unnaturally introspective mind. Miss Rivers's delicately whimsical pen carries her through the varied experiences of a business career, with all its entertaining friendships and activities, and the various romances which develop out of them. With unflagging pace this spirited story moves buoyantly and picturesquely through its vivid Australian setting.

Such a practised hand as Mrs. Victor Rickard may be very sure of hitting on the right elements for a mystery story that will send shudders down the spine, and she has done so in THE EMPTY VILLA (7s. 6d.; Hodder & Stoughton). An empty villa in the dead of night, a storm that drives a young man into it for shelter, a loose shutter knocking with "maddening regularity," and the eerie sense that he is not alone. And then a beautiful girl fleeing from—what? If the story does not quite live up to the promise of its opening chapters, that is because it depends a little bit too much on coincidence to render it convincing, and because the opening chapters are so enthralling it would be very difficult indeed to keep up the tension for over three hundred pages. Enough that it is an excellent story of its kind, as skilful and exciting as one would expect it to be with Mrs. Victor Rickard's name on the cover.

The Collector

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—Burton

THE PLAN.

THIS new section of The Bookman will not only interest a great number of those who are regular readers, but it will have a special value for all who are collecting first and rare editions of old and new books.

The outlook of "The Collector" will in no sense be only commercial. But we might be suspected of some unctuousness if we claimed that our object was to advise about collecting, pure and simple, without reference to money-values. There is always the happy medium between the love of books for their own sakes and for their monetary value, and to strike that medium is our aim.

In a word, our guiding principle is writ at the head of our page. Let us emphasise it: "Let not the collector, therefore," said Richard Burton, "ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures." That was, and still is good advice, and yet there is no sin in selling your books at a profit. We might almost say, that to hold a book that has advanced in price, shall we say from 1s. to £100, is uneconomic. But there is a holy voice in the soul of some book-collectors which says "Hold." We do not despise one or the other. Both are within their rights. But our voice is with Burton, of delightful memory. If you would know a little, a trifle more of his mind, let us tell you that he went on to say, "Let him"—the book-collector—"guard his treasures as things too sacred for commerce."

There it is. We leave it with you.

Our pages will try to give you, not only encouragement in the exquisite pursuit of the gathering of first editions, but they will provide real practical help and guidance in the details of the business. Of one thing the reader may be sure: book-collecting can never be entirely mastered. Even the experts are caught in pools of ignorance at times. No one knows everything. We are always learning something new. All we can do is to be as intelligent, as acquisitive, as understanding as we can. This way, and with diligence, we may muster a vast amount of knowledge.

These pages will give the reader some idea of what we have outlined in these opening paragraphs. We shall print articles of a general book-collecting character. There will be information of all kinds; stories of book-collecting, notes on catalogues, news about auctions, the rise and fall of prices, announcements of sales, advance news about limited editions, books to buy, authors to watch—everything, in fact, that the experience of the writer can conceive for the benefit of his readers.

THE POPULARITY OF BOOK-COLLECTING.

There are those who say that the present intense interest in the collecting of modern first editions will pass; if not entirely (which of course is both an absurd idea and an impossibility) that at least it will fall away. We have no belief at all that this interest will moderate to any great extent. That it will fluctuate there is no gainsaying. There will be phases of almost extravagant enthusiasms; there will be other and quieter phases—but always there will be an average level of interest, with a general tendency to an increase.

We have wondered, frequently, just why so many people are concerned in the business. There are many reasons, and in spite of what the cynic says about the majority engaging in it because of the abnormal profits that are to be found in book-collecting, we are of the sure and definite opinion that the majority of book-collectors are chiefly concerned in it for the sake of a happy participation in this delectable business.

For, after all, the collecting of books is encompassed with as pleasant an environment as you may discover or desire in this rather hustling world of to-day. Just as so many men, and an increasing number of women, turn their evening minds to a mystery story for entertainment, as a means of forgetting the day's jars and vexations, so do many folk indulge their cultured fancy in the affairs of book-collecting. They study books about the subject; they scan with spiritual pleasure the many attractive catalogues of first editions that are now broadcast by all the intelligent booksellers up and down the country. Next to having a book, give us a nicely made catalogue; and there is no cold wind in the world that will shrivel and pinch us. Then there are the many good articles about the business featured in the press for the wise ones to read and enjoy and ponder over. And what stories we learn from accounts of the fine books that are sold at auction, while the fabulous prices that are paid for them sometimes take away our breath.

This is the high purpose, the gospel of true book-collecting—for, an we have enough of the world's goods, we soon proceed to a modest—for most of us—possession of some of the precious things of the world of books. And, though we may think in the second sense, of the profit stored up in the purchases we have made, if we have gone about the business with wisdom and shrewdness, we shall find, if necessity ever made it essential—which God forbid—that there is an insurance against a rainy day in those purchases of earlier times.

Modern book-collecting is popular, and we welcome the increased interest with open heart and mind for, peradventure, out of the widening army of good people who may be drawn to it by reason of the large profits that are said tc be made, there may often come a true bookman. Having come to a right understanding of them, he will remain to become a true lover of books. Then it will go hard with him to part with them for even a large mess of potage. We hail and welcome the merchandise for this reason.

STORIES ABOUT COLLECTING.

There is a wealth of good stories about this intriguing and fascinating affair of book-collecting, both old and modern. Somehow, books always carry with them a romance of fact, and at times of fiction. These stories are always readable and entertaining, and bear repeating. The chances are, that some of the following may possibly have been printed before, but they are good, and lose none of their point by again being set before you.

There was once a youngster who had started out in the business of life at a rather early age. He had been brought up in a home where books were accepted almost as a sacrament, rather than a passing fancy. It was natural, therefore, for him to find his opening in the great affairs of life in a bookseller's shop. You may be sure that, in his innocence of the experience of life, he felt that heaven had begun. He revelled in the good fortune that had come to him. Books were real things —things to revere, and possess. But money was limited: just a few shillings came his way each week. How could he ever own books? He watched—and waited. He learned things. And one day the gods blessed him. There came to him a knowledge that he could buy John Addington Symond's prize poem, "The Escorial," for sixpence, and he knew where he could sell it for a pound. He bought a few copies of it, and the run of the story goes that he used the profit to buy for himself the books that he had coveted. That was a delightful gesture, and I hope the lad did well as the years rolled by. He certainly deserved to—for a prettier story of book-loving combined with a shrewd business sense, I have never heard.

Then there is another story of a perfect piece of honesty, in which there was no guile. It concerned some very valuable Thackeray items. A certain book-seller had put these volumes in his shop window, in the hope of catching the eye of a collector. And no long time passed ere someone came in. When he began to talk about them, the good bookseller thought that he was about to make a sale. What was his surprise, however, when his visitor told him that the price—a few shillings or so—which he had marked on the ticket, was a ridiculous price, and that they were worth many, many pounds. The shopkeeper's chagrin may be imagined. His gratitude to his caller may also be imagined. I wonder how many of us would have done such a thing? It shows that even the experts—which is perfectly true—are sometimes without the necessary knowledge. In fact, the myriad facts and figures that book-collecting demands, makes it almost impossible for anyone, expert or not, professional or layman, to possess all the necessary knowledge about old and rare and new and scarce books. The book business, in all its varied aspects needs, more than any other, in addition to an instinct for it, as complete a collection of reference books as may be possible.

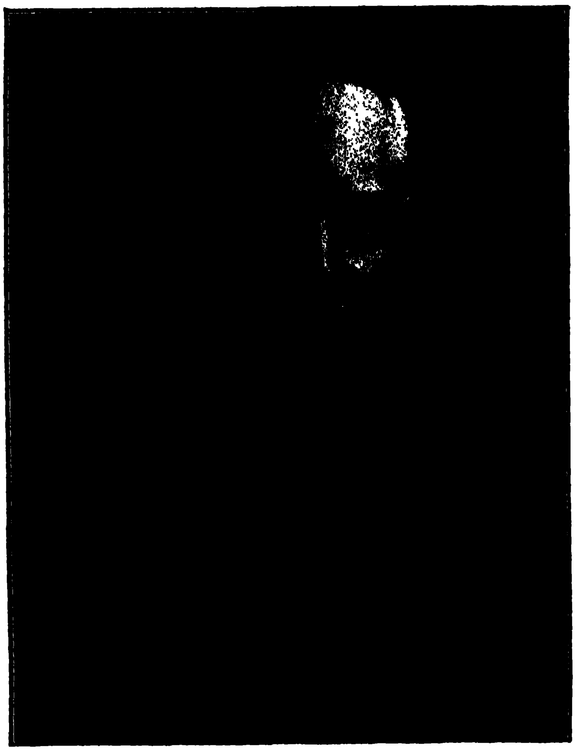
It may be assumed that everyone knows the time honoured story about a simple copy of the "Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám." Once, somebody found a copy outside Mr. Quaritch's shop in Piccadilly for twopence. Not so many years since, one was sold in New York for $3,200; in June last, one was sold by Messrs. Hodgson for £1,410; and in one of Messrs. Quaritch's recent catalogues a copy was offered for £2,250. In this copy is inserted a letter from Swinburne to A. C. Benson giving an account of the circumstances in which Swinburne purchased copies of FitzGerald's poem from the box outside Mr. Quaritch's shop. It was a small pamphlet, and bound in the original brown paper covers.



THE MARKET.

The Auction Mart.

Just at the moment, not a great number of sales are taking place. Libraries come into the market in no regular manner, as may be imagined. Sometimes there is a series of important sales, and then there is a period of slackness. There is no doubt that we shall see a number of valuable libraries put up for sale this year, including both old and modern books. Many of the latter are appearing in sales in these days, which is a definite sign that modern book-collecting is being pursued with a greater persistency than heretofore.

Prices.

One or two notable volumes have fallen in value. We have noticed one particularly. This is the first edition of the ordinary edition of Mr. Galsworthy's "Forsyte Saga." A month or two since, a fairly good copy was sold at auction for £25; now anyone who wanted a copy in first-class condition could obtain it for about £16. Although this book has depreciated in its collecting value, we have not the slightest doubt it will appreciate again before long. We must not forget that several thousands were printed of this ordinary edition. Immediately after the copy was sold at auction for £25, no end of other copies at once appeared on the market and, of course, the price at once came down. It is our belief that the volume is worth while holding on to; in fact, as time passes, it ought to become a scarce and valuable Galsworthy item. The limited, signed edition of this fine work sells for something like £50. It is not easy to find a copy of this edition.

Mr. John Galsworthy.

Catalogues.

Lists of modern editions, issued by the antiquarian booksellers, are becoming works of art. We have received a large number during the past few weeks, and some of them are very readable. We can call attention to two only, but we shall hope to find more room available as the months pass, for consideration of current catalogues of old and rare books and modern first editions. The two lists that we have selected are "A Catalogue of Fifty Famous First Editions," issued by Elkin Mathews, and "English Literature of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries" which comes from Maggs. The "Fifty Famous First Editions" is a fascinating issue, and our mouth waters as we turn over the pages. Whoever produced this list has a pretty taste in manner; for the title and description of just one book only are printed on each page. The fifty first editions are all books of the past, excepting Mr. Kipling's "The Jungle Book" and "The Second Jungle Book." These are priced at £90. Another precious work is an association item: "Waverley; or 'Tis Sixty Years Since," in three volumes, by Sir Walter Scott. One or two of the first editions of Scott are very scarce, and "Waverley" is one of them. This particular copy contains the signature of Henry Mackenzie, to whom Scott dedicated it: "These volumes being respectfully inscribed to our Scottish Addison, Henry Mackenzie, by an unknown admirer of his genius." Elkin Mathews' have marked this at £560.

The other catalogue is one of those magnificent lists issued by Maggs. Their catalogues are of extraordinary value to bookmen. This one is numbered 531. A full file would be worth a good deal, and we wish we had all of them. We would use up a few columns of this magazine in describing the books mentioned in the new one. There are 2,266 items of unusual interest, and a number of valuable autograph letters. It is difficult to single out any particular entry. We are especially attracted by the Hardy collection, which includes first editions, association copies, and a fine manuscript of "Notes on Stinsford Church." It is typewritten, but signed and subscribed at the end, "Yours very truly—Thomas Hardy." The work is written in the form of a letter to the Restoration Committee of Stinsford Church. There are four pages of this manuscript, including a pen and ink sketch by Hardy. Some idea of its value may be gathered from the fact that it is priced at £250.

A POEM BY LERMONTOV.*

Lermontov is by common consent the greatest Russian poet except Pushkin; and Mr. John Cournos, in the interesting biographical and critical note which he has appended to this translation of one of his finest works, says that "in some of his poems he is fully Pushkin's equal." The present poem is one of a series of realistic pieces begun in 1837, when Lermontov was twenty-three and had only four more years of his stormy life to run.

"In these poems," says Mr. Cournos, "he manages admirably to combine that incurably romantic spirit of his which formerly, after the manner of the Romantics, tended towards melodious vagueness, with a new manner, which is both realistic and precise. In the 'Song of the Merchant Kalashnikov' the poet has wisely adopted the style of the old epic folk-songs, with the result that it is one of the most vigorous and moving things in the Russian language. I use the word 'moving' in its precise sense, and not in any sense implying pathos. It has a martial air, it marches, it moves. . . ."

These qualities are all evident in Mr. Cournos's version, which one takes to be close to the original, not only, as he says, in rhythm but in manner and spirit. The poem is written in a sort of free verse, with a fairly constant rhythmical beat and only occasional rhymes. It is a vigorous and barbaric piece of work, as befits a story of the days of Ivan the Terrible, and tells of how Kiribeyevitch, a noble youth of that monarch's bodyguard, makes an attempt on the virtue of a merchant's wife. He is unsuccessful, and the frightened lady runs home and confesses to her husband, who, like his would-be betrayer, is a "sturdy lad." Next morning the Court is assembled by the Moskva to watch the bodyguard in single combat. Kiribeyevitch challenges all comers, but none answers his challenge until the merchant Stepan Paramonovitch steps into the ring. The two men fight—apparently with armoured boxing-gloves—and Stepan slays his rival with a single blow:

"The young bodyguard softly groaned,
Reeled, fell dead,
Rolled upon the cold snow—
Upon the cold snow, like a sapling pine,
Like a sapling pine of the virgin wood
Cut where the sap flows, at the root."

Stepan, confessing that his intention was death, is condemned to execution, but, by way of compensation, his wife and kinsfolk are rewarded from the royal treasury.

This is a handsome edition, limited to seven hundred and fifty copies, printed on Maillol handmade paper, and in special type, a sort of black letter, occasionally rubricated. Mr. Paul Nash has supplied some decorations, which may be symbolical, and also designed the binding, which is of orange morocco.

YOUNG WERTHER.†

It is surprising that this very famous book has not been translated into English for a hundred years; but we are now rewarded by having an admirable rendering from

Dr. William Rose. He also provides us with an introduction wherein the book is placed in its proper environment. Those who have not yet read it, under the impression perhaps that it is a mere orgy of sentimentalism, are recommended to ascertain that this is not the case. No doubt "Werther" will not make its appeal to the same circles as it did in 1774. We who, at any rate in regard to literature, are more sophisticated, do not accept such writings in the naïve spirit that prevailed in the eighteenth century, and our sense of humour also obtrudes itself. In this respect Goethe was in a peculiar position; both before and after the appearance of "Werther" he gave evidence of a highly developed sense of humour, and occasionally in this book he cannot refrain from laughing a little at his hero (who of course is himself), when his introspective methods and his love-lorn soul make him rather ridiculous. But on the whole "Werther" is for Goethe a tragic interlude. Many thousands of his contemporary readers wallowed in the book, with no afterthoughts whatever. They sobbed and enjoyed themselves thoroughly.

Of all the sentimental novels of the eighteenth century this is undoubtedly the best, if we except Sterne. But Richardson and Rousseau are very much more diffuse, though this was not considered at the time to be a handicap. Probably in fact there were many who regretted the terseness of Goethe, as one might deplore a too rapid reciting of a church service on the part of a clergyman. It did not occur to them, as it did later on to the two Wellers when they sat composing the love-letter, that one does well to let the reader long for more. Goethe is terse, rapid and natural. His explorations into Werther's mind and his various philosophical meditations are the reverse of heavy, even when they are profound. He illustrates them with pleasing examples, and altogether gives them a lightness and elegance which they had in other hands not possessed. And particularly in German hands, for the language did not seem capable of depicting such things lightly.

Everyone knows that "The Sorrows of Werther" is founded on fact. Goethe, a young lawyer, had betaken himself to Wetzlar, where the supreme court of judicature of the Holy Roman Empire was situated. He made the acquaintance of a number of people, both at Wetzlar and in the neighbourhood, and among them was a girl, some eleven years his junior—Charlotte Buff, the daughter of the bailiff who managed the estates of the Teutonic Order. She managed the household and looked after the numerous younger children of her widowed father. Before he knew that she was already betrothed to one Johann Christian Kestner, of Hanover, who was a very conscientious and industrious Secretary of Legation, Goethe was extremely attracted to Charlotte and, when Kestner appeared on the scene, there was a kind of idyllic ménage à trois. Kestner came to perceive that Charlotte might enjoy greater happiness with the brilliant young author; he offered to release her from the engagement, averring that he could not do without her, but that if she would be happier without him he would prefer her happiness to his own. He then advises her (referring to Goethe) that all is not gold that glitters, and he asks her to burn his letter as soon as she has read it. The extraordinary thing was that he and Goethe remained good friends, save for a moment after his marriage to Charlotte, when Goethe sent each of them a copy of "Werther," which obviously contained their portraits; and then Kestner, immortalised as "Albert," protested that the latter was a wretched creature. Kestner got over his bitterness very soon, and Goethe, though he did not see him again and did not see Charlotte until both he and she were over sixty years of age, was always interested to hear that another child had been born to them: they were blessed with a great many.

Objection was at the time taken to the book on the ground that it was morbid and that it was a plea in favour of suicide—for such is Werther's end. But Goethe, who fundamentally was a very well-balanced person, was only showing how his desperate love might affect someone else, especially one who felt too much and acted too little. In the book he warned the youth of his generation against the perils which he himself could overcome. In his case the relating of his troubles was to get rid of them.

Goethe says that he wrote this book in a month, during which he lived as a sleep-walker in a trance. He managed not only to endow his age with a novel whose influence spread far and wide in European literature, but to show us that, as Wagner afterwards said, the greatness of a poet is measured by what he refrains from saying. In other words, "Werther" contains no dullness, no longeurs. It is, if we attune ourselves to Goethe's age, a most absorbing book even for us. And how interesting it is to see a new feeling for Nature introduced into German literature! Thus there are many reasons why one should read this new and excellent translation.

HENRY BAERLEIN.

A DICKENS DISCOVERY.

To "HAMPSTEAD," England.

In the July BOOKMAN I read with great interest your story of your find of the early excerpts of "Pickwick," printed in English in a German publication (The Englishman). The thorough search you made impressed me, and I now make free to ask if you happen to know something about a similar Dickens item, which, so far, I have found no mention of in bibliographies, auction catalogues, etc.

I have just found in an old shop two volumes, No. 1 and No. 5, of a weekly publication, The British Museum (Vol. V, 1841, New British Museum). It was devoted to a choice selection from the works of the most celebrated English authors—just as I understand your unique volume was (and printed in English).

Volume V, title page 1841, consists of sixty-five weekly Numbers*, bound in boards, 4to, each part 8 pages, run from January, 1841, to March, 1842, with a purpose, because the first two Numbers and last fifteen Numbers, and many more (80 per cent. of the volume in fact) are filled with "The Old Curiosity Shop," by "Boz"—that is, from page 1–515. All the Master Humphrey stuff, which Dickens regretted and buried, is here omitted.

The first complete "Old Curiosity Shop," according to my search, came also out in 1841, but "made up" from the Clock, its running headings, and of course odd, irregular pagination. Dickens himself had some similar presentation copies made up, and apologised for them, saying, in

* 52 Numbers for 1841, 13 Numbers for 1842. Volume evidently bound this way to gather the complete "Shop" within two covers.

The Collector.

May, 1841, that no separate edition of the "Shop" was likely to appear for some years. In fact, the 1848 edition, with Dickens's preface, seems to have been this belated one.

Curious then, that these German publishers picked this classic, out of the Clock, issued it in parts before even Dickens had arranged for a separate edition. Bibliographically—may we not say that this German-English version is the first intended, deliberately planned issue of the "Shop" in separate form? As a piece of publishing history, it certainly is highly interesting—as in your instance—the Germans "picked a winner," and early at that.

Since the nature of our volumes seems to be closely related, I believe my Museum must be very scarce. The New York Library has never heard of it, and it is not at present in their extensive Dickens exhibition. Do you know of any published reference to my item! Has it ever been classified as some kind of a first edition? Was the story pirated! Did Dickens take some notice of the foreign entrepreneans? Perhaps you know and, if so, would you be so very kind as to enlighten me?

(Signed) THOMAS SCHREINER (New York).

P.S.—My volume is in beautiful condition. I suppose it is most unlikely that the sixty-five unbound, uncut parts of my series exist anywhere? The next best would be a volume like mine.

15th November, 1929.

To the Editor of THE BOOKMAN,

In reply to the American correspondent's letter respecting his discovery of the complete story of Dickens's "Old Curiosity Shop" in a magazine entitled The British Museum for 1841–2, and his comparison of this with the subject of the article in the July BOOKMAN, the following may be of interest.

The article in question was written to call attention to the reprinting of excerpts from "Pickwick" in the German Englishman, solely because they are believed to be the earliest instance of any of the work of Charles Dickens being reproduced outside this country. Dickens was only brought prominently before the English public by this book, and the popularity beginning with parts IV and V grew as the work progressed. "Pickwick" was not completed until November, 1837, and the first extract was reproduced in the Englishman on July 5th, 1837. These extracts therefore stand out by themselves as the first publication of the sort, as the earliest recognition of the author upon the Continent, and as having appeared so very quickly after he had attracted any particular notice in his own country.

After this, during the years 1838 to 1841, piracies and imitations were so numerous that a determined fight was made against them. Any reproduction as late as 1841, the date of the periodical mentioned, would be regarded as a late example in a long series of such reprintings.

As for the suggested acumen of the editor of the periodical in separating the story of "The Old Curiosity Shop" from the other matter which appeared in Master Humphrey's Clock, the last instalment of the "Shop" appeared on February 6th, 1841, or very shortly before it was begun in the pages of The British Museum. It would have been strange if the editor had allowed the miscellaneous contents of the early issues of the Clock to interfere with the sequence of the story. As to its recognition as a first separate edition of "The Old Curiosity Shop," the serial issue of a book in a magazine never ranks as the first edition. "Hard Times" and "The Tale of Two Cities" both first appeared as separate tales in serial form, but the recognised first editions of both are the issues in volume form.

The volume published in 1841, in green cloth, ranks undoubtedly as the first separate complete edition of the book. Although the pagination in one or two places is irregular, and the stereotyped plates of the Clock were used in printing it, the book consisted of nothing but "The Old Curiosity Shop"; it was complete, it was published under that title, and that name appeared upon its cover. Moreover, at the end of Chapter I, twenty-nine additional lines appeared for the first time in order to fill up what would have been an almost empty page. This volume was published the year before the serial story referred to was completed. "Hampstead."

A book that collectors should look out for is "Dorando: A Spanish Tale," by James Boswell, which Messrs Elkin Mathews & Marrot are publishing in an edition limited to six hundred copies. This work by Dr. Johnson's biographer has never appeared in any form since its original publication and only one copy, from which this reprint was taken, has so far been discovered. Another important and interesting limited edition announced for publication on February 6th by Elkin Mathews & Marrot, is "A Rambling Discourse," by John Galsworthy, which was delivered by him to the Associated Societies of Edinburgh University as their President in 1926.

"The Siege of Malta," an unpublished novel by Sir Walter Scott, which has been lying at Abbotsford for nearly a century, was recently sold by Scott's grandson, General Walter Maxwell Scott, to Mr. J. T. Sheed, of the publishing firm of Messrs. Sheed & Ward. Mr Sheed is at present in America and whether or not he is arranging for the publication of "The Siege of Malta" is matter for speculation. The price paid for it is said to have been the highest ever given for any Scott MS.

By Alfred Noyes.

THE modern man, having lost his roots, tends to forget that originality is a matter of origins, not of superficial effects. Origins are not of to-day, or yesterday. It was one of the most individual personalities of the eighteenth century—Doctor Johnson—who said that originality had nothing in common with mere novelty. There are hosts of running readers at the present day who, being unable to grasp the connection between the beginning and end of a sentence, would misinterpret that statement as a defence of the dullest conservatism, though of course it is exactly the opposite. It is a defence of the true originality. We may turn the sentence round and say "mere novelty has nothing to do with originality." The truth of that statement has been recognised in every age and in every nation, except when the age was corrupt and the nation dying. The death and dissolution of Athens are described in a single sentence in the Acts of the Apostles. "All the Athenians and strangers which were there spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or to hear, some new thing." Paul accused them, not of intelligence, but "superstition." The recognition of the true nature of originality is the master-key to the character of Johnson, and to all real greatness of the intellect and the spirit, which comes not to destroy, but to fulfil. It is no paradox to say that real originality is fundamentally incompatible with mere novelty; for everything that is creative is rooted in a common ground of reality and develops its future out of its past. Growth, growth, and yet again growth, is the law of the arts and of the intellect; but there is no growth without roots, and the roots run back through the ages.

Dr. Samuel Johnson.
After the portrait by James Barry, R.A., in the National Portrait Gallery.

Novelty can easily be achieved by the simple method of telling a lie. You may say that horses have five legs. It is new, but of no value. You may paint, or write, in a way that is equally false, equally new, and seems very effective to a certain kind of jaded mind, especially if the lie be concerned with things a little less obvious. But the artificial novelties that are stuck into the ground to startle and trick the hasty observer into a foolish momentary admiration will perish and leave no memory behind them. There is perhaps no single truth of which the full realisation would be more salutary at the present time. Johnson returns to it again and again. He opens his great preface to Shakespeare with it: "That praises are without reason lavished on the dead, and that the honours due only to excellence are paid to antiquity, is a complaint likely to be always continued by those who, being able to add nothing to truth, hope for eminence from the heresies of paradox." He makes of course due allowance for mere prejudice, and remarks that "while an author is yet living we estimate his powers by his worst performance, and when he is dead, we rate them by his best," but he returns to his text again and again. There is a hint perhaps, here, of his own vanity of human wishes. "Nothing can please many," he says, "and please long, but just representations of general nature. The irregular combinations of fanciful invention may delight awhile, by that novelty of which the common weariness of life sends us all in quest; but the pleasures of sudden wonder are soon exhausted and the mind can only repose on the stability of truth."

Again, in dealing with the metaphysical poets, in his Life of Cowley, he says: "Their thoughts are often new, but seldom natural. They are not obvious, but neither are they just; and the reader, far from wondering that he missed them, wonders more frequently by what perverseness of industry they were ever found."

Far from wondering that he missed them! This great man, through all the ponderous trappings of his age, by dint of sheer sincerity, was on the verge of a critical discovery here of the very first importance—a theory of art that Plato would have understood, before him; and Wordsworth after him; but very few others in the history of literature; a theory that fully accounts for the dilemma in which modern criticism finds itself.

On a subsequent page he says of the same metaphysical poets: "As they were wholly employed on something unexpected and surprising, their courtship was void of fondness and their lamentation of sorrow. Their wish was only to say what they hoped had never been said before. Nor was the sublime more within their reach than the pathetic; for they never attempted that comprehension and expanse of thought which at once fills the whole mind, and of which the first effect is sudden astonishment and the second rational admiration. Those writers who lay on the watch for novelty could have little hope of greatness; for great things cannot have escaped former observation. Their attempts were always analytic. They could no more represent by their slender conceits and laboured particularities, the prospects of nature or the scenes of life, than he who dissects a sunbeam with a prism can exhibit the wide effulgence of a summer noon."

This, we may say, in flat contradiction of the stupid contempt of Macaulay, is great criticism. It is great in its grasp of first principles. When Johnson praised or blamed particular poems in detail the prejudices of his age made him an unreliable judge, especially of the technique of verse. But whenever he wrote of general principles, his own sincerity led him directly to the heart of the matter. Perhaps the most significant sentence of all for my present purpose is that in which he says of the same hunters for novelty, "it will be readily inferred that they were not successful in representing or moving the affections."

Johnson himself has moved the affection of all those who care for English literature. He has moved them through heavy disadvantages, with all the odds against him. Born in poverty, scarred with disease, uncouth in person and manner, the wielder of a literary style that even to his own contemporaries seemed occasionally to be making little fishes talk like whales, he nevertheless ruled the literary world of London for a third of a century as no man has ever ruled it before or since, and he has been loved almost as a personal friend by thousands of readers down to the present day.

Although Johnson was dogmatic almost to the point of arrogance, he was able to compel all kinds of persons, no matter what were their views, to like him. Boswell's Life has given us more opportunities of liking him, but it would be a mistake to attribute too much to the instrument on which the great personality of Johnson played his sonorous voluntaries. We have long ago ceased to believe that Boswell was the kind of inspired idiot depicted by Macaulay. Boswell had a singular talent for collecting and arranging his material; but, even for the sake of an antithesis, we must not regard him as in other respects a fool. Nor need we attribute inspiration to him. The simple straightforward talent was his own, but the material, and whatever inspiration was to be found in his work . was Johnson's. Take away from Boswell the prayers composed by Johnson, the letters written by Johnson, and, above all, the sentences spoken by Johnson, and there is not much left. But one faculty Boswell had that was essential to his task, a faculty that all lovers of Johnson must have—it accounts to a great extent for their love of him—the ineradicable delight of human nature in playing the game of "let's pretend." All through his life, although he was one of the sincerest men in the history of literature, Johnson asked his friends to come and play with him at the splendid game of "I'll be dictator, and you shall be my court." In boyhood, we are told, he frequently rode to school on the back of a school-fellow, who seemed to have taken his own ignominious part for granted; and one of the chief ingredients in the delicious dish provided by Boswell is just this spice of humour which enters into some of the gravest passages in the book. How far it unconsciously entered into Boswell's description of Johnson's interview with the King, or perhaps we should say the King's interview with Johnson, it is difficult to decide. In any case the modern reader is asked to play his part of "let's pretend" in a very delicious little comedy. Johnson, surrounded by an awestruck crowd of friends after the great event, gravely informed them that, on the whole, he was very well pleased with his Majesty, both as to what his Majesty said, and as to his Majesty's manners, which he commended as really quite excellent. It was implied, too, that his Majesty probably felt the intellectual strain to a certain extent, and that this was probably the cause why his Majesty did not seek a further interview with his august subject. and again, too, there were occasions when the most amazing questions were asked of Doctor Johnson, not with a view to discovering his real opinion, but with a view to discovering what might be called the absolute truth on the most recondite subjects. Questions, for instance, like: "Will you inform me, sir, whether God created the onion before He created the potato." On which, Johnson, if he were in an amiable mood, would sometimes deliver judgment; but if he were a little tired of play, would say peremptorily: "That, sir, is a question which I am not bound to answer." Or there was that extraordinary letter which he wrote to Boswell on the eve of one of Boswell's journeys abroad, to something like this effect: "Pray, sir, take careful note, when you are in Holland, of the following matters, on which I require more information:

"(a) Whether in Holland there is much orange peel used for medicinal purposes;

"(b) What do they do with the pips;

"(c) Whether a Dutch duck is larger than an English duck;

"(d) How many Scotchmen there are in Antwerp."

A mysterious purpose was implied in many of these requests which one feels sure were never carried out; and, occasionally, when Dr. Johnson was in a mischievous mood, he delighted in shattering the very illusion he had created, as when—at the very height of his autocratic fame—he stood, in all his immense bulk, at the top of a gently sloping hill and remarked: "I have not rolled down a hill since I was at school, and I intend to do so now." Whereupon, despite the earnest solicitations of his attendant friends, the great man did, then and there, lie down and roll from the top to the bottom of that hill like a human avalanche.

In another way, there was the same feeling of "let's pretend" about his poetry, which is considerably underrated at the present day. There was of course a good deal of very direct humour in his verses, as in:

"If a man who turnips cries
Cries not when his father dies,
'Tis a proof that he had rather Have a turnip than his father";

"Hermit hoar, in solemn cell
Wearing out life's evening grey,
Strike thy bosom, sage, and tell
What is bliss, and which the way.

"Thus I spoke and speaking, sighed,
Scarce represt the starting tear,
When the hoary sage replied:
'Come, my lad, and drink some beer.'"

The burlesque solemnity of this strikes one as more genuine than the tragic tones of that modern Professor of Latin, in lyrics of a similar brevity and exactly the same rhythm, who seems to take the hangman's noose and malt as the best answer to life's riddle.

But there are subtler effects which have been deliberately reproduced by stylists like Stevenson. It is the same sort of "let's pretend" that we get in Stevenson, who always had something up his sleeve, although it was rather a larger something and a more portentous sleeve. Who for instance could be quite sure that the following lines were by Johnson and not by Stevenson? They were lines written to Miss —— on her giving the author a gold and silver network purse of her own weaving:

"Though gold and silk their charms unite
To make thy curious web delight,
In vain the varied work would shine
If wrought by any hand but thine:
Thy hand that knows the subtler art,
To weave those nets that catch the heart."

In other ways, too, he transcended his own age and "dipt into the future." There is a curious anticipation in "Rasselas" of Tennyson's prophetic vision of the airy navies grappling in the central blue.

"You, sir, whose curiosity is so extensive, will easily conceive with what pleasure a philosopher, furnished with wings, and hovering in the sky, would see the earth, and all its inhabitants, rolling beneath him. . . . How must it amuse the pendent spectator to see the moving scene of land and ocean, cities and deserts. . . . How easily shall we trace the Nile through all his passage; and examine the face of nature from one extremity of the earth to the other. . . . I have considered the structure of all volant animals, and find the folding continuity of the bat's wings most easily accommodated to the human form. Upon this model I shall begin my task. . . . If men were all virtuous I should with great alacrity teach them all to fly. But what would be the security of the good, if the bad could at pleasure invade them from the sky? Against an army sailing through the clouds, neither walls, nor mountains, nor seas could afford any security. A flight of northern savages might hover in the wind, and light at once with irresistible violence upon the capital of a fruitful region that was rolling under them."

It is true that his philosopher came to grief; but this was the eighteenth century. In the same fable, in his own massive way, Johnson anticipates an imagination of a very different kind.

In the matter of literary "origins" there are few "discoveries" to be made nowadays among the more famous works; yet one of the most curious "origins" of all is to be found, I believe, in "Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia." The wild romanticism of "Kubla Khan" seems, at first sight, to be remote indeed from the stately prose of Johnson's Eastern tale; but I should not be surprised to hear that Coleridge had been comparing it with Purchas's Pilgrims before he fell asleep and dreamed that broken and many-coloured dream. Johnson's description of the happy valley in which the palace of the prince was built, gives us a daylight picture of the very scene that Coleridge saw by glimpses of the moon. There are the "gardens bright with sinuous rills," and there the "sacred river" that escaped through "a dark cleft of the mountains, and fell with dreadful noise from precipice to precipice, till it was heard no more"; unless it echoes again through "the caverns, measureless to man" of "Kubla Khan." In the happy valley:

> "The shadow of the dome of pleasure > Floated midway on the waves," and in the palace of Rasselas, too, which was raised about thirty paces above the surface of the water, "all the artificers of pleasure were called to gladden the festivity." If Purchas be the common origin of both there are still touches in the tale of the Prince of Abyssinia which seem to reappear in "Kubla Khan," and are not to be found in the "Pilgrims."

It will be remembered that the wildest and most musical passage in "Kubla Khan" was inspired by a dream within the dream, and that this was not of Xanadu.

> "A damsel with a dulcimer
> In a vision once I saw.
> It was an Abyssinian maid . . ."

It would be to consider too curiously to trace these suggestions beyond their own flying gleams of indirect light into the caverns of Kubla Khan; but it seems probable that, in the strange fashion of dreams, the colours of "Rasselas" had somehow got interwoven with the more obvious colours of Purchas in the poem of Coleridge.

The deepest note stressed in "Rasselas" is again the note of human affection, which was the origin of all Johnson's groping after a world of more permanent values than are to be found in the world around us.

His own extraordinary power over the affections of others, in turn, was due to the true originality and force of a character rooted in those permanent realities. He was and is loved, in a large measure, because he was the exact opposite of the false novelty hunters whom he criticised. His "conservatism" draws its strength from the unfailing springs of truth, and was therefore a part of his real originality. For, in many respects, it was opposed to the whole spirit of his age. Its veracity made short work of cant, in literature, as in life; it was the formal Johnson who, when Voltaire attacked Shakespeare, gave the complete answer to the formal theory of the ancient "unities." Voltaire whenever he is mentioned by Johnson seems to shrink to the dimensions of a dancing-master. In the essay on Milton, discussing the sources of "Paradise Lost," Johnson wrecks Voltaire in a single sentence. "Voltaire," he remarks, "tells a wild and unauthorised story of a farce seen by Milton in Italy which opened thus: 'Let the Rainbow be the Fiddle-stick of the Fiddle of Heaven.'" And there Johnson leaves it. Yet in his criticism of the defects both of Shakespeare and of Milton he is far shrewder, far truer and far more independent of authority than any later critic. Macaulay, when he poured contempt on Johnson's critical powers, was the conventionalist, Johnson the original thinker. Johnson's remark that Shakespeare "threw away the world for a quibble," not only goes to the heart of the chief fault of Shakespeare but suggests the greatness of that capacity which alone prevented that fault from becoming intolerable. There are whole speeches in Shakespeare which are nothing more or less than bad punning, and Johnson had the courage to say so.

No other critic of Shakespeare has so completely maintained his own intellectual balance, both for praise and for blame. Take for instance his comment on some of the most famous lines in "Hamlet":

> "For who would bear the whips and scorns of time
> The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
> The insolence of office and the spurns
> That patient merit of the unworthy takes?"

In themselves of course they are great poetry. They are lines that, in every syllable, would strike home to the author of the "Vanity of Human Wishes," and, perhaps for that very reason, he lays his finger on their dramatic weakness. "It may be remarked," he says, "that 'Hamlet' in his enumeration of miseries, forgets, whether properly or not, that he is a prince, and mentions many evils to which inferior stations only are exposed."

Again, in his comments on "Macbeth" there is an extraordinary breadth of view. He quotes the passage:

> "Here lay Duncan
> His silver skin laced with his golden blood
> And his gash'd stabs looked like a breach in nature
> For ruin's wasteful entrance."

"Mr. Pope," he says, "has endeavoured to improve one of these lines by substituting gory blood for golden blood; but it may easily be admitted that he who could on such an occasion talk of 'lacing the silver skin,' would lace it with 'golden blood.' No amendment can be made to this line, of which every word is equally faulty, but by a general blot." Yet even here he is not dogmatic, and is prepared to state the other side. "It is not improbable," he adds, "that Shakespeare put these forced and unnatural metaphors into the mouth of Macbeth as a mark of artifice and dissimulation to show the difference between the studied language of hypocrisy and the natural outcries of sudden passion." That is of course the answer, and would be adopted at once by the conventional enthusiasm of the ordinary commentator. But Johnson bends his great brows over it like a thunder-cloud, gives us both aspects of the matter in two strong, terse paragraphs, and refuses to decide between them. Why? His mind was ranging, far and wide, over the poet's works. He knew that Shakespeare was one of the immortals, so he would not lightly decide against him, but he knew that Shakespeare was often guilty of a certain fault, on occasions when it could not glibly be turned into a merit. He simply could not be sure; and there, being a very great critic, and having cleared his mind of cant, he left it, for his readers to brood over, as they brood over Shakespeare himself. Others abide our question. It was Johnson, on this occasion, that smiled and was still.

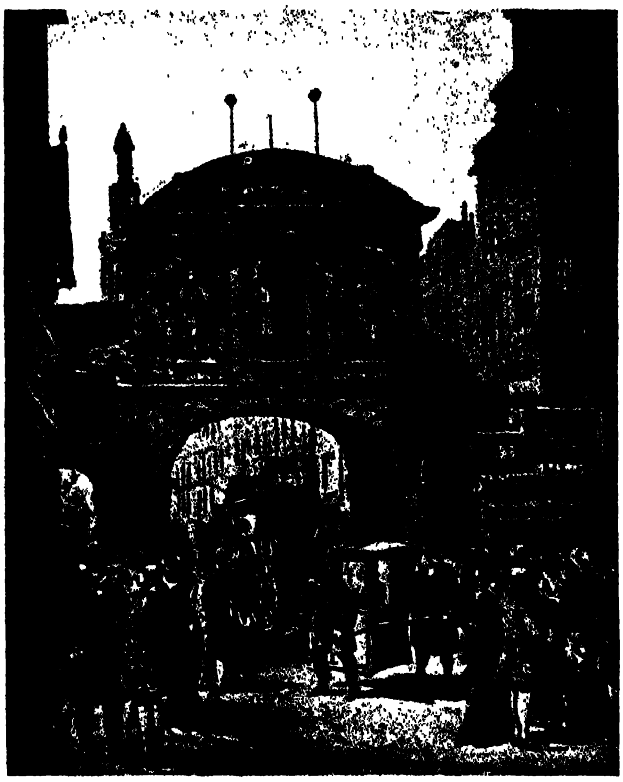
But what an example to the hasty judgments of those critics of the present day who, having no standards of judgment, deliver their arbitrary blame and praise, mistaking the chatter of the hour for fame, and the novelty of the hour for greatness. It did not prevent him from writing:

> " When learning's triumph o'er her barbarous foes
> First rear'd the stage, immortal Shakespeare rose;
> Each change of many-coloured life he drew,
> Exhausted worlds, and then imagined new;
> Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign
> And panting Time toiled after him in vain."

It is not what the later romantic poets would regard as the highest kind of poetry, yet that last line has been incorporated in the language. Neither that line nor its predecessor means quite what the critics who have quoted them suppose; but we must not expect too much. There is, of course, a rather subtle reference to Shakespeare's disregard of the classic " unities " of Time and Place. The passage is perhaps the truest single thing that any poet has ever said in verse about Shakespeare. When Swinburne, for instance, wanted to write about Shakespeare, he simply went into a religious ecstasy, and wrote lines like:

> " All stars are angels, but the sun is God."



Swinburne thought he had no religion, and his own nature as a poet revenged itself by forcing him, when he attempted to write about Victor Hugo or Shakespeare, to write an unconsciously religious poem. Johnson, on the other hand, had a religion, and he saw terrestrial things in a just proportion.

It is equally to be remembered by those who think that Johnson was unable to appreciate the beauty and power of Shakespeare that, shortly before he died, he repeated to his own physician those lines which so poignantly express his own lifelong torment of the mind:

> " Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased,
> Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,
> Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
> And with some sweet oblivious antidote
> Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff
> Which weighs upon the heart? "

It is one of the most grimly ironical characteristics of almost every generation that the crowd, following the latest fashions of the hour with perfect unanimity and complete conventionality, regards the lonely rebels, who refuse to follow, as representatives of the conventional mind. The ground shifts with each generation, and each forgets that what was glorious and lonely rebellion in a former day may be merely fashionable in the next. Voltaire was the spirit of the age of Johnson: and, in the age of Voltaire, this great, uncouth, pugnacious leader of English literature worshipped at St. Clement Dane's and knelt at his bedside, as humbly as a child, to say his prayers, remembering always in them poor " Tetty," as he called her, the wife who had been his best and only real friend in his younger days. This, in another man, might have meant little; but in Dr. Johnson, with his range of intellect, in the age of Voltaire, it meant that he was one of the loneliest figures in the world. Lonely, in spite of his love of children; lonely, in spite of the gaieties of Mrs. Thrale; lonely, in spite of the amazing collection of helpless and half-witted creatures with whom he filled his house. Loneliest of all, perhaps, in those hours when to escape his own brooding thoughts he talked to the friends who wondered whether his preoccupation was due to his personal fear of death. Like all men of genius, he had to wrestle with a dark angel, and there was none to understand him.

It is the custom to-day to accept the shallow judgment of Macaulay on Johnson's own writings; yet, in some of the essays of the Rambler there are passages of prose infinitely finer than anything that Macaulay ever wrote, passages that give the clue to his own carelessness of fame, his indolence, and his brooding upon death. The style is of his own day; but it is only a narrowly time-bound critic who will accept (for instance) the involved periods of Henry James as excellent, and will dismiss the balanced and lucid prose of Johnson as worthless. It has a grave elegiac quality, the slow waves of it breaking in measured cadences, and through their very regularity somehow conveying the immeasurable sadness of the great Roman soul that breathed through them. Listen to this:

"When a friend is carried to his grave, we at once find excuses for every weakness, and palliations of every fault. We recollect a thousand endearments, which before glided off our minds without impression, . thousand favours unrepaid, a thousand duties unperformed, and wish, vainly wish, for his return, not so much that we may receive, as that we may bestow happiness, and recompense that kindness which before we never understood."

When he began to publish his Rambler, his wife had said to him, quietly: "I knew you could write, but I did not know you could write like this." It was probably the happiest moment of his life. The last number of the Rambler was dated with the day of her death. Mrs. Meynell, in the beautiful essay in which she defended Mrs. Johnson against the brutal ridicule of Macaulay, has said well that her real epitaph is not that which is inscribed on her tomb. It is hidden, as it was hidden in Johnson's heart, yet it beats, as that great heart beats, through every syllable of the masterpiece of English prose in which he declined the favour of Lord Chesterfield. Almost the saddest words in our tongue, I think, are those terrible phrases: "It comes too late. I am solitary and cannot impart it."

Their formal balance gives them the strength of a terrible restraint, a dreadful reserve which, if it were broken down, would show a great soul upon the rack, but a soul that, even upon the rack, is its own master: "It comes too late. I am solitary and cannot impart it." Cannot impart it. What does that mean? It might have pleased her. They would have talked about it, had a pleasant little gossiping time over their fourth dish of tea. "When the book comes out, we will do this and that and the other." But now—too late——

"I am solitary and cannot impart it."

But the realisation of his loss was no new thing to him. He had never lived merely in the present, and he was acquainted in youth with every grief that might befall him, though he did not know when or where. It was this "awareness" that gave to his writings a quality that has never been fully appreciated, an undertone of the music of eternity. Again and again, in the Rambler we hear that note.

Some of those classic essays, with their great measured cadence, have a place in English prose very like that of Gray's "Elegy" in English verse; and, if he did not altogether appreciate Gray, it is perhaps in part because he knew beforehand—only too well—what Gray had to tell him.

> "Can storied urn or animated bust
> Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
> Can honour's voice provoke the silent dust,
> Or flattery soothe the dull, cold ear of death?"

It is a continuation of his own "Vanity of Human Wishes," and he had explored it all again and again in his prose. Compare for instance those verses, with this passage from the Rambler, taken almost at random:

"The influence of greatness, the glitter of wealth, the praises of admirers, and the attendance of supplicants, appeared vain and empty things when the last hour seemed to be approaching. . . . His friends expected to please him by accounts of the growth of his reputation, but they soon found how vainly they attempted by flattery to relieve the solicitude of approaching death. Riches, authority and praise lose all their influence when they are considered as riches which to-morrow shall be bestowed upon another, authority which shall this night expire for ever, and praise which, however merited, or however sincere, shall, after a few moments, be heard no more. Everything that terminated on this side of the grave was received with indifference. It had little more prevalence over his mind than a bubble that had now broken, a dream from which he was awake. His powers were engrossed by the consideration of another state."

It was not the personal fear of death that oppressed him—as some of his lighter-minded friends supposed. It was the awful presence of the eternities and, in part, his dread of severance from what seemed dearer than life, "the loss of those whom we have loved with tenderness." "Friendship between mortals," he wrote, "can be contracted on no other terms than that one must some time mourn for the other's death; and this grief will always yield to the survivor one consolation proportionate to his affliction; for the pain, whatever it be, that he himself feels, his friend has escaped."

He was never able to put these thoughts aside. They were true; they besieged him with their truth, their dreadful original truth; and sometimes, in spite of their truth, they were too much for him. This was why he distracted himself with his friends, and disliked to be alone. But even when he was with his friends he would sometimes be overheard murmuring a prayer to himself. His sympathy with Catholicism was partly due to his intense realisation of the naturalness of "praying for the dead." His sacraments were summed up in the idea of communion, with those he loved, and with God. He had greater affections than he ever displayed, and they were made all the more poignant by his preoccupation.

> "The dusky strand of death inwoven here
> With dear love's tie, makes Love itself more dear."

Boswell writes, with innocent vanity, how Johnson travelled down to Dover to see him off on his European travels. But he misses the almost pathetic wistfulness of that great figure standing on the shore, and gazing after the ship. It probably never occurred to Boswell how greatly Johnson would miss him. Johnson writes to him, formally enough, asking for certain information that could be of no possible use to him; and Boswell is again flattered at the request, not seeing that the pathetically comic list of things about which Johnson required to be told conceals the simple affectionate desire of the arrogant old emperor of English literature to get a message from his little friend, a message of any sort.

Johnson in 1777.

From the bust by Nollekens.

Yet, in all this brooding over the inevitable end, there was an infinite courage. One remembers how, at the end of his life, when the surgeon was trying to relieve him of his dropsy by an incision, Johnson urged him to cut deeper. There was courage in this desire to live; courage, and the pathos of courage in his desire to see Rome before he died; courage, and the deep root of all true courage, in his contemplation of that other state, and that other City, eternal in the heavens, which illumined all his prayers. "The Vanity of Human Wishes" ends with a glimpse of the Abiding beyond the transient; and of that which enfolds all changes and can never change. Whole volumes of theology are compressed into one of its couplets:

> "Safe in His power, whose eyes discern afar
> The secret ambush of a specious prayer."

The superficial contradiction between the prayer "Thy will be done," and the very act of praying is transcended in the depths of the Divine wisdom; and, in that noble conclusion of the poem, if it be read aloud in the right way, there is a slow, deep pulse as though the great heart of its author were throbbing through all the iron restrictions of the eighteenth century. It is customary almost to ignore Johnson as a poet; but, behind all the dignity and formality of those lines, there are tears hidden; pangs of mortal grief, and the passion of an immortal and unconquerable spirit, gazing through Life and Time and Death, into the depths of the Eternal.

> "Still raise for good the supplicating voice,
> But leave to Heaven the measure and the choice.
> Safe in His power, whose eye discerns afar
> The secret ambush of a specious prayer;
> Implore His aid, in His decisions rest,
> Secure whate'er He gives He gives the best.
> Yet when the sense of sacred presence fires,
> And strong devotion to the skies aspires,
> Pour forth thy fervours for a healthful mind,
> Obedient passions, and a will resigned;
> For love, which scarce collective man can fill,
> For patience, sovereign o'er transmuted ill;
> For faith, which panting for a happier seat,
> Counts death kind Nature's signal for retreat.
> These goods for man the laws of Heaven ordain;
> These goods He grants, who grants the power to gain;
> With these celestial wisdom calms the mind,
> And makes the happiness she does not find."

The language and the manner are far removed from those of our day. Many poets have written couplets which may strike us as more "brilliant"; but I know of none in the language which, if read with the simple integrity of spirit that is their due, are so likely to fill the reader's eyes with unexpected tears.

SEVENTEENTH CENTURY LITERATURE.*

By GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

IT is not always that a title really contributes to the understanding of a book; and there have been—yea, and are—instances when such information is deliberately withheld by it. Professor Grierson's case is not one of these latter. It is a good many years since, by his work on Donne, he established not merely a foothold in but a holdfast upon the English literature of the seventeenth century; and there is perhaps no century in the history of the world's literature which offers such greatness and such variety to those who deal with it. As is pretty clearly explained by the title itself, it is "applied" rather than "pure" literary history with which he has chosen to deal—the extreme width of the prescription of his subject allowing this. And he has taken advantage of the double meaning assigned by high authorities to the word "humanism." He had a perfect right to do so, though some argument might be made for limiting it to the best known use, connected with literae humaniores. This meaning is not entirely excluded from the book; but the other is its main subject. He means by "humanism" due respect for human nature in all its fullness, therefore including "our natural desires and instincts as distinguished from the claims of the divine," and he deals with this subject in lectures or chapters more especially devoted to "Renaissance and Reformation," "Spenser," "The Drama," "Love Poetry," "Humanism and the Churches," "Milton," "Commonwealth and Restoration," with one on "Dryden" to finish.

It will be obvious at once that any amount of good discussion—shall we say good fighting?—is possible under these headings. There is not one of them that doth not make the mouth of the reviewer to water. But in a short review he cannot of course gratify his will to comment. It will be perhaps really the wisest way, though it may seem too obvious, to confine remarks to the treatment of the three great individuals of the century itself, leaving out with regret Spenser but taking Shakespeare in "Drama," Milton and Dryden.

It is difficult to say anything new about Shakespeare unless you talk nonsense, for "divine Nonsensia" has this of divinity about her, that she is quite inexhaustible. But Professor Grierson does not talk nonsense, though he does talk something a little surprising; that is to say, he does not seem to accept quite comfortably the absence or very occasional presence in the bard of "moral and political principles." The interest of "Julius Cæsar" is "purely human," and so is that of "Antony and Cleopatra," which however he elsewhere gratefully and most truly allows to be "a magnificent apotheosis." But why should Shakespeare deal with moral and political principles if these are things that he does not want to write about? Professor Grierson finds it a strange thing to his mind that Margaret in "Much Ado About Nothing" should feel "no inhibitory impulses" and that "her conduct should have provoked no disapproval." Wicked people might suggest that "inhibitions" did not exist in the seventeenth century and add that Margaret's conduct—a mere frolic which half accidentally lent itself to mischief—is disapproved of.

> "But Margaret was in some fault for this."

In fact, interesting as the whole thing is, one cannot help thinking that Professor Grierson has a little forgotten the great Aristotelian prohibition of "trespassing on another kind."

No such remark need be made on his dealings with Milton, which have the merit, partly it would seem helped by M. Saurat, of showing acquaintance with the De Doctrina. There is perhaps a very little touch of that curious dealing with poor Mary Powell which is almost universal with Milton's apologists, though Professor Grierson can hardly be called this in any excessive sense. They usually forget wholly, and he seems not quite constantly to keep in mind that we have no evidence against her whatever. They construct from Milton's writings on Divorce the image of "a dull and common girl" (that was Mark Pattison's, was it not?) and then take this for Mary. A judge might almost as well stop a case after counsel for the plaintiff had opened it and let the jury decide on that. Putting this aside however, Professor Grierson's chapter, though dealing less with literature than with character and religion, is more than well worth reading; in fact it should not be neglected by anyone who desires to know what this wonderful poet and most disagreeable man was like.

Not quite so much can be said of the treatment of Dryden, though it also should by no means be neglected. It seems to be "great*est*ness" rather than "greatness" which Professor Grierson cannot allow to Glorious John. And this itself seems to be due to a general conception of poetry which, while it may be some people's, is not that of others. He in one place even denies bare greatness to Dryden because he "believed in nothing." There is more than one thing in which no doubt it is better that any man should believe, but what particular connexion belief has with poetry will take some working out. Professor Grierson himself quotes not a few passages which, if they are not poetry, are verse-rhetoric of the very best, and if verse-rhetoric of the very best is not the highest poetry, it can demand to be bracketed as not high but real. Nay, if the opening of "Religio Laici" and the eight (it was eight, wasn't it?) best lines in "Aurengzebe" which Miss Kitty quoted are not poetry, it is rather difficult to know what is. Nevertheless here, as in the other places, suggestion of disagreement by no means implies rejection. On the contrary, there is no book known to the present writer which has made the reading of this superfluous: and a little disagreement need only serve as salt and pepper and mustard to season the consumption of it.

MASARYK AS A BOOKMAN.

By Henry Baerlein.

ONE of the most remarkable of men, Thomas Masaryk, President of Czechoslovakia, celebrates his eightieth birthday on March 7th, having been born in the little town of Hodonin in Moravia in 1850. Moravia, with Bohemia, was then a part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. It is now a part of the flourishing new Republic. This consummation was undreamed of in 1850, and it is improbable that the Imperial coachman's wife, dreaming, as mothers will, of her son's great future, ever fancied that he would be largely instrumental in overthrowing the Imperial régime and become the Chief of the State. Bohemia was an independent kingdom five centuries ago; now, joined by the kindred Slovaks, she has once more entered the ranks of independent nations.

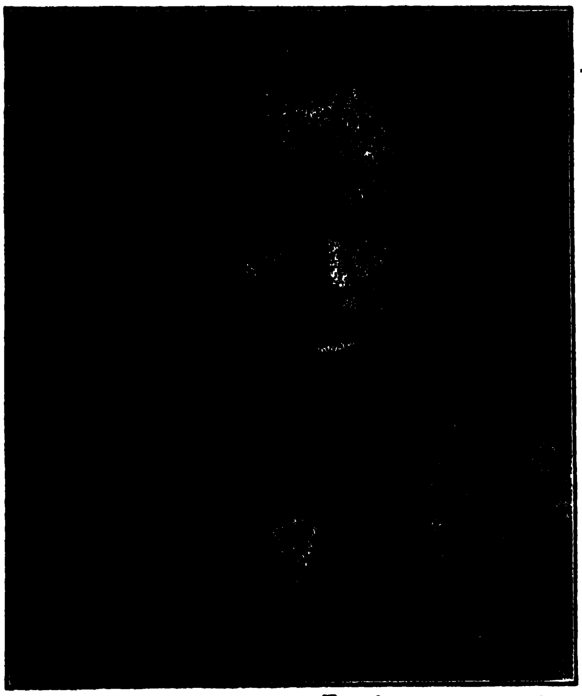
But in this article we will occupy ourselves with Masaryk, not as a parliamentarian and a statesman, but as a writer. His literary works are so numerous that they occupy ten pages of a catalogue. He has dealt with the most diverse subjects, ever since the time when he began to lecture at Vienna University and when, as professor of philosophy, he proceeded to the famous University of Prague, the town which is now the capital of Czechoslovakia and where the venerated ex-professor dwells in the Hradshin, that castle of the Habsburgs which looks down upon the panorama of the city.

From 1883 onwards Masaryk edited the Athenæum, a periodical devoted to criticism. Subsequently, being elected to the Vienna Parliament, he founded a newspaper, the Cas (Time), to ventilate the views of his small but zealous Czech party. He wrote a great many pamphlets, brochures and books, among them a large work dealing with the subject of suicide, which he classified as a disease. His examination of it was masterly. One of his life-long loves has been logic—as one gazes at the shelves of his private library to-day one finds books on this subject by his English, German and French colleagues, all of which he reads, as he does Russian, Italian and other books, in the original. His own writings on logic have been of great interest. Talking of Russia, this also is one of his chosen subjects. Foreign affairs began to fascinate him in the early days, and Russia, as the largest of the Slav countries, naturally claimed much of his attention. He travelled up and down the Tsar's huge empire, disapproving of many things and making many friends. His book on the Spirit of Russia is a monumental work. Later on, when he found himself in that country, during the Kerensky régime, his knowledge of it was of the utmost service to the cause which he had then at heart, the consolidation, amid the crumbling away of Russia, of the Czechoslovak legions.

Perhaps Masaryk's most noteworthy book is "The Making of a State" (Allen & Unwin). The English translation has an introduction by Wickham Steed who acknowledges that "partiality may, it is true, affect my judgment. For twenty years Masaryk has allowed me to think of him as a friend; and though, from the spring of 1907 onwards, I have sought coolly to estimate the man and his work, I may be biased by personal affection and admiration." How can one help admiring such a man, who, a frail and elderly professor, abandoned everything and went out into the world to fight for his beloved Czechs and Slovaks? He is indeed the Father of his country, having done more than any one man to establish its independence, then being called to preside over its destinies and then tracing the whole development in an epoch-making historical work. It is as if Lincoln had written the tale of his achievements; it is indeed of Abraham Lincoln that one is reminded when in conversation with Marasyk, for he talks English with rather an American accent; his wife, who died a few years ago, was American.



Every page of "The Making of a State" holds our attention and there are more than 440 large pages. Here we see what happens when a sage devotes himself to the world of politics. We have had, among ourselves, the example of Professor Bryce; but of course Masaryk's political career has been by far more dazzling. Here we have the Head of a State who says that "if the new diplomacy is to be a diplomacy of the whole people, its representatives must be accredited to peoples, not merely to heads of states. Logically this would imply that a diplomatic envoy should uphold the interests and the policy of his country in foreign parliaments. Relations between states and nations might thus, in course of time, be usefully supplemented by inter-parliamentary intercourse." It is impossible here to give any adequate account of this very remarkable book with its philosophic meditations, its shrewd pen-portraits of men and its description of all the thrilling events in which the author had his share. Among his visitors in America was a Montenegrin general "who wore rather too much gold braid and made, in consequence, a doubtful impression upon the Americans." This book is not without its lighter side. It is, as Wickham Steed remarks, "a greater testament to the people he redeemed, a testament written in every line and between the lines of one of the most notable interpretations of past and contemporary history."

DOSTOIEVSKY'S LETTERS.*

By Wilfrid Gibson.

TENNYSON long ago protested, in vain of course, against the "love of letters overdone" that urges posthumous appreciators to activities which threaten to "swamp the sacred poets in themselves." But if critics and commentators, and the pickers-up of unconsidered trifles, were a menace in his day, they are a catastrophe now; the river that seemed likely to burst its banks has become a veritable deluge; and it will be a marvel if any reputation survive the unceasing wash of words about it and about! Tennyson himself is one of the latest victims. As if his published collected works were not, in all conscience, voluminous enough, I see that a play which he wrote at the age of fourteen has just been dragged to light and printed. But it is not only the reputations of the sacred poets that are the sport of injudicious and undiscriminating enthusiasm; it would seem that anyone who has ever made any mark in the world of letters is at the mercy of the literary scavengers, to whom neither the waste-paper basket nor the secret drawer in the bureau is sacred; and, at the moment, the reputations of the great Russian novelists, Tolstoy and Dostoievsky, are going through a terrible ordeal. These two writers are of course peculiarly tempting game for the book-makers, because they, in spite of temperamental differences, had one thing in common—each had a real personality at least as interesting as that of any of the fictitious characters he created, and each, in his measure, lived a life more thrilling than that of the average man of letters. So doubtless we are fated to hear their "story" told again and again; and no lightest scribble of their pens will be allowed to remain unprinted.

Fyodor Dostoievsky (1821-1881).

If we may judge from the number and volume of works on these two novelists that have been issued recently, the appetite for posthumous bits and scraps would seem to be insatiable; and yet I fancy that even that curious public which would always rather read about a writer than read him; which, ignoring the poet, will lap up greedily any chatter about Harriet—I fancy that even the amateurs of intimate revelations of the private life of public characters will find this formidable volume of the letters of Dostoievsky a tough morsel to swallow. On second thoughts, however, "tough" seems hardly the word to use; for the writing has neither fibre nor muscle; I should have said, rather, that they will find the book a stodgy mouthful. Dostoievsky was not a good letter-writer; and the letters in this book are the letters of a sick man consumed by a morbid apprehensiveness and an hysterical fretfulness over domestic details. Why it should ever have been thought worth while to print them, even in the original Russian, I cannot conceive; still less can I imagine why anyone should have set about the positively Herculean labour of translating them into English. It must have been a task as tedious as it was thankless. True there is some interest in being assured that Dostoievsky was an affectionate husband and a devoted parent; but who can be expected to read with avidity pages and pages of this sort of thing in endless repetition:

"You promised in your last letter to write to me on Tuesday, and in that case your letter should definitely have reached me yesterday, i.e. Saturday. I was astonished that it didn't come. But that isn't all, for I went to the post office to-day, Sunday, at eight o'clock (the post comes from Berlin at 10 p.m.) thinking your letter might have arrived last night, but again I was told: 'Nothing for you.' I confess I was anxious and God grant nothing has happened to you. I slept badly last night, for I kept thinking you had fallen ill and you hadn't, therefor, been able to write. I am also wondering if anything has happened to the children and you don't want to write and frighten me. Oh, Anya, if nothing has happened then it is wicked of you, darling, to miss writing after having promised to write regularly. If only you knew how it all affects my nerves! Here am I reproaching you but at the same time thinking: 'What if she is lying ill in bed at this minute?' There is a confounded arrangement in Ems that the post office is closed on Sundays from 9 a.m. and only opens in the evening, and then only for an instant. And here I am free on Sundays and not once have I been able to get there at that instant, because the exact time is never fixed; when you get there in the evening you are told: 'It has just been open, but it is closed now until to-morrow.' That is their idea of a system, and with so many visitors here too! So at this moment I am doubly sad. Perhaps I shall not get your letter to morrow either, even if it does arrive. What if I don't hear from you to-morrow or the day after? Then I shall wire. I shall go to the telegraph office to-day and see if there is a telegram for me. The whole of to-day will be torture for me until I hear from you. . . .'

And so on, page after page! All of which Anya may or may not have found very touching; though I doubt if even the most devoted of wives would not have been impatient of this sort of thing in letter after letter. To the outsider this kind of maundering seems unspeakably dreary; and Dostoievsky's very faithful accounts of the weather, and of the course of his treatment at Ems, are scarcely more thrilling. Letter after letter is written in the same strain, and almost in the same words. In fact all that this huge book of nearly four hundred pages, all written in an equally undistinguished style, tells us about Dostoievsky could be conveyed to us in a sketch of half a dozen pages, or indeed in a sentence. Dostoievsky was a very sick man, much harassed by money difficulties—that is the gist of this voluminous correspondence.

Somebody has said that whenever two or three poets are gathered together they talk about money; and as most poets are doomed to live a hand-to-mouth existence, who can blame them? I at least have enough of a fellow feeling for Dostoievsky, in his struggles to make ends meet, to resent the remarks of a reviewer of this volume who considered Dostoievsky's preoccupation with money matters "sordid." It is not sordid surely to want to earn enough to keep your children from starving? And yet, though the reviewer got hold of the wrong word to express it, I can quite understand his irritation. Surely nobody wishes to listen to a phonographic reproduction of the intimate conversation of poets in financial difficulties; and however hard up we may be ourselves, and however much interested we may be in our own ailments, even the most altruistic of us cannot help being bored by an interminable recital of the monetary embarrassments and bodily afflictions of another; and this volume offers us little else. It tells little of Dostoievsky as a writer, and even less of anyone else. The egotism of the artist, plus the egotism of the invalid, produces a sum of self-importance which it is difficult for the most sympathetic mind to regard with tolerance. But then we have no business to be poking into this private correspondence, have we? Let us confine ourselves to the fare that Dostoievsky so lavishly provided for us; let us read what he meant us to read, and acknowledge his genius with ungrudging gratitude.

THE MAN—AND THE MANIKINS.*

By Alfred Tresidder Sheppard.

ONE might find many sobriquets for Gabriel Honoré de Riquetti, Comte de Mirabeau, who, after all, said when taunted about his title that anyone who cared might take it. "The Devil's Nephew" was what his astounding father, who lacked humour, called his son in a letter to the boy's uncle. He was "M. L'Ouragan" or "Mr. Hurricane," "Comte de la Bourrasque" or "Count Caprice"; he was "The Titan" and "the Hercules" of the earlier Revolution. Before the dark curtains closed on his troubled life, he asked, at the sound of distant cannon: "Are these already the funeral ceremonies of Achilles?"

"Men? Men?" cried a termagant ancestress of Mirabeau's to her own generation, "why, you are only manikins"; and I think that with all his faults and violences and follies, her descendant may well dispute with Napoleon the greatest of all his titles: The Man.

This biography by M. Henri de Jouvenel, formerly French High Commissioner in Syria, supplies a real want. Innumerable books on Mirabeau in French and German are quite unknown to English readers, who have as a rule been too easily content with Carlyle's "French Revolution" and his Essay in the London and Westminster Review. Carlyle is magnificent, but not always history. Mr. P. E. Willart, one of Mirabeau's few biographers in our own tongue, spoke of Carlyle's "fanciful rhapsody," and I remember Dr. Holland Rose once saying to me that his portrait should not be taken too literally. Emerson records a conversation with Carlyle in which he insisted on making Mirabeau a hero; when he had raised a man to this pedestal he saw to it that there was no lack of paint or gilt. And so Mirabeau is a man of much finer nature than Danton or Napoleon; his genius is as strong as that of Napoleon, but more humane and "almost poetic." Possibly; he was certainly, in his public life at least, head and shoulders above the perplexed, blustering, inarticulate, impotently or insanely violent lesser figures of his day. It has been said that he was fortunate in the hour of his death. At least this turned Mirabeau into a great question mark—a very notable and insistent " If " of history. Had he lived, France might possibly and even probably have taken another road than that which led, through blood and terror, to " the whiff of grapeshot " at St. Roch within five short years—and to all that followed.

M. de Jouvenel's opening chapters roused, I confess, some apprehensions. One suspected another of the facile modern compilations, balanced on the edges of history and historical fiction, and falling between them both. We are shown into the library at the little Château of Bignon where the doctor announces to the Marquis of Mirabeau—and to a crowd of country squires and villagers and officials—that he is the father of a son, tongue-tied and otherwise malformed. In the same library, five years later, the Marquis and his slatternly, disreputable wife quarrel among his gilded books. But in a solitary foot-note (which begins: " I hope not to burden this book with foot-notes ") the author's method is explained and justified. We are being given facts and not mere speculations; it is all most ingeniously done. The author writes crisply, with an unobtrusive humour and irony; sly and dry both of these, so that the reader smiles constantly over some unexpected twist of word or thought. Thus the old Marquis, that crabbed bundle of contradictions who clapped his family into custody while preaching universal good will, has nearly ended a busy day. He has signed warrants of arrest against young men who have spoken ill of him, has punished his son with dry bread for making his first speech, has told his wife that his eleven years with her have been years of colic—and then—

" An idea struck him. . . . This beautiful day that was coming to its close, the discovery he had made of his son, the delicious absence of his wife, the pride that he felt in duty accomplished, his fraternal stroll among the peasants, had revealed him to himself. He had found the motto for his future book and, he thought, the motto for his life. On the virgin title page of the manuscript he had begun, he hurried to write:

' L'Ami des hommes.' "

" By plebeian means—the book and speech," says M. de Jouvenel, the father attained celebrity, the son glory. We travel with both in the post-chaise to Versailles, where young Gabriel is fascinated by Swiss guards, light cavalry, bodyguards, a negro cymbalist—" an immense parade of dolls intended for the amusement of a magnificent child "—and is shown King Louis, and is snubbed by the Pompadour's doctor. The old order—seemingly secure, in spite of philosophers and economists and sages. The old order, the wreck of which, after his turbulent and unhappy and dissipated youth, he tried to save and make the foundations of a new.

Astounding, the power of his " plebeian means," book and speech! Hideously ugly, pock-marked (but no longer tongue-tied), with a reputation hard to live down, he mastered and ruled the most turbulent assembly in history; and did not live to see his final failure. " Silence, you thirty voices! " he had thundered at the Jacobins, and they were silent. But Death called " Silence "; and twenty-five million French voices fell on deaf ears. Amid the thunder of cannon and beating of muffled drums, three hundred thousand mourners followed him to the grave.

He was in advance of his time. A free press, freedom of religion, representative government nationally and locally, the reconciliation of royal and national authority and interests—these were some of his aims. Listen to this declaration when there was an agitation for fresh armaments: " The French nation renounces the undertaking of any war with the object of making conquests, and will never employ its force against the liberty of any people." M. de Jouvenel's brilliant study makes one wonder again what might have happened if Mirabeau had lived even to see his fiftieth year. He died at forty-two.

AFTERNOON AND TWILIGHT OF VANDA PINELLI.

By L. STENI. 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)

This is not likely to be a popular book—it is a study, influenced a little by Marcel Proust, of the moral deliquescence of the eponymous heroine. Vanda is one of those pitiable figures who are clay for any potter; the colour they have is their own, and may deceive for a time all but the acutest observer, but there is no life in their gestures, no real desire in their whims, no fire in their fancies, no permanence even in their vices. Vanda Pinelli drifts from man to man, from place to place, from mood to false mood, with the ease of liquid; she is loved, and cannot understand what love is; she is intimate without friendliness, and no more dreams of refusing money from a man she hates than she would abstain from hiring a cab because the driver held a different philosophy from hers. Mr. Steni writes with restraint; occasionally he is a little over-elaborate in his analysis; but as an account of degradation the book is an astonishing tour de force, and every reader must recognise the inevitability of its ending when Vanda is sentenced to imprisonment for a series of thefts from the shop in which she is employed.

ATTILA—THE SCOURGE OF GOD.

By MARCEL BRION. 12s. 6d. net. (Cassells.)

The translation is by Mr. Harold Ward, and there are eight half-tone plates, giving salient events of the story, such as the March on Paris and the Meeting of Attila and Pope Leo; while the duplicate map, which forms the end-papers, shows the transitory empire established by the Hun king and the geographical locations of Goths, Visigoths, Vandals and other " barbarians." The translator's work is done efficiently, and the French original is something more than the " living picture " which it is termed in the publishers' announcement: it is the artistic and imaginative creation of a mighty lord of war, who was also a political leader and diplomatist of incredible astuteness, having regard to his race and period. He is shown to be adroit in strategy, patient in negotiation, intelligent even in ferocity, and looking in war itself for the reward of peace to come. It is for historical criticism to determine whether and to what extent the raw material of available old records may justify the new portrait which has been fashioned thus out of " the legendary figure of frightfulness." Meanwhile M. Brion has given us an epic story which carries conviction with it to the merely literary sense, from the beginning of Attila as a hostage who was also a guest of the Roman Emperor, to the mighty crash of the closing scenes.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

ARTHUR L. SALMON.

MR. SALMON has had a long and distinguished literary career. But, so far as adequate recognition is concerned, he has suffered because of his versatility, and perhaps, in these latter days, through changes in literary fashions. He may be said to have four or five different reputations of greater or less extent; but to his work as a whole scant justice has, so far as we know, been paid. His experience affords one more illustration of the fact that the public dislikes versatility in its writers and keeps its greatest rewards, as a rule, for those who go on repeating a single formula or trick. Mr. Salmon has been too sensitive and sincere a literary artist to seek success at such a price. He has always followed his own gleam, wherever it has led him; and, though he may deplore the comparative neglect of his best work, we may be sure that he counts fidelity to his own artistic conscience a prize more satisfying than any material one.

Mr. Arthur L. Salmon.

Born over sixty years ago at Exeter, Mr. Salmon was privately educated at Bristol, where he has lived since early childhood. He was trained with a view to the musical profession, and though he was drawn by a stronger impulse into literature, he has retained the love and, to some extent, the practice of music—a fact which is clearly reflected, both explicitly and implicitly, in his writings. And if he has not himself composed music, he has at any rate supplied some of the best composers with words for songs. His "Pleading" has been set by Sir Edward Elgar, while "Wait" and "Homing" are known wherever songs are sung. Mr. Salmon has certainly no reason to be ashamed of this branch of his activities: his words for music are far enough removed from the usual sentimental banalities. At the same time it is easy to understand his regret that things like "Wait" and "Homing" have been widely popular, while his better and more serious verse has won but a limited circle of readers.

As a journalist Mr. Salmon has been a prolific contributor, for nearly forty years, to many of the leading English and American periodicals. As an author he is best known by his topographical works. His book on Cornwall in Methuen's incomparable series of "Little Guides" is now in its seventh edition, and for another excellent series—the S.P.C.K.'s "English Towns"—he wrote the volume on Plymouth. Other of his works in this genre include "Literary Rambles in the West of England" (Chatto & Windus), "The Cornwall Coast" (Fisher Unwin), and "The Heart of the West" (Robert Scott). This last, illustrated by Mr. Frederick Adcock's charming sketches, is easily among the best contemporary books of its kind—at once informative, impressionalistic, atmospheric, and intensely human and companionable. Topography in Mr. Salmon's hands—as in those of Mr. A. G. Bradley, his only peer—becomes literature.

How different from the sentimental and often insincere "gush" of the average topographer is the genuine poetic feeling that illuminates "The Heart of the West"! As an actual guide for the intelligent (especially the literary) tourist in Somerset, Devon and Cornwall, the book has no equal. But it is impossible to read it without realising that behind the mellow scholar is a genuine poet, a man of extraordinarily sensitive vision and spirituality, a quiet Christian mystic who is yet a passionate humanitarian. These aspects of Mr. Salmon's temperament never obtrude themselves in his topographical writings: they are just naturally there. They glow with a steady inner warmth, so that, as we loiter with him on Brixham Quay or stand before the West Front of Wells Cathedral, our thoughts are almost unconsciously turned from the seen to the unseen.

The eternal behind the temporal, the dream of immortality and its influence upon human thought and conduct: these themes have for Mr. Salmon a fascination which finds fuller and more definite expression in his two recent volumes of prose sketches, essays, and stories entitled "The Ferry of Souls" and "Waysides and Byways" (Foulis). Here the writer gives free scope to his love of beauty and his mysticism, sometimes through direct description and narrative, and sometimes through fantasy and allegory. All that he touches is transmuted by his sensitive vision and fine feeling into something significant and interpretive, and his cadenced prose, poetical and colourful, yet always terse, restrained, and dignified, exhibits a delicacy of craftsmanship which, in its own line, is unsurpassed by any living writer.

Mr. Salmon's first book of poems appeared in 1894. Since then he has published at least nine other volumes, including "Songs of Wind and Wave" (Blackwood), "City, Sea and Country-side" (Dent) and "West Country Ballads" (Blackwood), which last contains some dialect pieces which responsible critics have ranked with those of William Barnes. "New Verses," already noticed in our February issue, has recently appeared through Messrs. Foulis in a pleasant edition at half a crown. Mr. Salmon would himself be the first person to disclaim any excessive pretentions that might be made for him. Humility is of the very essence of his inspiration, and, like all truly humble people, he finds appreciation has the effect, not of exalting him, but of accentuating his sense of the discrepancy between the ideal and the performance:

> "Give me no praise if thou art kind of will,
> Shaming my spirit to a mute despair.
> O friend, the praise that we deserve so ill
> Is harder than the sternest blame to bear."

It is however with excessive modesty that Mr. Salmon chooses such titles as "A Book of Verses" and "A New Book of Verses," to mention two more of his volumes. He may not be a great poet, but he is a very true one. If his range is not wide, and if he offers us few surprises or thrills, he leads us along "paths of the spirit" with rare sincerity, simplicity, and charm. He can be gay and light, and in some of his dainty poems of childhood. He can mingle humour, fantasy, and philosophy as in the dramatic sketch entitled "The Parson and the Clerk." But his most characteristic poems are those which describe the country-side and the sea, and which find in the natural world solace and sustenance for that inner joy and sanctity which are, for him, the true stuff of life. Sometimes he writes with assurance about man's final destiny, while at other times there is wistful poignance in his questionings.

Upon one of Mr. Salmon's dominant traits we have already commented. He combines mystical with practical Christianity in a manner all too uncommon in this, or any other, age. Life for him is a unity; there are no divisions between "sacred" and "secular"; the beauty of the outward world is an inspiration for that beauty of thought which should re-emerge in humane and generous action. There are some finely individual religious poems in Mr. Salmon's pages, and a nobler conception of patriotism than the flag-waving that is often mistaken for it. Mr. Salmon is as passionate a lover of men as he is of nature, and, for all his pensiveness, he displays a truer vitality and a surer contact with reality than most poets of more assertive temperament. His is the serene, inviolate courage that comes only of uncompromising loyalty to the inner vision:

> "The outworks all are taken
> And the purlieus passed;
> But the keep remains unshaken,
> The gate is fast.
> "I yield with vexed defiance
> Those outward parts,
> But I hold in calm reliance
> My heart of hearts. . . .
> "Grief, hunger, madness, weeping
> Prevail without;
> A central peace is keeping
> The last redoubt."

Mr. Salmon may be gentle, but he is strong; he may be quiet, but he is confident.

GILBERT THOMAS.

"THE DEVIL AND THE LADY."

By St. John Adcock.

YOU cannot always find promise of future greatness in the earliest verse of those destined to become great poets. There was little enough in the "sprightly runnings" of Byron's morning Muse, and none in the tepid, Tom-Mooreish experiments that came from Keats in his teens. But this blank verse comedy of Tennyson's* is such an amazing performance for a boy of fourteen that one can understand his father being moved to say of his boyish work in general, "If Alfred die one of our great poets will have gone." At eight he had been writing "Thomsonian blank verse"; at ten or eleven, as he himself records, he "wrote hundreds and hundreds of lines" under the inspiration of Pope's "Iliad"; and at twelve or so an epic of about six thousand lines in the manner of Scott. All these have been destroyed, but "The Devil and the Lady" had been preserved for over a hundred years and has, at length, been edited, with an introduction, by his grandson, Mr. Charles Tennyson, and rightly published for the light it throws upon the growth of the poet's art. "This play, in its unguarded freshness," writes its editor, "shows us Tennyson the boy, and should help not a little to solve the enigma of Tennyson the man." He wrote another play in the same vein, about the same time, but this has vanished.

It was a vein he did not develop. You come upon little of the bizarre fantasy, robust plain-spokenness, wildly grotesque humour of "The Devil and the Lady" in his later poetry, except perhaps for some echo of them in "The Vision of Sin," and there they are so restrained, refined, spiritualised as to make the comparison itself almost fantastic. There is a mediæval quaintness in the idea of the play and in its roistering, boisterous humour, but in turn of phrase, the amusing vituperative energy of some of its dialogue, the structure and harmony of its blank verse, it has obviously been influenced by the Elizabethan dramatists. When Magus, thinking the Devil has betrayed him, cries:

> "If he should answer my suspicions,
> I'll pen him for some centuries in ice
> Up to the neck; I'll rack his thumbs with screws;
> I'll twitch his tail until the black blood spout > Forth at the end; I'll fill his jaws with tooth-ache. . . ."

one remembers Prospero and his fury against Caliban. The Devil quotes Milton for his purpose, and elsewhere the boy naturally reflects the authors he has been reading; yet a distinctive, strongly individual note runs through the whole thing.

The story is of a rich old Necromancer, Magus, who is compelled to go a long journey by sea, and, jealous and uneasy at leaving his lively young wife unprotected against the unlawful suitors who hover about her, he exercises his magic to summon up the Devil and charges him to act as guardian in his absence, and the Devil shrinks from the responsibility:

> "Gentle master,
> I would do ought but this—I'd dive i' th' sea. . . .
> I'd visit far Arcturus, the bright length

* "The Devil and the Lady." By Alfred Tennyson. Edited by Charles Tennyson. With two facsimiles. 10s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

Of the Ecliptic and the spangled Lyre,
Or that dim star which in Boötes' wain
Shines nightly, or I'd bring thee gems from out
The stilly chambers of the mighty deep,
The boundless halls of porphyry, where sit
The ancient fathers of the sea with beards
That sweep the burnish'd chrysolite beneath 'em—
All this and more I'd do for thee, for these
Are trifles to that weighty task to guard
A woman 'gainst her will."

But Magus is adamant, and the Devil is left to his task. He enters just after Magus's departure, to overhear the resentful wife, Amoret, complaining angrily to herself of how the old dotard is " crusted o'er with age as thick as ice upon a standing pool." Having subdued her terror of him, the Devil reproves her, explains his mission, and orders her to bed. Then he takes his station outside the cottage door, " attired in a cap and gown," and, on the approach of Antonio, a lawyer, the first lover, pulls his cloak over his face to conceal " this grim, fantastic nose and these wide lips," tucks up his tail, and poses for Amoret. A disputatious talk between the supposed lady and Antonio ends in the disguised Devil sending Antonio into the cottage and promising to follow him directly. But another lover arrives, an elderly apothecary, and others, a sailor, an astronomer, a soldier, a monk. Their characters are deftly sketched; Antonio rejoins them, tired of waiting, and the Devil, playing them one off against the other, invites them all indoors for refreshment. While they are at table, eating and drinking and wrangling, there is a knock at the door. The Devil swiftly induces his guests to hide: the monk up the chimney, others in a chest, in a cupboard, under sacks, and opening the door finds Magus without. His voyage has been interrupted by a storm, in which " half the powers o' the other world were leagued against my journeyings," and he has had to return. The Devil discloses the situation and it is arranged that he shall go in, call his guests from hiding, and at an agreed signal Magus shall enter and deal with them. At this stage the drama is left unfinished.

The story is unfolded with a spontaneous gusto and with flashes of poetic description. Telling of the tempest that had driven him ashore, Magus says:

' The seas divided and dim Phantasies
Came thronging thickly round me, with hot eyes
Unutterable things came flitting by me;
Semblance of palpability was in them,
Albeit the wavering lightnings glittered thro'
Their shadowed immaterialities.
Black shapes clung to my boat; a sullen owl
Perch'd on the Prow . . ."

There are crudities of construction; the humour of some of the incidents and dialogue is raw and schoolboyish; but the understanding of life and character that flashes into his lines prompts you to say, as Jowett said, when he advised the omission of this and other poems from Tennyson's first book, that they are " most original, and it was wonderful how the whelp could have known such things." The play is good entertainment, and is of real value as revealing the man in the making, trying the wings of his imagination, sensitive already to the subtle nuances of metre, the magic of words and learning how to use them:

" For a great poet's made, as well as born."

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

MARCH, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 14th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the seven Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

" The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

That they may be available also to Overseas Competitors, Competitions I and II will be the same each month until further notice, but the subjects for all the other Competitions may each month be changed.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS.; the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best letter of advice, in not more than two hundred words, to anybody about to be married.

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best set of one-line comments on each of the following quotations—the line of comment rhyming with the line quoted:

Procrastination is the thief of Time.

Sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care.

There is in souls a sympathy with sounds.

Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well.

'Tis not in mortals to command success.

Man wants but little, nor that little long.

Miss Maude Caldwell Perry, author of "Tide House" (Harrap).

V.—HALF A GUINEA for the best statement, in not more than two hundred words, of " Why I like, or dislike, detective novels."

VI.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author and Publisher at head of each review.

VII.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

RESULTS OF COMPETIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

I.—THE PRIZE is divided and HALF A GUINEA each awarded to G. M. Haines, "Appleslade," Ringwood, Hants, and May Herschel Clarke, 254, Burrage Road, Woolwich, S.E.18, for the following:

IDEAL.

I have seen her stand in the city—
A radiance like the sun;
And the streets have gathered a sudden beauty
Before she has turned and gone.
But she goes in a flying moment,
Lost in the swaying crowd;
And my heart goes crying and calling to her,
Calling and crying loud:
I know she will never hear me,
And never will pause or stay—
But my steps will seek, and my feet for ever
Will follow her flying way!

I have seen her stand in the shadows
At dusk in the quiet lane;
I have caught the breath of her wondrous being,
A glimpse of her eyes again.
But she turns and flies and leaves me,
And does not feel my hand;
And the magic that leapt in my heart has vanished
Like day from the dusky land:
I know I shall never hold her—
Too freely and far she flies;
But my heart has bartered its life for ever
To follow her living eyes!

G. M. HAINES.

IN THE FIRELIGHT.

It is such rest to see you sitting there,
To watch the firelight flicker on your face,
As children love to pat their mother's cheek
With little fluttering fingers, to embrace,
Enfold her with young warmth, about her chair
Play their eternal game of hide-and-seek.

And even as you sit in this small room,
Centre of warmth, so are you, love, to me
The point from which in this cold world all light
Doth emanate, all hope, all gaiety;
Because your faith is mine, amid the gloom
Of aims misunderstood I stand upright.

It is such balm to feel your gentle hands
Smooth out my fretted brow at close of day,
To watch your tender smile as I confess
My failures and my hopes, to know alway
One soul there is who cares, who understands—
That in a rush of love and thankfulness

I stretch my arms out to that homely chair,
And strive with poor dumb lips, O Ever-Kind,
To tell what soul would say, and striving, start—
And rub my eyes—and wake—and waking, find—
Not you, ah, love, who never yet sate there—
Only an empty heart, my empty heart.

MAY HERSCHEL CLARKE.

We also select for printing:

HOMAGE TO A GENTLE HEART.

I have not wanted language to express
The joy of little loves that fly away;
But when I turn to all thy tenderness—
How poor is speech for that the heart would say!
I know thou dost not ask for idle praise,
Or look to see thy goodness told in Song;
Thine is a love that moves in quiet ways
Where its own glory guideth it along.
Tender as light of stars, thy love for me;
Not as the fickle moon or amorous sun,
But in dark places shining constantly:
A song at dawn, a kiss when day is done . . .
Thank God for gentle hearts, for love that sings—
Love great enough to shine through little things!

(Melfin W. Jones, 69, Pen-y-lan Hill, Cardiff.)

THE QUIET SQUARE.

In brooding shadow lies the peaceful square;
No busy market tramples on its calm:
As though mere noise could no more work it harm,
The greening statue stands serenely there.
In restful masses on the evening air
The dark shape of the church completes the charm.
With power-like cadences in some fine psalm
This tranquil space can still e'en restless care.
Across the road are gleaming eager shops
Where men display their wares and urge their worth;
Along the road the traffic hardly stops,
In futile hurry roaring back and forth.
And all the time this soothing quiet space
Reserves for jaded souls its healing grace.

(Esther Samms, 2, London Road, Luton, Beds.)

It has been difficult to arrive at a decision this month, and we are sending, as consolation prizes, two books to the authors of each of the two printed sonnets. Miss Samms should note, by the way, that "calm" and "psalm" are not quite perfect rhymes for "harm" and "charm." We also specially commend the lyrics by K. Blayney (Birmingham), Kathleen M. Chaplin (London, E.), Mrs. D. B. Macleod (Cookmere Hills, New Zealand), Margery C. Nudd (West Drayton), Eileen Newton (Whitby), J. Morton George (Woodford Green), Elsie Paterson Cranmer (Teddington), Sylvia D. Hooke (London, E.C.), Kathleen Rice (Steeple Claydon), John S. Coghlan (Dublin), Phyllis E. Noble (Long Melford), G. M. III.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best Limerick on the March Hare is awarded to John A Bellchambers, 40, Highgate Hill, N 19, for the following

When the wind blows in March, the March hare,
Though not hearing 'jug-jug,' all a-scare,
And as mad as a hatter,
With brains all a-scatter,
Gets taken and jugged unaware

The replies received are numerous, but rather disappointing We select for special commendation the limericks by Ada F Strike (West Worthing), Reginald Callender (Hungerford), Mrs W J E Haslam (Cheltenham), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Sir Duncan Grey (Weston super-Mare), C Burton (Forest Hill), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Helen Morris (Leek), Eileen Newton (Whitby), J F Parsons (Ware), Mrs Annie F Simpson (New Southgate), G M Starkey (Folkestone), L Bruce (Ashford), Ismay Trimble (Tankerton), Margaret W Simpson (Dundee), Lilian H Kruse (Eastbourne), Stanley G Hill (Chippenham), Mrs Barns-Graham (Blanefield), Mrs E J MacDonald Smith (Colinton), G Tottem (London N W), L F N Grant (Northampton), Emily Davis (Dublin), N Ray (Belfast) L Howlett (Southampton), Irene Boyd (Northwich), William Sinclair (Birmingham)

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best sentence, of not more than two hundred words, into which the largest number of book-titles mentioned in our February issue is intelligibly introduced, is awarded to Lorna Collard, "Overdene," Combe Down, Bath, for the following

Among The Gay Victorians lived Don Juan's Daughters, two Step-Sisters known as The Flirt and the Flapper, Difficult Women (because Beset by Early Sorrow), and The Talk of the Town from Dawn to Cock Crow of Another Day, until the elder (for after Harden's Escapade with her in The Empty Villa she Lost Sir Massingherd) married The Disinherited Man of the North who was Pulling Strings in China for his Kith and Kin by Proxy, and though the younger, having less Vainglory and more Strength of the Spirit, was Gerald Cranstone's Lady on The Voyage Out and Around the Coasts of Arabia, after coming Home she received Letters From Italy By Way of Introduction to Geoffry Hamlyn (Hetty's Son)—A Solemn Boy—and when he became The Runner for The Crimson Smile, declaring Out of the Depths of The Passionate Heart that they must Double or Quit, she decided after Persuasion to Trip No Further, abandoned her Pride and Prejudice, accepted the usual Cluster of Gems, married him, and lived happily in Retreat under The Roof of Windmill Cottage, surrounded by Gorse, Heather and Peat, where Shepherds in Sackcloth trudged Along the Road At the Close of Day—(46 titles).

We also select for printing:

(Eileen Newton, "Hildawell," Southend Gardens, Whitby Yorks)

I've spent Another Day in this land of Gorse, Heather and Peat on Urgent Private Affairs The Thing is, I'm hunting for a Home for those Difficult Women, my Step-sisters It is The Talk of the Town that I've Two Wives How Amusing it would be to have A Wife or Two for company up here To get here, you leave The Road to the City just by The Butcher's Shop and walk along the cliffs To the Lighthouse, down a marshy place, and Beyond the Swamps (crossed by Stepping-Stones) you come to The Empty Villa—by the way, The Sale there brought in a lot of Money—beyond that is The Green Bungalow, and nearby this little place called Windmill Cottage Through the Eyes of the Judge of architecture, there's nothing to admire in this house, but it's quiet, nothing breaks the Silence except The Clock! I think I've found The Missing Clue to happiness here—I'm forgetting that Early Sorrow you know of I heard from Diana (Oliver's Daughter) from Canada she's travelling From Quebec to Piccadilly I hope The Voyage Out here won't prostrate her, but she has The Fighting Spirit of your family!—(31 titles).

(Mrs Audrey Berney-Ficklin, "White Gates," Hethersett, Norfolk)

The Prize would have been awarded to Iris Ottaway (Bungay); she has introduced only 37 titles into the best sentence received, but has gone thirteen words beyond the prescribed two hundred. Several competitors have overlooked the stipulation that the prize was for the best sentence and have introduced 51, 54, and two as many as 58 titles at a reckless sacrifice of intelligibility and of ingenuity in narrating their stories. Others have carelessly included the titles of reviews in our last Number as well as book titles. We select for special commendation the replies sent in by K. C. P. Struvé (Vaud, Switzerland), M. K. Whitfield (Cirencester), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Mary T. Forth (Whitby), Sir Duncan Grey (Weston-super-Mare), Mrs. F. J. Chaplin (London, E.), Emily Davis (Dublin), K. M. Wright (Hull), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Ierne Ormsby (Addiscombe), F. M. Sweeting (Islington), Selwyn Oxley (Ealing), N. Ray (Belfast), Mrs. Frank Jewson (Norwich), Rev. F. Hern (Rowland's Castle), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), N. M. Butterfield (Westward Ho !), Kathleen M. Chaplin (London, E.), Isobel Simpson (Dundee), Eva L. Mitchell (Northampton), Ada F. Strike (West Worthing), Mrs. Mary Hughes (Beckenham), Fred W. Flear (Harpenden), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), R. K. Spedding (Liverpool), George S. Astins (Hove), Mrs. Barns-Graham (Blanefield), L. Howlett (Southampton), John E. Woods (Coventry).

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best enigma on any letter of the alphabet is awarded to Margaret Dunnett, 40, Seafield Drive, New Brighton, Cheshire, for the following:

THE LETTER G.

Throughout all the ages it ever hath stood
In the forefront of all that is gracious and good;
Tho' it clearly is seen when the morning is bright,
It always is heard in the gloom of the night;
For a moment may linger in dark forest glade,
But in green of the grass it is doubly displayed;
Quite close to the centre of England 'tis found,
And is always on high, tho' it ne'er leaves the ground;
It warns us in danger, and cheers us in song,
It is steadfast in right, puts an end to the wrong;
Without it no building is ever complete,
No garden can flourish, nor guest can we greet;
No king, wanting it, can e'er govern or reign,
No general hope any glory to gain;
It possesses strange power of transforming large hosts
Of its enemies, swiftly but surely, to ghosts;
And as touch of King Midas turned all things to gold,
So surely will it, if the things be but old;
In aught you begin, it assistance doth lend,
And yet everything with it must come to an end.

We also select for printing:

THE LETTER E.

It's taken with dinner, though never with lunch;
It's in a good joke, though it's not seen in Punch;
Ne'er seen in the morning, in evening it comes,
It is used by the fingers, but not by the thumbs;
It is seen in your leisure, but never in work,
It is known to the Jews but unknown to a Turk.
No connexion with youth, but old age knows it well,
It is seen up in Heaven and noticed in Hell;
In illness it's taken, in health it's still there;
It won't touch a rabbit, but follows a hare;
It's never in Holland nor even in Spain,
Though it's noticed in Sweden again and again;
You'll find it in Germany, also in France,
And 'twill always be there at the end of a dance;
It won't go to Church, but in Chapel it's found;
It's in for a penny but out for a pound;
It likes being with children, but not baby boys;
It's always in trouble and shuns family joys;
It's avoided by ducks, though it's taken by geese;
Though not seen in the War, yet we have it in Peace;
Which is strange, for it's always connected with strife,
And you'll see it still there at the end of your life.

(Mrs. Barns-Graham, "Carbeth," Blanefield, Stirlingshire.)

THE LETTER I.

'Tis mentioned in Mayfair, 'tis known in Shoreditch,
'Tis used in a proverb beginning "A stitch";
It is present in feeling but absent from feel,
It is written in iron but left out of steel;
The egoists have it, the wise have it too,
The foolish, the stupid, without it can't do;
It is used as a pronoun perhaps most of all;
Pride has it, but somehow it's absent from fall;
It's a wonderful letter, a vowel to boot,
It occurs once in pilfer, but not the word loot;
It happens in midges and microbes and mists,
It is absent from knuckles but present in fists;
It is needed by Altruists, used by the selfish,
Missed out by the sober, but claimed by the elfish;
My enigma now claims it while reaching its end,
And lastly it's there on the lips of my friend.

(A. O. George, "Ingmiri," Warden Road, Minehead.)

Isobel Simpson (Dundee) might have come second, but she writes of the letter "r" as "absent from cheatery." We also select for special commendation the enigmas by Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), Mrs. W. J. E. Haslam (Cheltenham), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Margaret W. Simpson (Dundee), Emily Davis (Dublin), N. Ray (Belfast), Ethel M. Kennedy (Bournemouth).

VI.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best hundred-word review is awarded to John P. Coghlan, 16, Fontenoy Road, Dublin, for:

THE FORBIDDEN ZONE. BY MARY BORDEN. (Heinemann.)

As an indictment of war, "The Forbidden Zone" will help to "swell the main account." It adds nothing fresh to our knowledge; but it is written vividly, sincerely and movingly. Its pictures of the desolate landscape of the battle-fields, and its descriptions of the bombing of a town from the air, of an operating theatre immediately behind the lines, and of a French territorial regiment of middle-aged and terribly weary men returning from the trenches to their base, are particularly graphic. Yet there is nothing nauseating in the book; it has occasional passages of real beauty and power.

We also select for printing:

THE OPALESCENT PARROT. BY ALFRED NOYES. (Blackwood.)

Noyes has given us good reading in "The Opalescent Parrot." Thought is stimulated by these sincere, straightforward essays which gibe at "the intellectuals" and then become simply the outpourings of an understanding heart full of a true love of poetry, beauty and truth. The defiant chapter on Bunyan is perhaps the most thought-provoking; that on Keats the most beautiful; and the finest the eulogy on Shakespeare, spoken with such loving sincerity and the deep knowledge so unself-consciously reflected from these pages. It is a book of crowding memories—a book where we can find, with the author, a "great companionship."

(Renée Allen, 33, Huskisson Street, Liverpool.)

We also specially commend the reviews by Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport), Anne Simpson (Havana, Cuba), R. K. Spedding (Liverpool), B. Noel Saxelby (Manchester), Mrs. E. J. MacDonald Smith (Midlothian), Mrs. Maude R. Fleeson (Manchester), J. Cecil Lomax (Bolton), Mrs. Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), Margaret A. B. Jones (Loughton), Doreen Urwick (Walton-on-Thames), S. R. Fuller (Streatham), Mrs. G. M. Yallop (Gorleston-on-Sea), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Margaret MacDonald (Palmer's Green), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), Mrs. Cecilia Naumann (Cranleigh).

VII.—PRIZES OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN are awarded to the Rev. F. Hern, Rowland's Castle, Hants, and Miss M. E. Ritchie Dickson, 57, Wynnstay Gardens, W.8.

THE BOOKMAN'S DIARY.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

Donn Byrne died nearly two years ago, at thirty-eight, when his great gifts were still maturing; success had come to him, but not too easily and there was every sign that what he had done was only "earnest of what he was yet to do." The story of his short life is sympathetically and admirably told by Mr. Thurston Macauley in "Donn Byrne: Bard of Armagh" (7s. 6d.; Sampson Low). He happened to be born in America, in 1889, because his father and mother were there on a short visit at the time. He went to America, and was married there in 1911, and settling there for a while began his literary career by contributing verse to American magazines and papers. He was doing hack-work on an Encyclopædia and a Dictionary for a livelihood, when one day in 1914 Joyce Kilmer showed him a cheque for twenty-five dollars he had received from the Smart Set for a short story, and, saying to himself, "If he can do that, so can I," he promptly wrote his first story, "Battle," sent it to the same magazine, and to his surprise and delight received by return of post a cheque for fifty dollars. "Very few writers," adds Mr. Macauley, "have had the luck to sell their initial opus to the first editor who read it." That was his real beginning, but he had to face, and faced cheerfully, the disappointments and vicissitudes that usually await the free-lance, before success came to him and instead of his having to run after editors and publishers they were running after him. They are putting him into the new "Dictionary of American Biography," but "though I was born in New York and lived there in my twenties," he wrote, "yet Ireland is my home," and it was in Ireland that he died. Mr. Macauley has told the whole story of this "erratic but lovable genius" understandingly and with a lively pen, and gets into his character of Donn Byrne all the humour, recklessness, confident strength and charm of personality that you would guess were his from his books and know were his if you had met him. He laid down as his own ideal of it that the novel should be "frank as necessary, and not a word franker. There must of necessity be realism—but it should be tinctured with spirituality and romanticism. Above all, there must be a story—even if art has to be sacrificed to that end. For the people want a story, and a story you must tell them. Let 'art' go if it must. We have had too damned much art, and too little literature." He practised what he preached, for there is a story in "Messer Marco Polo," in "The Wind Bloweth," in "Brother Saul"—in all his novels, yet most of them are both art and literature. A posthumous novel of his, by the way, "The Golden Goat," has just been published by Messrs. Sampson Low.

Donn Byrne.

One of the most important of this season's books will be "The Private Letter-Books of Sir Walter Scott," edited by Wilfred Partington, which Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton are publishing next month. These letters, which have been preserved at Abbotsford and never before printed, cover a wide range of interest and were written by many of the most famous authors, artists and other of Scott's distinguished contemporaries, including Wordsworth, Shelley, Southey, Moore, Campbell, Hogg, Maria Edgeworth, Fenimore Cooper, Mary Wollstonecraft, Turner, David Wilkie, Benjamin Robert Haydon, and are rich in glimpses of such great figures of the day as Napoleon, Byron, Mrs. Siddons, Sir Robert Peel, and in the current gossip of town and country. It is prefaced with an introductory letter to the reader from Mr. Hugh Walpole.

Ten of Barry Pain's books of humour have been gathered into the omnibus volume of his "Humorous Stories" (8s. 6d.) just published by Messrs. Werner Laurie, with an introduction by Mr. Alfred Noyes. I have been reading or, rather, re-reading a good many of these stories and wondering whether even yet Barry Pain's greatness as a humorist has been fully appreciated. "When he put on his motley," as Mr. Noyes remarks, "he said things that were not only devastatingly funny, but often devastatingly true as a criticism of human folly." Much humour is very perishable; some of his equally or more popular contemporaries can move us to laughter no more, but Pain's was a subtler, richer, more enduring humour, and I have found his stories as fresh and delightfully entertaining at a second as they were at a first reading. There should be a big demand for this book.

Mr. Edwin Pugh, who died last month at the age of fifty-six, was in the late nineties one of that brilliant group of young novelists, including Mr. Arthur Morrison and Mr. Pett Ridge, who were making reputations as writers of London low life. He began in a factory; then went into a solicitor's office and contributed stories and articles to the magazines and newspapers in his spare time. Madame Sarah Grand was attracted by his work and introduced him to her publisher, William Heinemann, and his first three books, "A Street in Suburbia," "The Man of Straw" (a sombre story of a dipsomaniac) and "Tony Drum," won such praise from the critical journals as a new writer seldom receives. Two of his later novels, "The Eyes of a Child" and "The Secret Years," both autobiographical, reach I think a higher level than any of his earlier books. Among his thirty volumes was an admirable study of "The Dickens Originals," and "The City of the World," one of the best little books I know "about London and the Londoner," which he wrote for Messrs. Nelson. But, in the Carlylean phrase, his work brought him "more praise than pudding"; for whatever else he achieved he never achieved popularity. All along he did a good deal of reviewing. He was a very competent critic and, as many of his reviews in our back Numbers attest, nothing pleased him more than to discover a first novel of real merit and give it generous and enthusiastic recognition. Long before she died and Mr. Baldwin set everybody talking of her, Pugh was again and again in these columns paying high tribute to the gifts of Mary Webb, and he was almost as pleased, at last, when she came into her own as if the luck had been his instead of hers.

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. Edwin Pugh.

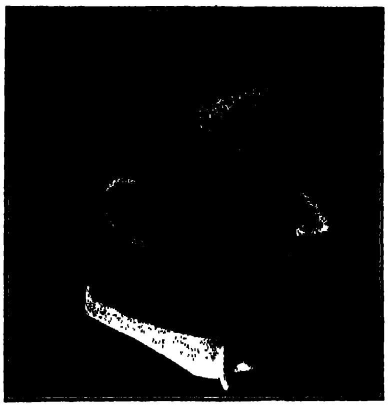
A detective story, "The Secret of 37, Hardy Street," by Robert J. Casey, author of "The Four Faces of Siva," has just been published by Messrs. Elkin Mathews & Marrot.



"London's Lost Latin Quarter," a history of Tottenham Court Road and the surrounding streets, and their associations with Gissing, De Morgan, Constable, Dickens and many another, has been written by Mr. Beresford Chancellor and will be published shortly by Mr. Jonathan Cape.

A critical biography of W. E. Henley, by Kennedy Williamson, is to be published in April by Messrs. Brentano. Many hitherto unpublished letters will be included, and the personal recollections of a number of Henley's friends.

One of the most interesting, amusing and finely sympathetic books I have read about life in mean streets is the Rev. Desmond Morse - Boycott's "Ten Years in a London Slum" (18s.; Skeffington). Mr. Morse-Boycott is well known in journalistic circles, and his sidelights on the ways of Fleet Street are both informing and entertaining; but the chief interest and value of the book, which is excellently illustrated, is that it does, as the Bishop of London says in a preface, vividly portray "the life of a London slum and the work and problems of the Church in slum parishes." The author is a delightful gossip, knows how to tell good anecdotes, even against himself, and has a sense of humour and a fine enthusiasm that he puts into his everyday duties as effectively as into this admirable record of them.

Ever since the appearance of that brilliant romance, "General Crack," by George Preedy, people have been asking: "Who is George Preedy?" In spite of all investigation, the secret has been closely kept. But just after his second romance, "The Rocklitz" (John Lane), came out, a rumour sprang up and spread that George Preedy was none other than Miss Marjorie Bowen. Denials have been circulated, but the rumour persists, and if, as at present seems likely, it is true, then Miss Marjorie Bowen has added very considerably to her laurels. For "General Crack" challenged comparison with "Jew Süss"; there was more of the element of romance in it, but its realism was as true, its characterisation as masterly, and it had an historical background that was as broad, as crowded with life and as vividly alive. There is no need to say more of "The Rocklitz," a story of seventeenth century Saxony, than that in imaginative power, and in the skill and vigour with which its broken romance is told and shaped to final tragedy, it is as intensely interesting and as able a piece of work as its now famous predecessor.

whose new novel, "Love's Illusion" (Collins), is reviewed in this Number.

A Life of President Masaryk, by C. J. C. Street, will be published early this month by Mr. Geoffrey Bles.

Messrs. Macmillan are publishing this month "The Later Years of Thomas Hardy," the second part of Mrs. Hardy's biography of her husband. This continues the story of his life and work from 1891 to the end, in 1928.

A new historical romance by Miss H. D. Slater, "Supremacy," has just been published by Messrs. Hutchinson. Miss Slater's first novel, "Up to the Hilt," a romance of the times of Titus Oates, was well received alike by the critics and the public, and is in a second edition.

A new form of biography is practised in "The Man Charles Dickens: A Victorian Portrait," by Edward Wagenknecht (18s. 6d.; Constable). The author describes it as "a new method of analysis," invented by Mr. Gamaliel Bradford, and practised with success by him in some sixteen volumes. The plan is to gather from Dickens's own books, from the letters, memoirs, and books in which others have discussed him, and to arrange in a series of chapters all that has been written of Dickens as man and as artist, of his life from day to day, his humanity, his attitude toward women and love, toward money, religion, hypocrisy, of his friendships and quarrels, and from the material so amassed to attempt "a study of the soul of Dickens," and to make it possible for the reader himself to consider the evidence for and against the man in those various aspects and to arrive at his own conclusion. The character Mr. Wagenknecht deduces from this careful survey of all the known facts is in fullest harmony with the kindly, breezy, intensely human figure of the man that every lover of Dickens cherishes. It may be disquieting to find Mr. Bradford, the inventor of this "psychographic method," saying in an introduction that, though Mr. Wagenknecht has skilfully woven together "all this scientifically collected and carefully weighed material," and distilled from it a figure that, with all its defects, is "a lofty figure and a lovable one," when he asks himself whether the portrait he would deduce from that material would be the same, "I answer at once that it would not." But he owns to a prejudice against all Victorians, especially Dickens, and this prejudice in the biographer, as M. Maurois has said, is the uncertain element in every biography. Even this new, scientific method does not seem to be immune from it. Nevertheless Mr. Wagenknecht has given us here one of the most exhaustive and impartial biographies of Dickens and one of the most interesting books about him that have yet been produced.

Mr. Cale Young Rice, whose new book of poems, "Seed of the Moon," is published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton. An operatic version of Mr. Rice's poetic drama, "Yolanda of Cyprus," was recently produced at Chicago with brilliant success.

If you know the inimitable Mr. Pooter, of "The Diary of a Nobody," and if you know Barry Pain's "Eliza's Husband," you will be glad to be introduced to George Upjack, in Mr. Milton Hayes's "Bad Men Make Good Wives" (Hurst & Blackett), for he belongs to the same family. The story of Mr. Upjack's domestic and business life, of his sister, the romances of his daughters and his ambitious son, are all in the most joyous spirit of comedy, hovering now and then on the farcical, but always the funnier for never overstepping the bounds of probability. Never, at all events, in the earlier half of the book. In the later stages of his career Mr. Upjack loses something of the natural homeliness of his character and lapses into extravagances of incident, but the whole thing is cleverly done and thoroughly amusing.

Mrs. Todhunter writes: "In your review of 'The Selected Poems of John Todhunter' there occurs the sentence: 'It was at Mr. Yeats's persuasion that he wrote a pastoral play, which was performed with no little success.' I wish emphatically to contradict this statement. The play, 'A Sicilian Idyll,' was written and produced without any reference whatever to Mr.

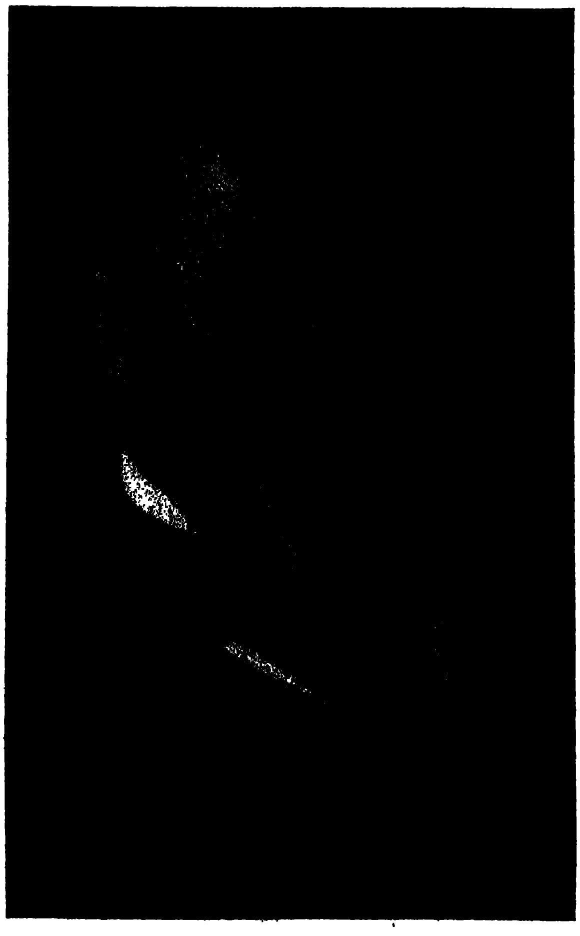
Yeats, though he may possibly have taken some interest in the matter, as he was acquainted with several of the players."

In "The United States of the World," which Messrs. Putnam have in the press, Mr. Oscar Newfang urges the development of the League of Nations into an actual federation of States as the one way of assuring world peace. He argues that what has been done by America in forming and maintaining friendly relations between her States, with their differing interests, is possible on the larger scale.

BOOKMAN.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS.

We cannot all go to Kenya and enjoy its wonderful climate, "live happy ever after," know the thrilling discomfort of having lions for neighbours and employ natives who cultivate their own method of cleaning your plates and find a tongue useful in the process. But the next best thing is to read an account of it by somebody who has lived there from the early pioneer days to the present time of comparative ease and comfort. Mrs. Emilie Delap-Hilton knows her Kenya thoroughly—settlers, natives, the joys and the dangers of the country—and writes of them in SNIPS WITHOUT SNAPS OF KENYA (2s. 6d.; Stockwell) in a light-hearted manner which makes her book a delight from beginning to end. She herself is of the true pioneer spirit, facing difficulties with a brave heart and keeping through everything a ready sympathy and a sense of humour. Though she has cloaked her facts in fiction, giving us two long stories under the titles of "Nine Months in Camp," and "Baadae Kidogo Land," and one not so long called "A Short Honeymoon in Kenya and Uganda," she is actually recounting her own experiences, and it is this circumstance and her engaging personality which give the book such charm and interest.



Miss Beryl Symons has written a first-rate sensational story in THE LEERING HOUSE (7s. 6d.; Herbert Jenkins), as eerie and tense as its name implies. From the moment when the mad woman follows the home-going shooting party through the November twilight, and, approaching Eve Easton, says, "So you have come back, have you!" the reader is held by the dramatic plot and an interest in the various characters on whom the shadow of the leering house falls. It is an old tragedy which happened twenty years earlier, before Eve was born, that darkens the girl's life; and its effects run devastatingly through the country home of the Eastons. Miss Symons knows how to work upon her readers' feelings, and how to fill her story with the weird atmosphere of woods after nightfall.

Mr. Gerard Fairlie is not content with merely constructing a thrilling plot, he knows how to construct a thrilling atmosphere; THE MUSTER OF THE VULTURES (7s. 6d.; Hodder & Stoughton) is full of hair-raising suspense. On the first page, when we find ourselves among a weird company who come and go as shadows, disguised as vultures so that they shall not be recognised by each other, our senses are on the alert for blood-curdling happenings. And we are not disappointed. For the strange fellowship consists of the leading spirits of the criminal world, pitting their united wits against the ingenuity of Scotland Yard. Death and kidnapping follow in the wake of the secret meetings, and eventually an engaging young man named Robin Murdoch risks his life to rid society of these pests. "The Muster of the Vultures" will appeal to all who enjoy a really first-rate mystery story.

MONSTROUS AND HUMANE.

"To him who sends forth his remarks upon the theatres once in a month, there constantly occurs the disheartening reflection, that long ere the day of publication shall arrive, the objects of his remarks will have been completely forgotten; and consequently no interest will attach itself to his strictures, though they may be distinguished by most profound ideas, and the smartest observations."

These words, penned in 1824, still strike upon the monthly critic's consciousness with an ironic and uncanny precision. That is not my chief reason however for reprinting them. They form the preface to a critique in "The Drama, or Theatrical Pocket Magazine"; their subject being a play called "Presumption! or, the Fate of Frankenstein," based on the novel written by Mrs. Wollstonecraft Shelley in 1816; and the reviewer, with more space at his command than falls to his successors' lot, lets himself go in reproducing what has been, to him, a very lurid experience. He speaks of "mental torture . . . this dreadful story . . . terrific, fearful . . . the frightful, nameless, and speechless creation of Frankenstein"; and concludes—not a little incongruously—with a report of the "much boisterous applause" to which this thriller was played. Now comes the sequel—"Frankenstein," dramatised afresh by Miss Peggy Webling and produced at the Little Theatre by Mr. Hamilton Deane of "Dracula" fame. A fine subject, certainly: this story of a scientist, creating synthetic man and having to abide the consequences: a play with moments of grim horror which make even the sophisticated modern audience gasp. Too crudely melodramatic, perhaps? But it is difficult to see how else Miss Webling's version could be played; and she succeeds in dodging, pretty consistently, the lurking bathos which is the chief danger in such an attempt. For its literary associations alone the present version would be worth seeing.

There is a link between this play and the Everyman Theatre success, "Charles and Mary"; for Shelley's second wife, authoress of "Frankenstein," was daughter of that Professor Godwin who appears as Lamb's host at the Everyman. The playgoer must not put too heavy a strain on this link however; for in point of pedantic fact the Mrs. Godwin of Miss Joan Temple's play is a "no such person." The time is early 1800: when Mary Shelley's mother had been dead some years, and her stepmother had not yet announced herself ("Is it possible that I behold the immortal Godwin?") from the next-door balcony. Nor did Godwin turn publisher till 1805. Other small discrepancies have been duly pilloried by my more learned colleagues; but I allude to them (I mean, to the discrepancies) only in order to protest how unimportant they are. The spirit, Master Shallow! What care we for the "big assemblance" of dates and facts—cold-blooded and stubborn things, which may be left to uphold their own dignity in the textbooks where they belong! In an historical romance it is the inevitable rightness of spirit that counts: which rightness Miss Temple has achieved. The Lambs are her central interest; the Godwins, Wordsworths, Coleridges—though she makes fascinating little thumb-nail sketches of these—are of chief value for the reaction of the Lambs to them. The point was well brought out in a debate on the play, held recently by the Everyman Theatre Guild (which bookmen, by the way, should make haste to join: they will find its terms of membership extremely attractive). In the play, someone said, the proper function of such lights is to illuminate Lamb, not to shine themselves. Both the production and the cast are first-rate: Miss Temple herself as Mary, and in particular Mr. Peter Ridgeway as Charles, giving what seemed to me an almost faultless performance. The result is an evening of such quality as Lamb himself would have rejoiced in—tender, and lovable and full of exquisite fun. No Elian should miss it.

WERGELAND.*

The fame of Henrik Wergeland, who died in 1845 at the early age of thirty-seven (the age at which his favourite Burns died), is as well established in his own country as is Shelley's in ours. His name, says Professor Francis Bull, of Oslo University, in the preface which he contributes to the volume under review, "has a more radiant nimbus than any other name in the history of our literature. . . . Wergeland seems to be personally nearer to us; as it were, a dearer friend" than Holberg, Ibsen or Björnson. Outside Norway, on the other hand, he has hitherto been but little known. His work is not represented in Mr. Mark Van Doren's comprehensive "Anthology of World Poetry," no doubt for the simple reason that no translations from it were available. In remedying this deficiency Mr. Gathorne-Hardy and his collaborators have earned our gratitude. For though to read poetry in translation, however good, can never be entirely satisfying, it is clear from the versions here offered us—which, it may be said at once, are very good indeed—that Wergeland was a poet of undoubted genius and a personality of uncommon interest.

To English readers he should make a special appeal, for his most obvious affinities are with the English poets of the Romantic Revival, who were doing their greatest work during his childhood. Like most of the Continental poets of his generation, he was an enthusiastic admirer of Byron, the influence of whose ideas is very manifest in one of his most ambitious poems, "Creation, Humanity and Messiah"; though, as Mr. Gathorne-Hardy points out, Wergeland's imperfect knowledge of English saved him from too close an imitation of that fascinating but dangerous model. In his sustained exaltation of spirit, as in his passion for political liberty, he was akin to Shelley; while the intensity of his feeling for nature is comparable with Wordsworth's. But here there is no question of imitation—it is unlikely that he had read either Wordsworth or Shelley—and Mr. Gathorne-Hardy, whose long critical and biographical introduction is an altogether admirable piece of work, can demonstrate that the differences, in both cases, are as striking as, and more essential than the resemblances. Quoting the most famous lines from "Tintern Abbey," he comments: "We find the essence of Wergeland's nature-gospel expressed in such passages as that."

> "But," he adds, "while this deeper nature-philosophy is evidently shared by Wergeland, his habitual reaction to the beauties of the world about him is something far more direct and simple. He retains to the last that unquestioning joy in the mere outward appearance of things which in Wordsworth faded with the passing years. The delight which impelled him to song in
> 'The scarlet on an insect's wing'
> had in it all the unreasoning pleasure of a child. He never had mournfully to acknowledge that
> 'Nothing can bring back the hour
> Of splendour in the grass, of glory in the flower.'"

Again, with reference to Shelley:

> "In spite of the troubles which beset his life, there was a robust light-heartedness, a humorous pluck, and an unconquerable hopefulness about Wergeland. He could never have thought or written:
> 'Most wretched men
> Are cradled into poetry by wrong:
> They learn in suffering what they teach in song.'"

What he actually did write, when moved to direct self-revelation by a newspaper which accused him of being "angry and in bad spirits," was this:

* "Henrik Wergeland: Poems." Translated by G. M. Gathorne-Hardy, Jethro Bithell and I. Gröndahl. Gyldendal Norsk Forlag. 10s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

"I in bad spirits, did you say? I, who need only a glimpse of the sun
To break out into loud laughter from a joy I cannot explain?

When I smell a green leaf, dazed I forget poverty, riches, friends and foes.

My cat rubbing against my cheek smoothens all heart-sores.
Into my dog's eye I lower my sorrows as in a deep well. . . .

I who read rapture in each petal of the hundred-leaved rose, that gift of spring--
Me should a wretched rag cause to quench one second with vexation?

That would be like killing sky-blue and rose-coloured butterflies. . . .

Like the insect's sting in the mussel, insults breed pearls only in my heart.
They shall one day adorn the diadem of my spirit. . . .

But why should not my veins be wroth?
Rob not the landscape of its rushing streams!
Right honourable osiers, permit the brook to foam when it runs among boulders!

I love not blue sky everlasting, as I detest stupid staring eyes.
Have I no heaven because it is full of drifting clouds, fairy-lands of the sun?

And if I had none—is not God's great and glorious enough?
Complain not under the stars of the lack of bright spots in your life!"

If that is bravura, it is but the exaggeration of a genuine bravery. Wergeland was one of those who say yea to life in all its manifestations, and like all the great yea-sayers—like Whitman and Verhaeren—he was an egoist. All his poetry, if not always so directly as in the passage quoted, is autobiographical.

Wergeland's liberalism was inherited from his father and was part of the political atmosphere of his time. His lyricism and his intense feeling for Nature were his own. He was, whatever the influences to which he may have submitted, an essentially original poet. In his choice of means of expression he was, in his earlier work, sometimes original to eccentricity, and this got him into trouble with the classicists like Welhaven. It is true that he had the faults of all the Romantics: he wrote too much and was too negligent of the file. But at its best his work has rare beauty. It is only—as he himself recognised—that he wrote in a tongue so little known outside its own boundaries, that has robbed him of European fame.

STATES OF MIND.*

If we may judge by the number of novels dealing with states of mind, the problems of psychology are exercising an increasingly strong fascination on the public. "The Weather House,"[1] by Miss Nan Shepherd, is a strangely beautiful study of one side of that subject. The scene is laid in Scotland, and Miss Shepherd shows us the emotional aberrations bred in people by a retired way of existence. Louie Morgan is an hysterical spinster living in a small village, isolated and unfrequented. Craving for affection and admiration, she claims that one of the village boys killed in the War was betrothed to her. Nobody doubts her until Garry Forbes, the boy's friend, arrives on sick leave. Garry is a wild creature, passionately truthful and aloof. The slur, as he regards it, on his friend's memory poisons his relations with his sweetheart, her family and her friends. Louie Morgan pleads with Garry to spare her, and his struggle between pity and duty is watched by the visionary remote old Mrs. Falconer, who looks on fascinated at the contests of reality from her own shadow world. Garry would have spared the girl, but Mrs. Falconer, determined for once to play an active part, exposes her at a charity concert. The confrontation of the two women is excellently managed, nor can any bare synopsis of incident convey the subtle drama of emotion, or the intricate pattern of background, characters and events which make so satisfying a whole. Both Mrs. Falconer and Louie are insane victims of an imagination that has nothing to feed on but itself. Both are conscious of their predicament, but whereas Louie submits to fate, Mrs. Falconer rebels against it, and dies not victorious but happy in the conflict.

Very different in construction and feeling is Miss Jane Lindsay's "Trip No Further."[2] This is a first novel, and it must not be her last if Miss Lindsay is to justify her excursion into literature. Certain awkwardnesses and irrelevances are perhaps inseparable from the work of beginners, even the most gifted, and Miss Lindsay's impartial rendering and strong satisfaction in her job are among the most valuable attributes a writer can possess. But Miss Lindsay has had the courage to choose a threadbare theme and is genuinely in love with her work, and it is not her fault if the subject precludes much variety and excitement. Miss Lindsay's secret lies in the smooth unfolding of events, which sustains the reader's interest through a soundly constructed and sincerely told tale. Miss Lindsay's illusive, high-spirited heroine bears little resemblance to the calm and noble heroine of "Stepsisters," although in each case happiness is only reached through hard experience.

"Stepsisters,"[3] by Miss Isabel Clarke, might be called "Light and Darkness," for the powers of evil are heavily arrayed against the heroine in the persons of a worldly stepsister, a vain and faithless suitor, and a selfish valetudinarian father. Dion, high-minded and self-sacrificing, suffers cruelly through the actions of the others till, despite all that prejudice and opposition can urge, she enters the Catholic Church--the haven for which the deepest part of her nature has always longed. Her acceptance of hardship and her unfailing response to the demands of charity are manifestations of the religious impulse, which her surroundings do nothing else to encourage. Mr. Meldon, Dion's father, is one of those unfortunately frequent egotists who, having blinded themselves to their own motives, are careless of deceiving the rest of the world. His persecution of his daughter cannot be called unnatural, for it is the logical outcome of his talent for exploitation, but his preference for Zilda, the child of his second wife by a previous marriage, is less convincing, especially as we are told the regard is entirely one-sided. Zilda's grace and high spirits pierce swiftly enough through the printed page; whether a hypochondriacal invalid would feel the charm is another matter, but one on which we are quite ready to accept Miss Clarke's judgment. A point worthy of remark is the extreme youth of all the characters. The destinies of most are fought out while they are in their teens, and Dion is barely more than twenty-one when she reaches that peace of spiritual conviction born of a faith tried in the fires of hard and protracted affliction. This drama of the soul is portrayed with sincerity and craftsmanship. The gradual shifting of values, the feebleness of all other props and illusions, and the resistless growth of feelings at first spasmodic and inarticulate, is a more convincing picture of the progress to belief than those violent and unheralded conversions that we are accustomed to in the pages of fiction. Miss Clarke portrays a world narrow and unkind but undeniably lifelike. The background is well filled in, and the stepsister Zilda, with her premature sophistication and ungrudging but half scornful liking for Dion could only have come from an accomplished hand. In conclusion, we are glad that Miss Clarke allows Dion to find earthly happiness in the love of a husband worthy of her.

Miss Roberts Rinehart's new book of short stories, "The Romantics," [4] may be safely recommended to all sorts of readers, as the authoress possesses that supreme art of the satirist of laughing with the world instead of at it. An art which, if it does not disguise her sympathy, certainly adorns it. There is a rollicking quality about Miss Rinehart's method that penetrates even to the hospitals and slums, and is so finely tempered as not to seem amiss in describing the self-convicted make-believe of old age or the rapt illusions of youth. Miss Rinehart is a craftsman and, in addition, a first-rate humorist, and "The Romantics" is a book to keep.

BARBARA MAXWELL.

MODERN PARIS.*

This is a lyric, a poem in praise of Paris, written by one of her most devoted children, for Mr. Slocombe is very truly her child, though not French. He loves her well; he loves her with understanding. For the past ten years he has been the Paris correspondent of a well-known London newspaper. Judging from these happy and absorbing pages, he has spent many hours in walking the streets and in picturing the past. And his book teems with information. We who thought we knew something about the fair city already, acknowledge that we did not know it, ere we read these pages spangled with life and throbbing with colour. Mr. Slocombe constantly ranges from the poetic to the practical.

And he harps continually on change. He owns that within his own brief time he has seen Paris change from a French city to a German city, with banks in concrete and steel replacing the old gold-brown fronted cafés; he owns that the Frenchman of the nineties, with his whiskers, his green waistcoat and his gold-headed cane, has been replaced by a clean-shaven being with a narrow waist, and feet brilliant in the Charleston.

He pictures for us many past scenes, and among them dwells on the old days of the flaneur. "That most charming hour of the day in Paris, the hour between eleven and noon, was his undisputed empire." Attentive to all the features of life round him, the philosopher and idler would stroll along in the chestnut-scented air of spring to the boulevards, which are "like a dashing curve drawn across the centre of Paris." Ah, where is he now, this flaneur?

We warmly commend this glowing book. With its pretty binding, its not-quite-good-enough pictures, but comfortable print, "Paris in Profile" ought to stand on the shelf of everyone who adores Paris, the noble city which, by the way, Mr. Slocombe counsels us to enter from one of its great gates.

THE VICTORIAN SCENE.†

It is pleasant, if only by way of novelty, to find a modern writer who is an unabashed worshipper at the Victorian shrine. Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop tells us that he "hates the Victorian humbug," but he takes the sting out of even that solitary adverse criticism of the era by stating that its particular kind of humbug was necessary as a counterblast to what had preceded it. "Assume a virtue if you have it not—it may grow on you," he says. The young

A Boulevard Cafe.
From "Paris in Profile," by George Slocombe (Humphrey Toulmin).

Queen's "I will be good" may sound priggish to modern ears; but it represented a genuine and salutary reaction from the coarseness of Georgian times. If at length Victorian morality too often became indistinguishable from complacent respectability, it marked on the whole a welcome and much-needed change.

But Mr. Calthrop is not mainly concerned with matters of argument. In the series of delicate essays before us he has sought rather to recreate the pictorial background of Victorianism. Whatever its virtues or sins, the period was—at any rate for the upper and middle classes—a more dignified and leisurely time in which to live, and Mr. Calthrop, who hates our modern hurry and bustle, with its motor-cars and telephones, and its typewriters that have turned letters into mere "chopped telephonese," looks back upon it lovingly and wistfully. Perhaps, like other idealisers of the past, he must not be taken too seriously. He writes glowingly for example about the old four-wheeled horsed cab. But the "growler," strangely enough, is not so completely a thing of yesterday as he represents it. I know several railway stations in the inner suburbs where "growlers" are still the only cabs available, and I even saw one recently awaiting the arrival of the Continental Express at Victoria. I thought of Mr. Calthrop, and wondered whether, had he alighted from the boat train, he would have chosen that "growler" in preference to a "taxi." I doubt it!

Still we need not be hypercritical in dealing with such a book. Distance of time, no less than of space, does lend enchantment to the view, and it is obvious that old days and old ways make a genuine appeal to Mr. Calthrop. Moreover in some of his contentions, at any rate, he is indisputably right. We may question whether the Victorian age was actually more comfortable than our own. It was certainly more picturesque. Machinery, mass production and standardisation had not reduced everything and everybody to a dull uniformity. There were more colour and more natural spice in life when the bells of the hansom-cab horses jingled along the streets, when the buses reflected all the tints of the rainbow, and when the drivers and conductors had time to sharpen their wits by repartee. We like Mr. Calthrop's story of the cabby who, on receiving no tip on one occasion during the Boer War, sighed and said : " Ah, well, all the gentlemen 'ave gone to the front." To-day, Mr. Calthrop laments, our bus and cab drivers are mere mechanics, wholly detached from their passengers and only interested, in the rare intervals of conversation with their own kind which they snatch during a traffic " block," in technicalities unintelligible to their " fares."

† "I Will Be Good!" By Dion Clayton Calthrop. 10s. 6d. (Cassell.)

Mr. Calthrop touches Victorian life at many points. In fancy he follows Charles Dickens on one of his night walks, during which he meets some of his own characters. Again in imagination our author attends one of Dickens's public readings ; while another essay debates that much-vexed and still unsettled problem as to whether there actually was or was not " sich a person " as Mrs. Gamp's friend, Mrs. Harris. Mr. Calthrop makes out a plausible case for her ; but we are still not fully convinced ! "Punch," " Street Manners," " Fashions and the Salons," " The Restaurants," " The Victorian Sunday " and " The Family Album " are among but a few of the many other chapter-headings. A breezy essay is that describing the life and character of Mrs. Bloomer who, advancing trousered upon England in the year of the Great Exhibition, so staggered society that her name has passed into a byword and liveth even unto this day. The Great Exhibition itself is recalled largely through the contemporary account of The Times. Mr. Calthrop sees the funny as well as the good side of Victorianism. His book, with its blending of fancy, personal memory, traditional lore and extracts from contemporary documents, is a whimsical and delightful miscellany, giving us in his own words the impression of " fine old linen drying on a hedge of lavender."

GILBERT THOMAS.

SOUTH AFRICAN IMPRESSIONS.*

With all the pleasant charm of a diary-letter Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has written in this volume of his travels in South Africa, in Rhodesia and in Kenya. To say " written of his travels " is however far too dull a description even then, for there is so much of freshness, of variety, with accounts of meetings, conversations, scenes and experiences apart from actual travel, in these chapters, that one can almost hear the author's kindly voice coming through.

In the autumn of 1928 he writes, " It is a foul morning, and yet in two hours we have to be aboard the Windsor Castle which awaits us at Southampton. Our country cottage at Bignell Wood is only seven miles from the port and the motor is waiting at the door." Through blurred window-panes he sees lashing rain and yellow leaves streaming across the lawn, and he knows there must be a full gale blowing in the Channel. That is the start of the tour. Sir Arthur himself is a seasoned sailor, but with him travel also, and not for the first time, his wife, his young daughter and his two sons, not by any means so seasoned ; and in truth the gale which they encountered at the start was a terrible one. " Ten degrees is supposed to be a pretty fair roll, but at our best effort we did thirty, which approaches the margin of safety." And the seasoned as well as the unseasoned found it good to put foot on solid ground again, at Madeira.

Sir Arthur's main purposes in making this tour were to give lectures and invite discussions on psychic matters, and to observe and inquire into the advance of Spiritualistic ideas ; but, also, he wished to escape the English winter, and gain some general impressions of the present life and politics of the country which he had known so well during the Boer War. With fair-mindedness he listened to many an opinion during the months of his tour, and his advice is that of a tolerant and humane thinker. In a country where the black inhabitants number over seven millions and the whites under two millions, there seems to be future danger. " The only solution would seem to lie in greatly accelerated immigration." But unless aided by some Association, or other plan, no man is safe in attempting to start a farm, on the virgin ground given to him, with a capital of less than £2,000. " But once established he is self-supporting at the worst, and at the best might become a well-to-do man in a few years."

The visits to Rhodes's grave on the summit of the Matoppo Hills, to the Victoria Falls, to Snake Park, and many another " sight," are described in what may be termed a comfortably conversational manner, which leaves a vivid impression on the reader's mind. " We viewed the snakes with a very necessary small parapet for our protection. . . . In a sunken garden, with a little water-course running round it, were snakes of every sort, snakes dark and green, and brown and red, snakes sleeping, snakes wriggling, snakes rearing and, most graceful of all, snakes swimming, beautiful undulating lines of green and yellow in the clear waterway."

Mr. Fitzsimmons, the originator of this collection, has prepared a snake serum which is a specific against any bite. " In view of our further journeys," says Sir Arthur, " and the snake-hunting habits of our lads, we thought it wise to purchase a complete outfit—lancet, syringe, and antidote. . . ." Mr. Fitzsimmons has also experimented with his snake fluid and has become convinced that it is a complete cure for epilepsy. But Mr. Fitzsimmons is not a qualified medical man, and he cannot bring his views forward in the recognised way.

There is so much of by-the-way interest in this volume that anyone wishing to go to, or learn more of, Africa, for everyday use, may, after all the big and serious histories of the country have been selected, just place this book on top of the pile—and begin with it.

THE BEAUTY THAT IS POETRY.*

" A New Approach to Poetry " is another of the books coming from America which indicate the enthusiastic study of English literature going on in American universities. Contrary to common belief on this side, such books are often valuable educational aids and indicate a continual extension of the public which is willing and able to give intelligent attention to the best in literature. The publishers' note on the wrapper made me feel uneasy when I read that this book " aims to secure the complete unbiased transfer of the author's experience from his words on the page to the mind of the student. It enables him to understand ' ce qui y est, tout ce qui y est ; rien que ce qui y est.' " It is very well to aim high, but some sign of recognition that such an aim as this would be scarcely within the reach of a great critic who was also a poet, such as Coleridge, would have been welcome, for what is more difficult to convey than a rich experience of beauty ? But the reader comes across signs of grace in the authors right at the beginning of their book, for they start by calling upon Lascelles Abercrombie (" Theory of Poetry ") and Walter de la Mare (the story of " Come Hither ") to provide the foundation of the first chapter, entitled " Re-creating a Reality : the Image." Their particular virtue is that of enlightened teachers who know sound authorities and are at pains to prove that the appreciation of the beautiful is a way of enjoying yourself. They separate certain elements in the appeal made by poetry, such as imagery, sound, rhythm and devices like typographical arrangement, and they tackle such difficult matters as the question of " taste " and what is good poetry, in discussing which I am sorry to see that they do not appear to know of the work of Mr. I. A. Richards, especially his

* " The Real Rhythm in English Poetry." By Katherine M. Wilson. 7s. 6d. (Aberdeen University Press.)—" A New Approach to Poetry." By Elsa Chapin and Russell Thomas. 9s. (Cambridge Press.)

" Practical Criticism." Mr. Richards would have saved them from some questionable generalisations and have tempered their zealous antagonism against the day-dreaming reader who does not like ugly facts. And yet they have in a much less thorough way done what Mr. Richards did in " Practical Criticism "—given certain poems to students for criticism and reproduced the students' comments along with the poems. One of the many facts about stock responses to poetry elicited by Mr. Richards's inquiry was discovered by them—that readers incline to like poems according as they find themselves in agreement with some point of view expressed in the verse. But their failure to come to grips with the essentials of the beauty in poetry is exposed by their really meaningless definition : " The poet's keen and true evaluation of the facts of human life and the power of transferring his evaluation to us by means of words used at their highest potential energy is poetry." The highly interesting anthology of poems which forms the middle section of the book is likely to help the reader much more than this kind of clumsy statement and confused thought. " True evaluation " of facts, if it means what it says, is not a necessary function of poetry but of criticism. If the authors were asked to explain why Lear's " Yonghy Bongy Bo " is poetry, I wonder what they would tell their students and readers. A similar want of subtlety in dealing with subtleties seems to me to mark their attempts to chart the imagery of a poem under such headings as " sight," " sound," " smell," " taste," " touch." It is important of course to know how appeals to the various senses help to explain the magic of words in a poem, and Mr. Robert Graves, for one, has some illuminating remarks about this in his useful book " Poetic Unreason." A pioneer in noting the incidence of various colours in poetic imagery was Mr. Havelock Ellis. Such general observations are very well, but tabulation and other rigid and necessarily blunt indicators of the constituent elements of a poem are a poor substitute for subtle interpretation. The authors of " A New Approach to Poetry " go so far as to print some poems with words underlined in various colours to show that the imagery is coloured. " Palmgreen shores " in Masefield's " Cargoes" for instance is underlined green, as if the reader is not expected to see more than green leaves in such a phrase. " Tyne Coal " is underlined black, which it certainly is ; but—lordy, lordy, as the negro exclaimed—how will this help a reader to feel into a poem ?

By keeping to one element of beauty and bringing to it much knowledge Miss Wilson has really advanced the study of poetry, although her work may not be for the general reader, while the expert will challenge some of her verse-and-music comparisons. She explains that she is less concerned with new ideas about prosody than to show what there is in common between the rhythm of poetry and the rhythm of music. That the elusive magic which transforms a group of words into poetry contains a musical element is not questionable, though the importance of this element varies widely, not only positively according to the words but also relatively according to the way the reader responds. A reader, for example, whose ear is not sensitive will make proportionately more of the appeal to other senses, visual, tactile, olfactory and so on, in the poem. A very strong sense of rhythm may actually dull the perception of an uncritical reader to other musical elements in the words, such as echoes of sound, unless these merely reinforce the metronomic beat of the verse.

Miss Wilson's book is so much alive that one is tempted to argue at every few pages. When she supplies us by means of musical notation with readings of famous verse she is at her most instructive and her most provocative, helpful in removing unnecessary obstacles to appreciation set up by prosodists and yet occasionally, impelled by her own preconceptions, placing a stress where we should never have thought of placing it. But no prosodist I have ever read is so free from this kind of freakishness as the author of " The Real Rhythm in English Poetry."

The fact remains that with only elementary notions of the chief technical problems of verse an intelligent, silent reader will always extract from a rich poem more of its original inspiration and of that beauty which is its unique meaning than any amount of " scientific " inquiry can by its own efforts elucidate. The ideal interpretation seems to be that which combines a scientific alertness to errors with the æsthetic appeal of evocative language and intuitive subtlety. For that we have to go to the prose of such poets as those I have already mentioned.

THREE NOVELS.*

Art implies selection and, in the case of the novel, where incident occupies so large a place, the details selected must fit into some orderly plan. This is a platitude which needs restating at a time when so much fiction is content to be an outpouring of hysterical dialogue in stock situations by creatures of shadow. No liveliness in the telling makes up for the feeling of disappointment one has in a ragged, untidy story, where the characters come and go for no apparent purpose.

Ethel Mannin is an artist, and the greater part of the pleasure which her latest story gives is due to its architectural, cumulative effect. She has a central idea, she works to it, and the details acquire significance. Jean Le Camillon first saw Marie Dauvigny outside the Aliens' Office at St. Helier on a May morning. The rest of the book is the result of the long, dark gaze she gave him there. They marry. They have five children. Marie dies after the birth of Fleur. The children grow up and marry. The story works itself out with something of an epic quality.

If we watch Miss Mannin at work, we shall see something of how she achieves her effect. Characters are skilfully drawn, situations well devised, atmosphere conveyed. There is an imaginative quality in the descriptive passages which brings before us very vividly the scene—the scene which is set among the fishermen and crofters of the Channel Islands. One notes also the writer's restraint in dealing with a situation, as when Jean surprises Marie and Le Breton together. These things we can see, for the canvas is being covered under our eyes. What is more baffling, and wherein lies the final secret of Miss Mannin's power, is her ability to convey so fully a sense of life and movement. These people live. These things happened. Marie dies and Jean is broken-hearted. But somehow he goes on--as life goes on. " Life shapes itself wonderful. We don't any of us go under; it's like that something in us makes us go on whether we want it or not; maybe there's some sense and meanin' to it, and maybe not."

Cassy Pringle, in " Passion Flower," has something of Jean Le Camillon's endurance when life goes black for her. The daughter of a wealthy lawyer of San Francisco, she falls in love with her father's chauffeur, Dan Wallace. They marry and for a time all goes idyllically. Cassy is plucky and poverty has no terrors for her. They get on. Dan opens a garage of his own. Then a wealthy widow comes into his life, and gradually Cassy is ousted. She agrees to a divorce and Dan marries Dulce. But his heart is with Cassy and his children, and the story ends with a revolver shot, which is Dulce's way of revenge. In outline the plot sounds melodramatic, but Mrs. Norris knows how to tell a story, and one reads on, interested in her people—for they are all very human—and carried on from episode to episode by her easy style.

" The Bridge Is Love " is more difficult. So many thoughts go on inside the minds of the characters, instead of coming out in straightforward narrative, that one finds oneself turning for enlightenment to the synopsis supplied by the publishers' wrapper. " Was her mother among the damned ? " one reads, and with this guiding light one realises that the point of the tale centres round the suicide of Adrienne, Duchess of Trigues, whose daughter, Claire, is being married when the book opens. Adrienne is a shadowy figure, and our anxiety about her future state never becomes acute. Mrs. Nicholson can do better than this. The whole book lacks cohesion and purpose.

IRELAND.*

Michael Collins remains the most attractive and Dantonesque personality in the closing phase of the Anglo-Irish struggle. Piaras Beaslai, in a monumental biography some years ago, set down the essental facts of the amazing story, while P. S. O'Hegarty and General Macready have treated Collins with candour from different standpoints in their books; but somehow Batt O'Connor, the Dublin builder who helped Collins to emulate the Scarlet Pimpernel with cunning hiding-places, presents a more living and human portrait than any before him.

Portrait by Lafayette, Dublin. Mr. Batt O'Connor, Author of "With Michael Collins" (Davies).

One of Collins's closest associates, Batt O'Connor amplifies the frank and vivid account of the small band of men around Collins, in his struggle against the Black and Tans, already given in a companion volume issued by the same publisher—Mr. Charles Dalton's " With the Dublin Brigade."

Mr. O'Connor however surveys a wider field and brings to life some twenty years of Irish revolutionary movements, all blended with humour, terror, pathos and melodrama as they touched the genial author himself. Casual sidelights on the times occur in every chapter. One hears of a revolutionary club disguised as a literary society, where every meeting-night a paper on the same historical subject was placed on the table and preserved carefully lest another should have to be written " to the great exhaustion of the brethren." Or T. M. Healy, K.C., defending a political prisoner for nothing, and saying " Never mind the hundred guineas." Or Batt O'Connor himself in a prison cell, hoarding crumbs, telling the time by the sun and releasing his own pet lark in gratitude when a free man once more. Or Sean O'Casey, with broken boots, proudly waving aside a proffered pound.

" With Michael Collins " is singularly free from the splash of the hero-worshipper's whitewash brush. Collins appears as a convivial and daring character, given to uncompromising language—a portrait which deepens to a simple and gallant dignity in the last pages.

Why did Michael Collins paralyse Dublin Castle and elude the most astute Intelligence men the British Government could employ ? Piaras Beaslai's biography half answered the question when he revealed that Collins had won over certain members of the political branch of the Dublin Metropolitan police. But this book explains why frequent raids and searches and barbed wire investments of whole streets failed.

Batt O'Connor, who is a building contractor, built not only secret cupboards for documents, but also hidden sleeping places : " For this a certain type of house was necessary—one in which a room could be cut off completely without it being apparent that a room was missing. To conceal the entrance to the room I built in one of the usual wardrobes found so often in houses as permanent fixtures."

Collins had many narrow escapes. One is described in his own words. The Auxiliaries—elder and more polished brothers of the famous Black and Tans—raided a Dublin hotel and found Collins at dinner with his Head-quarters Intelligence Staff. He told the raiders who surrounded the party with levelled revolvers that he was John Grace, an accountant.

" On a loose-leaf ledger in my pocket I had pencilled the word ' rifles ' to remind me of something. I swore it was not ' rifles ' but ' refills.' "

" They were very suspicious of me. I was questioned over and over again. An Officer actually drew that old photo of me out of his pocket, and compared it with my face, drawing my hair down as it was in the picture. It was touch and go."

Collins is also quoted as saying :

" I do not allow myself to feel I am on the run. It prevents me from acting in a manner likely to arouse suspicion."

Adventure, humour and pathos tread on each other's heels in Batt O'Connor's pages. The story winds round the central hero Collins to a bomb factory under the shadow of Dublin Castle, with men working stripped to the waist casting grenades ; pauses in the Sinn Fein headquarters, where the exasperated secretary defines the organisation's ultimate object to a persistent journalist who badgers him with questions as " Why ! vingeance ! by —— ! vingeance ! " Then onward to two remarkable impressions of Collins in his last days.

Batt O'Connor declares Michael Collins was the life and soul of the struggle :

" It was his brain and character—his indomitable will, his unerring judgment, his courage, and his matchless energy—in a word, the splendid genius of one young Irishman—which wiped out our inequalities, gave us strength of spirit for strength of numbers, the weapons of superior resourcefulness to make good the deficiency in our arms."

The reader who turns next to " The Irish Future and the Lordship of the World " will pass from a panorama of action to a volcano of thought, prejudice, quotation and emotion. Mr. O'Donnell develops the arguments he so trenchantly expressed some years ago in a similar volume. Apart from one vigorous chapter on the present position of the Catholic-Nationalist minority in the Six Counties, the book is rather vague about the Irish future. Mr. O'Donnell hurls magnificent verbal bricks at Parnell,

* " With Michael Collins in the Fight for Irish Independence." By Batt O'Connor, T.D. 6s. (Peter Davies.)—" The Irish Future and the Lordship of the World." By C. J. O'Donnell, ex-M.P. 5s. (Cecil Palmer.)

Tim Healy, Wolfe Tone, Anglo-Saxons, the war-madness of France; upholds the "Pax Germanica," expands on the Celtic Empire of Great Britain, and rounds it all off with an erudite account of the "last princely family of Ireland, the O'Donnells," including his famous brother, Frank Hugh O'Donnell, whose gifts of learning and vocabulary certainly still remain in the family. In spite of some flaming and thunderous prepossessions, the book is to be commended for its sustained invective, and those sound chapters on India, Ulster and the O'Donnells, where the author leaves off quoting newspapers and writes from deep experience. His criticisms of war legends are acute and "The Irish Future and the Lordship of the World" would be worth reading for these alone.

DESMOND RYAN.

GEORGE SAND.*

George Sand is an immortal, and because she lives more by virtue of her personality than by her works, this book is more than acceptable. Anything that throws further light on her character will always be welcome. There are three documents which, as the publishers say—and say truly—in their advertisement, are of the deepest interest to students both of abnormal psychology and of literature. These hitherto unprinted documents (published by permission of her granddaughter) are . her journal to Alfred de Musset; the Piffoël journal, composed of conversations between her masculine and feminine selves; and appended to these, a scrapbook whose dates overlap the two journals. The last compilation includes personal letters, reflections and mementoes which were dear to her. These three contributions to our intimate knowledge of George Sand (who died so late as 1876) are not widely separated in time, as most of the material relates to seven years of her life between the ages of twenty-nine and thirty-six. A final comment was added by her at the age of sixty-four. From this last a brief extract must be given:

"I remain a believer, a believer in God—the life eternal—evil some day vanquished by science, science illuminated by love. But symbols, images, cults, human gods?—good-bye! I have passed beyond all that.

"I have become impersonal, universal, that's all. And, since I can bear the evil in my life and appreciate the good, I am not in the least interesting. May those whom I love outlive me! I cannot imagine what would become of me without my family at Nohant. I care very little about living on. Death is kind and gentle. My only dread of death is in the thought of the grief it would cause my loved ones.

"Have I been useful to them these last twenty years? I believe so. I have earnestly wanted to be so. So I was wrong when I used to imagine that there are crises in life when anyone may hand in one's resignation without injury to others. Because here I am, still useful at an advanced age. . . . Mental activity increases with age, as physical activity develops in a child. Meanwhile, and nevertheless, one approaches the journey's end. But the end is a goal, not a catastrophe."

It would be indeed ungracious not to pay tribute to the publishers for the beautiful volume they have produced. It is indeed a production of which they have every right to be proud.

THE DREAM AND THE BUSINESS.†

Two books confront one, both concerned with travel in the tropics. Brief investigation indicates that the orbits of their respective authors overlap—or intersect would perhaps be better—at a place, Singapore to wit, very familiar to this reviewer if somewhat outside the area of respectable adventure. They ought to be interesting, and both of them I find are so, in ways that are as far apart as they could possibly be.

Mr. Alec Waugh's travel book is not the gay and colourful record that its title and jacket seem to promise us.

A Temple in Bangkok.

From "The Coloured Countries," by Alec Waugh (Chapman & Hall).

When we perceive names like Siam, Ceylon, Malaya, Tahiti, Martinique, the New Hebrides and the "Black Republic" of Haiti, beaded on the thread of a young writer's advertised itinerary, our expectations are excusedly of pageantry, of colour, movement, temple bells, spicy smells and so forth. But Mr. Waugh is a clever and sophisticated young man, and knows better than to give us what we expect.

Conscious as it would appear that his artistic attributes are not those of a vivid or even picturesque writer, he has left word painting to other travellers who can do it really well or are not too proud to do it badly, and developed a line of his own. Clearly in his wanderings he has been less intrigued by the spicy smells and sunsets than by the social contrasts and idiosyncrasies observed in his comings and goings and casual settlings down among all sorts and conditions of European society encountered on a world pilgrimage whose course seems to have been determined quite at random. "Broke" at one minute in Singapore (a nasty place as he discovers for a European to be thus overtaken in), a cable from America bestows upon him six months of leisure and luxury to be enjoyed anywhere on the map that looks attractive, so why not Tahiti for a start, whither a passage can be booked by tea-time? Another time it is the chance remark of an hotel acquaintance in Penang that starts him off for the teak jungles of Siam, there to learn how his young compatriots accommodate their manners and morals to circumstances, and to be led perhaps into certain pitfalls of generalisation by a too ingenuous acceptance of some of his hosts' yarns. In fairness though to Mr. Waugh, it must be said that he nearly always qualifies comment by admission that a mere globe-trotter's opinion on the point may be misconceived and quite worthless. Sometimes he does go astray, as in the conclusions drawn in variations on that dreadfully hackneyed "Gone Native" theme, regarding the customary relations of European males and Asiatic females. Some of our popular playwrights have a lot to answer for.

Very frequently, on the other hand, Mr. Waugh contrives to hit the nail fairly and squarely on the head with some acute observation or opinion that no one, curiously, seems to have thought of advancing before. The thesis he puts forward and from such experience as he possesses seeks to prove, namely that "in the Far East woman is a side-show," could not be supported with more pertinent or telling illustrations by one who has spent a lifetime in Ceylon or Malaya—countries to which Mr. Waugh mainly applies this theory of his. The reference of course is to European women. Though the young bride in Penang, Ipoh or Kuala Lumpur fancies on arrival that she has come to "a woman's paradise," disillusionment will ensue in a year or two for most of her kind. How and why it does come is very neatly explained.

Mr. Waugh is very sensitive to atmosphere, and his reactions to the various social environments into which he projected himself, sometimes invited and expected, sometimes neither, are well and honestly depicted, indeed by far the best portions of his narrative. For every tourist, he holds, "there must be one place at which he will regret his stay; one place excellent in itself, at which expectation will be unrealised, at which for some reason or other everything will go wrong." For him, he declares that Ceylon is that place. With becoming candour he asserts, "It was my own fault." But he need not be too sure of that. He is right indeed when he holds Colombo not to be "a good place for the casually presented stranger." Yet Malaya and Penang, waiting for him on the morrow, "were not to belie anything I had ever dreamt of them."

Mr. F. D. Burdett is not sophisticated, nor sensitive, nor young or modern like Mr. Waugh, but he has done a lot more travelling, in even remoter and stranger places, has a good memory and/or (as they say in the City) a very robust imagination, and an aptitude for story-telling of the bluff and breezy description characteristic of his type. Fifty years of adventure, ashore and afloat, first as a miner in the North Australian gold rush, as pearler, as prospector for the rarer mineral treasures of the outlying Philippines, and eventually as orchid-seeker in the tangled jungles of Luzon and Mindanao, have given him something to write about, and write about it he does with considerable gusto.

One wonders however why he should drag Epstein into a dissertation on Igorote wall-paintings, and why there is so little about orchids in this rollicking Odyssey of Mr. Burdett's. Orchids can be made interesting, even to the young, as memories of the huge delight extracted from a B.O.P. serial of Messrs. Russan and Boyle's by this reviewer in some pre-Edwardian epoch testify. Certainly there is a vivid story of how Mr. Burdett discovered an entire hill-side of the exquisite Phalænopsis at Ilocos Norte, a find never approached in thirty years of subsequent endeavour. But later thrills are derivable chiefly from his eerie account of an island where three old satyrs lorded it over a multitudinous harem, and some animated recitals of the chase after fur, fin and feather, not to say pythons and other scaly monsters. A book whose vigour and movement will attract bo·, and such adult readers as Mr. Waugh's indolent subtleties may not appeal to.

ASHLEY GIBSON.

SUSAN FERRIER.

For the past fifty years Susan Ferrier has been suffering the sad eclipse of all those who are mentioned in the school textbooks on literary history yet are read by no one except the inquisitive student in search of an out-of-date way subject for a thesis. She is, I am afraid, of that ghostly company which numbers "Euphues" and Paley's "Evidences," though with more justice than any of these can she complain of being neglected. Not even the most blandly optimistic of her admirers however can hope for a Susan Ferrier "revival"—even in these days of an unexpected renaissance of interest in the long novel; even though she appear in such fine new clothes as the "Holyrood" edition*. It is useless to point out that Miss Ferrier's "The Inheritance" is no longer than Mr. Priestley's "Good Companions" or that her "Destiny" is even shorter than Mr. Brett Young's "Portrait of Clare." With Miss Ferrier it is not the mere length of her books that counts; it is the fact that they could have been much shorter. Her novels, more than those of any other writer I have ever read, could have been transformed into masterpieces had there only been a sub-editor at her side to blue-pencil her pages. Yet in spite of her inordinate length, her whole pages of sententious moralisings (oddly sandwiched between some of the most richly humorous scenes in the whole history of the English novel), Miss Ferrier can lay claim to being of the company of genius, especially of the comic genius. She had the rare gift of the real story-teller and the rarer gift of the creator of character. And if none of her three novels is remarkable for construction or surprising twists of plot it at least marches along with the tramp of the inevitable. They all begin well and, for the most part, end well, and if there are dull sections, it is perhaps to Miss Ferrier's credit that she has given us them in such slabs that the reader will at once learn to distinguish their approach and so be prepared to skip, if not to hop and jump It is not every novelist who is so considerate of his readers.

Professor Saintsbury has written of Miss Ferrier that she remains "in literary history a singular and almost unique figure." For about her there hangs a mystery—the mystery of a woman who wrote three "best-sellers" and then relinquished authorship altogether for the remaining twenty-five years of her life, preferring the consolations of religion in a darkened room to literary fame in the salons of the "learned ladies" of Edinburgh. Outwardly her life seems to have been devoid of incident. The youngest of a family of ten, she was born in Edinburgh in 1782, where her father acted as agent to the fifth Duke of Argyll. Scott was a friend of her father's, and she herself (as readers of Lockhart will remember) became Scott's friend in later years, winning from him not merely personal admiration but his intense admiration for her work as a novelist.

"Marriage," her first novel, planned in collaboration with Miss Clavering, niece of the Duke of Argyll, was published anonymously in 1818. It met with immediate success (partly because it was in some respects a roman à clef of Edinburgh society), some critics even going so far as to attribute it to Scott. For this first novel her publishers paid her £150 —not an inconsiderable sum for a first novel by an unknown and anonymous author. Four years later her publisher paid her £1,000 for the manuscript of her second novel, "The Inheritance"; and in 1831, seven years later, Cadell bought "Destiny," her third novel, for £1,700. After that, though publishers begged of her for manuscripts, she remained silent, a solitary spinster of increasing devotion who was to spend the last twenty-five years of her life in a darkened room, almost blind and racked with a cough. She died in her brother's house in Edinburgh in 1854, in her seventy-third year. And it was not until two years before her death, when Bentley published a collected edition of her works, that she allowed the secret of her authorship to be divulged.

Miss Ferrier wrote of a world that is dead, that had indeed almost disappeared during her own lifetime—the world of the old Scottish clans who barely survived, in tarnished, shop-soiled feudal splendour, into the early nineteenth century. It is from this fantastic and sometimes monstrous regiment that she has drawn the most memorable figures in her great gallery of originals—Lady Maclaughlan, the three aunts, Dr. Redgill, and Mrs. MacShake in "Marriage"; Miss Pratt, Adam Ramsay and "Mrs. Major" in "The Inheritance"; the Rev. Mr. McDow, the Ribley family, and Molly Macaulay in "Destiny." It is her comic characters that will live in the gallery that includes Mr. Collins and Parson Adams; her heroes and heroines, after the fashion of their day (no blame to them), too often border on the stilted and priggish. In no other novelist is to be found sententiousness and rich humour twisted together in such surprisingly thick strands. Here indeed is a riddle as perplexing as that of

* "Marriage," "The Inheritance," "Destiny." By Susan Ferrier. With introductions by Lady Margaret Sackville, together with "The Memoir and Correspondence of Susan Ferrier." By John A. Doyle. 4 vols. £6 6s. the set. (Nash & Grayson.)

Miss Ferrier's sudden abandoning of literature after her third and most successful novel.

Of the present edition it would be hard to speak too highly. It is indeed a fitting memorial to a novelist of genius who ought never to have been relegated to the "also-rans" in the school histories of literature. And Lady Margaret Sackville has contributed to each of the three novels a sensitive and discerning introduction. How happy her description of Miss Ferrier as the "witty Puritan"! H. L. MORROW.

THE SALON.*

Miss Agnes Platt has translated this entirely delightful book with ease and charm. The Renaissance was the cradle of the salon, and we begin with this section, and a study of the divine Isotta and her circle—Isotta, Malatesta's "snow-white innocent dove," his "pride of Italy." In this first chapter we are wafted away from the prosaic atmosphere of to-day; the commonplace room vanishes, such is the magic of the writer, and we see the little court upon the Adriatic back in 1430 or so, where poetry was in the air and even serious military engineers ran into rhyme over the woman who was so quick-witted and so fascinating. The book must be read, as the introduction counsels with the teasing, charming melodies of Mozart and Haydn chiming in the ear; lively and gay. Conversation was brought to a fine art in these long vanished salons; the spirits of the wealthy and the witty were posed in the right attitudes to provoke mirth and friendship and sparkling interchange of fancy. Pictures of Society in Five Centuries are given here. We see the Medici at Careggi, where there was such exuberant joy in living; later we are in the city of lagoons with Veronica Franco, yellow-haired and full of spells. We hear of the gorgeous rooms, the gold-embroidered velvet covers to the chairs, and, observe, there is Pietro Aretino going in to have a word with the renowned courtesan Angela Zaffetta. . . .

We have neither space nor inclination to linger long over the engaging divisions entitled respectively "Baroque," "Rococo," "Sensibility," because these deeply interesting chapters must be read for themselves, but we must confess that we turned at once to the description of Madame Récamier and her salon, and were not disappointed. It is written vividly and again we seem to see the curly chestnut hair, the finely cut features, the virginal aspect of the beauty who one day took the collection at St. Roch, and was gazed at adoringly by a crowd scrambling on the very side altars.

A desirable book; full of colour. And what about the salons of the hour? In Lord d'Abernon's sketch of Asquith he records that, "Even in the most anxious times a spare hour could always be devoted to romantic converse with intellectual and gifted ladies." Perhaps the good days are still with us. MARJORY ROYCE.

HEARTS BOWED DOWN.†

Mr. Beresford's twenty-eighth novel (how time flies, to be sure! this same hand reviewed—in these very pages—the first of them) shows a favourite author at his almost best. One may consider Mr. Beresford a little bold in deciding, as he does here, to choose so expansive a frame for weaving what he calls his "pattern of words" upon, their motif being in its nature episodic. For he is an austere writer, scorning the tricks of those flamboyant novelists who camouflage the exiguousness of their plots with all manner of frills and furbelows. Moreover the plot of "Love's Illusion" is not only very simple, it is hackneyed. Mr. Beresford merely shows us a rather ordinary but very natural and likeable young man falling catastrophically in love with a light-minded but desperately attractive young woman, who throws him over in circumstances that leave their mark on him for life. It is the youth, now more than middle-aged and a permanent bachelor, who tells the story thirty years after it happened. His frank and simple confessio amantis provides the vehicle however for the display of a gift for characterisation on the author's part that is nothing short of masterly.

Geoffrey, no more absurd a young man than others of his age (twenty-two), epoch (late eighteen-nineties), and upbringing (suburban and country parsonage), his Victorian but quite engaging parents; the girl Brenda; her nice little sister Pattie; Mrs. Maxwell, who led curates astray and altogether set her daughters a very bad example; her much to be pitied husband, cleverly manipulated as a "noise heard off" throughout the tragi-comic idyll; Mrs. Spenser-Greene, one of Nature's septuagenarian mischief-makers, all seem very much more alive than half the people one used to know.

Mr. Beresford's experiment, we perceive, has been triumphantly successful. We can survey his "pattern," with not a stitch out of place in it, as something complete and satisfying, a masterpiece in little. There is a dry simplicity about the writing, but this is the art that conceals art.

Miss Jameson pursues very different methods in "The Voyage Home." Her writing is neither dry nor simple—sometimes in fact she is loose and careless, while occasionally her characters do simply impossible things. It is a trifle of course that horses of the hunter class do not usually run in the Cambridgeshire, but not so much a trifle that daughters of the type of Sylvia should fling themselves away on the first uncouth and illiterate male encountered because a Captain Ling has dropped them (with more francs than will buy a return ticket in their vanity bags) at Dieppe. The device adopted by Sylvia's cousin Cynthia (nice names both, but not suitable for use in the same cast) for attaching the not too docile Richard to her apron-strings seems a little too Huxleyish for the period, and other psychological improbabilities obtrude here and there in the otherwise harmonious pattern of this ample and richly embroidered narrative. Lapses of this trifling order do not detract in any material degree from the success of Miss Jameson's effort to enlist a continuance of our sympathies and admiration for Mary Hansyke, indomitable heroine of "The Lovely Ship" who, as anticipated in the title, here continues a voyage that is far from smooth. Mary in the autumn of her days remains indomitable, a little more mellowed and if anything more lovable personage, still taking arms against a sea of troubles, most of which she has brought or helped to bring on herself. She is, unfortunately for her own peace of mind and that of those near and dear to her, the "managing" type. Naturally she goes on getting hurt.

This is an exceptionally good novel, let there be no mistake about that. There is much of positive beauty, not only of the pictorial kind, in Miss Jameson's working out of her theme, and beyond all that a subtlety of insight, an abounding tenderness, and a power manifested time after time in this latest achievement of hers, that it is likely will place Miss Jameson very high indeed among the novelists of her generation. EXITS AND FAREWELLS.*

A fleet of vessels at a Mediterranean port waiting for the dawn. Fishing boats with coloured sails—some orange, some white, some black as the night that holds them. Here a graceful yacht and there the dun-coloured craft of some northern clime, grimy with coal dust. What chasms and crevasses must we navigate in order to see, through Miss Bowen's eyes, these ships sail out into the open sea, to be finally received into the great ocean's depths. The history of a reputation illuminates a whole tract of culture, and we recognise from this latest book of Miss Bowen's how well justified she was at the beginning to follow, even to the point of extravagance, the dictates of her colour sensibility. In this collection of portraits there is breadth and intensity in the modelling. A paragraph or two has kindled a spark, and the extreme freedom of the author's handling creates the appropriate mood with its suggestion. Whether founded on fact or pure invention, the tales, written in the idiom of their day, bear the verisimilitude of truth, and create the convention of their period. The convention of aristocracy: to die well. Blood ankle deep through which, armed with pride and insouciance, they mounted to the gallows. Poor, unfortunate Mme. du Barry, an outcast among the aristocrats, a fishing boat with golden sail, could understand, but not conform to their code. The writer has also mastered her sequences of low-toned, if violent colour. The dun-coloured Grace Endicott and the Polander arrest the reader's attention as vividly as the flamboyant purple and gold of Michael III, Emperor of the East. Here a passion for words, jewel upon jewel in gorgeous effect, rivals the hard brilliance of Saltus.

CANADA PAST AND PRESENT.*

Nearly a century ago Catherine Traill—née Strickland, a sister of the Agnes of "Lives of the Queens of England" fame—migrated with her husband to a settlement on the Otonabee river in Ontario, and from thence wrote her mother a series of letters descriptive of life in that then virgin land. The letters became a book a few years later, which is now republished from Toronto. Its appearance is opportune, coinciding as it does with Mr. Frederick Niven's spirited picture of present-day conditions in that vast region of the Dominion which embraces the Prairie Provinces, the Rocky Mountains and British Columbia. It would be difficult to select two books more representative of the Canada of the past and the Canada of the present. And there is a singular agreement in some of the reflections of the two narratives. Take these two passages on the Canadian winter:

"You say you fear the rigours of the Canadian winter will kill me," wrote Mrs Traill. "I never enjoyed better health, nor so good, as since it commenced. There is a degree of spirit and vigour infused into one's blood by the purity of the air that is quite exhilarating. The very snow seems whiter and more beautiful than it does in your damp, vapoury climate."

"I have entertained in January, while in London," writes Mr. Niven, "visiting Canadians from the 'bald prairie,' and seen them crouch shuddering over a roaring fire, unable to keep warm; yet in London the thermometer registers no such low temperatures as it does during a North-West winter. They could not be frost-bitten in London, but they were chilled to the bone."

Mr. Frederick Niven (right) and Mr. J. Murray Gibbon.

A snapshot taken by Levon West, the American etcher, during "Indian Days" at Banff.

There is one quality of the natural scene, however which all travellers in North America will recognise as truthfully observed by Mrs. Traill, but does not seem to have been felt by Mr. Niven. The aspect of the country, she reflected, reminded her of the hilly part of Gloucestershire; but "you want the charm with which civilisation has so eminently adorned that fine county, with all its romantic villages, flourishing towns, cultivated farms and extensive downs, so thickly covered with flocks and herds. . . . I look in vain for the rich hedgerows of my native country." On the other hand, while Mrs. Traill was disappointed with the Indian summer, Mr. Niven celebrates it in a lyrical passage:

"The Indian summer is a lovely period in such parts, when the leaves of aspens, birches, and cotton-poplars are yellowing and tremble in the slightest wind. Mile after mile we pass through golden lower woods, bright against the reddy green of pines and firs. We carry away memories. We remember the high deliberate majesty of glaciers. We remember the frail beauty of a birch leaf spiralling downward in the quiet day."

Conditions of life, social intercourse, economic problems, even political relations between the mother land and the Dominion, figure prominently in each book; and Mr. Niven is so contemporary that he deals with last year's harvesters and with the Wheat Pool problem. While then the pages of Mrs. Traill are mostly edifying for their records of bygone difficulties, those of the novelist are practical to a degree. Indeed Mr. Niven has a valuable chapter of hints for the Tenderfoot, and tells how life is ameliorated by many diversions. "For youth it is a care-free and untrammelled land." For winter there are skating and curling, and hockey and ski-ing; for summer, tennis.

"But as for relaxations and diversions, by common consent dancing undoubtedly leads. Distance is no impediment, progress having endowed us with the motor-car. What is fifty miles in an automobile? On into the small hours dances continue, despite even the fifty or more miles' journey home again. The headlights bob and veer through the forest, lighting, sometimes, on a startled deer, hypnotising him for some moments during which he stands in the road staring, a deer of silver in the rays. Then he leaps back into the darkness of the forest whence he came."

Should the moralist regard those words as evidence of modern decadence, and reflect that Mr. Niven devotes far more space to the recreations than the hardships of life in Canada than Mrs. Traill, it may be answered that the writer of a century ago does refer to "young ladies going to evening parties with cluttering ringlets," and admit that the approach of winter was hailed with delight because it was "to all a season of leisure and enjoyment." The merry-makers were not able to go so far afield in their sleighs as their modern counterparts in their motor-cars; but that seems to be the only difference. Mrs. Traill's pages are replete with evidences of hard work; and so are Mr. Niven's. And each writer is agreed that "Canada is a land of hope" because everything is new and "everything going forward." The two books indeed afford notable evidence in their unity, over a century of time, in bearing testimony to the affection and enthusiasm the great Dominion inspires in those who settle amid its vast spaces.

THE HUMAN RUSKIN.*

It is the foolish fashion of our time to treat Ruskin as a pompous Victorian with quaint ideas about art, even quainter ones concerning economics, and, worst of all, a dreadful habit of mind which made him mix these two and serve them with the repressive moralising sacred to heavy Victorian fathers. Those of us who are attaining the border line of middle age are inclined to be as vehement as the bright and young, although for many of us Ruskin once stood with Carlyle: the twin deities of our adolescence. Mr. J. Howard Whitehouse has just published a volume of hitherto unpublished letters by Ruskin, and almost any one of the least significant of them is sufficient to dispel this current heresy. He has called the book "The Solitary Warrior"; and the title, in Ruskin's own spirit of apposite symbolic nomenclature, conveys exactly the feeling which the perusal of these letters has on our minds. Ruskin ceases to be a pompous Victorian gentleman and becomes a tragically lonely figure, yearning for friendship and affection as he fights his single-handed battle against the world. Letter after letter is a cri de cœur. Faith in man, faith in God, faith in himself and his own great purpose of world reform: one by one they are swept away from him.

* "The Solitary Warrior." New Letters by Ruskin. Edited by J. Howard Whitehouse. 7s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

"I had no conception," he writes, "when I began the battle how solitary I should find myself in it. Everyone fails me, and the tremendous power of self-deceived mammon worshippers, bleeding the life of all humanity, is something too horrible to face. I go against it without looking at it—the putrefying dragon is so much more ghastly than the old living one. It is curious that Turner is the only living man in Europe who fully understands this battle!"

Behind this battle with the order of society we get glimpses of the even more terrible strife of the spirit which really embittered him and wore out his great mind. Perhaps half a dozen times throughout these letters we have a reference to the devastating love he had for Rose la Touche; but those few references are enough to reveal the inward tragedy of his hopeless love for this girl, whose earliest letter to him, written when she was only twelve years old, he carried, wrapped in gold, throughout his whole life.

"She let me be with her on her birthday this year, and on mine, too, and has been very kind and wonderful to me, and taken a great deal of evil out of me, and given me peace something like yours. . . . I look forward to the lengthening days, not as I have sometimes done wishing they would not lengthen any more."

So he writes to his friend Mrs. Scott during one gleam of peacefulness before mental darkness descended upon this girl he loved; and finally, with the stress of so much conflict, upon his own great mind. But three years later he can say to the same correspondent:

"All beauty is now dreadful to me. I have no sense of any help coming to me from the Maker of it other than He gives to any worm cut through by the spade. . . . Fancy having the two worst associations of one's life fastened to the Rose or the Bluebell for one's country walks! It is so grotesquely horrible."

As we penetrate to the story of personal tragedy behind these utterances, the current myth of Ruskin the prig disappears; and for all his wealth, his marvellous advantages of education and upbringing, his opportunities for travel, we have the drama of a lonely soul at odds with circumstances.

Ruskin himself, however, would not wish to have this side of his life emphasised. To the world, even to this narrower world of his personal friends, he was the social worker and fighter. Many of these letters cover the period when he was publishing "Fors Clavigera"; those public letters which embody his economic, ethical and æsthetic doctrine; or, should one say, his doctrine of life which had these three facets. From the beginning he saw art as an expression of the social life of peoples, and a reflection of the personal ethic of the artist. He wanted life to remould itself upon the graciousness which he found mirrored in the products of earlier, more simple periods. He cannot bear to turn from the contemplation of Carpaccio's St. Ursula at Venice,

"in which every figure, and there are hundreds, is refined in feature and beautiful in dress, with a purity as perfect, though as various, as wild flowers. There are old and young, kings and poor labourers, saints and rough soldiers, but they are all different only as violets and ivy, or roses and meadow grass, all lovely and human and pure. Well, I had been an hour or so among these people and then came here in a glorious afternoon, with the mountains of Titian all purple in the north, but with four Americans in the carriage with me (first class), one man and three women, who, of all the wretches I ever endured the presence of, were the noisomest and most abominable in the ingrained essential total desperateness of degradation of mind. I can't enter into details about them, but I won't endure for my part the state of things which produces such vermin. If I fence myself only into a few fields I will have about me at least nothing but what shall tend to true laws of pleasantness and peace—not loathsomeness and wrath."

I seldom indulge in quotation of such length in a review, but these passages so convey the quality of these all-too-human letters that the licence is justified. If, as one reads, the idea of the inhumanity of the great Victorian is dispelled, so is that of his being passé in his thought. One long letter dealing with the philosophy and economic creed of the Society of St. George, which he founded, reveals that only in the more advanced circles in Russia have they attained to big ideas about money and its place, about service and its value. This man, who distributed his vast fortune and broke his great mind for the healing of the body social, comes to life again in these new letters. His quality as an artist is attested by half a dozen sketches from that careful pencil or brush; his quality as a man in nearly every utterance. Mr. Whitehouse, editing the letters, has appended a chart showing the principal events and writings of the time set against the chronology of Ruskin's own life and work; and so added something more to our debt. He has also given at the beginning of the letters for each year a bald biographical statement of the writer's activities; and at times we could wish that he had intruded a little more of his knowledge of Ruskin. But the volume serves most in sending us back to the other writings of this master, and in re-establishing him as the great man he was, by revealing both his greatness and his essential, pathetic manhood.

HORACE SHIPP.

Lady Frances Balfour was advised by Dr. George Saintsbury and her sister-in-law, Lady Betty Balfour, to publish her reminiscences and, if it be not impertinent to say so of such competent authorities, the advice was good, for this work is of very great interest. That the publishers are enthusiastic is shown by the fact that they have presented it in what is really an édition de luxe—handsome binding, excellent paper, admirable type—and they have provided, what is all too rarely done, an index to each volume.

Lady Frances Balfour is the widow of Colonel Eustace Balfour, whom she married in 1879; and a younger daughter of the eighth Duke of Argyll (in his day an outstanding figure, well known for his studies in geology, ornithology and natural history), by his wife, Lady Elizabeth Gower, the eldest daughter of the second Duke of Sutherland. This is mentioned to show that she was indeed born with a silver spoon in her mouth—the silver spoon in this case, so far as her readers are concerned, being that, as a matter of fact, she has known everyone, gone everywhere, and has heard much secret social and political history. Let it at once be said that discretion is the author's strong note. Unlike so many who unbosom themselves of their memories for the edification of the present generation, she blackens no one's character, nor does she reveal aught that should not be made public. This reticence does not in the least detract from the fascination of the book, for in it there is so much first-hand knowledge of people and events, that it is no exaggeration to say there is not a dull page in it. The very names in the indices are a feast. Let me dip at haphazard: Matthew Arnold, Asquith, Balfour, Cromer, Beaconsfield, Garibaldi, Bradlaugh, Burne-Jones, Louis Napoleon, John Burns, Parnell, Gladstone, Lord Salisbury, Mrs. Humphry Ward. And, remember, Lady Frances is a practised writer, the author of biographies of Lady Victoria Campbell, Dr. MacGregor of St. Cuthbert's and, more recently, Lord Balfour of Burleigh; and she writes with an easy pen, a delightful absence of self-consciousness, and a delicious intimacy (naturally) about those who figure in her pages:

"Talking once with my brother Lorne about a Memoir which had been published, he said that, to him, it was spoilt by the obvious self-esteem of the author. At the time I thought it a severe judgment, particularly as coming from his own modest and unassuming character. Often have I thought of this conversation while writing these memoirs, because it is difficult to keep personality out, while the family motto, which I have chosen for my title, is the one I have tried faithfully to follow. What I have wished to record are the memories and, above all, the Hero landmarks which have marked life's highways."

Particularly interesting is Lady Frances Balfour's mention of our greatest living man of letters:

"These memoirs have been read by one of my oldest friends, Mr. George Saintsbury. Many of my letters are to him, and he has known me for more years than either of us like to remember. I thought it well to choose a master of literary criticism, who is besides a Tory Jacobite, a High Churchman, and one who has always viewed women as a 'monstrous regiment,' with exceptions that prove the rule. He has read these pages with a critical understanding, and has made allowances for their prejudices and passions. His verdict must stand: 'If they like you, they will like the memoirs. If otherwise, otherwise.'"

In this instance there is no "otherwise."

There is much that is interesting about General Gordon, who called on the Duke of Argyll in 1884. His Grace did not catch his name, but "the intense individuality of the man stamped itself on his memory and haunted his imagination, notably the arresting expression of his eyes—the eyes of a seer, most uncomfortable."

"They talk about Chinese Gordon being sent alone into the desert on a camel with £40,000 on him. But Chinese Gordon is not a man who tamely submits to be sent; had he wanted an escort, they must have given it to him. It is just like the man to go alone 'under the direct command of God.' His Grace laughs, and says a man who had the idea that he was divinely inspired was dangerous in ordinary life, but may be useful when alone on a camel, going to meet Arab tribes. If he is killed, the Conservatives will say the Government ought not to have regarded his inspired theories; and if he succeeds, the Government will take the credit. The Pall Mall and the Liberal Press agree that if Gordon is killed, the Government must resign, so strong is the feeling in the country. The St. James's Gazette was happy when it said that 'it was only left to the country to send Lord Roberts with a valet, and Wolseley with a maid-servant, to complete the work of England's best and noblest blood.'"

It is impossible within the limits of a brief review to do more than indicate the interest and charm of "Ne Obliviscaris."

LIVELY MEMORIES.*

Hardly a reader of this book will refrain from commending it as one of those exceptional volumes whose authors have the great gift of making friends through the medium of the printed page. "Cold print" can sometimes be warm, personal, intimate, revealing; or it can be a barrier. It depends on the humanity, the zest, the humour of the author, this strange and irresistible comradeship; and Mr. Ashley Gibson has in full measure these rare qualities.

"Postscript to Adventure"—what a jolly title, by the way!—will appeal very strongly to the ordinary man or woman in search of what is vaguely termed "a good book," but it will also have a special attraction for a circle of journalists, artists, workers in the highways and by-ways of literature, who will find many backwaters of memory stirred by the author's stories and reminiscences. I write this with reason; for did I not live through five years of blissful free-lancing in quaint old Margaretta Terrace within hail of the "Six Bells"? and was not I also closely associated with the dear old Academy of blessed memories, conversing week by week with that brilliant pair, Lord Alfred Douglas and the late T. W. H. Crosland? And do not I also remember with affection Thomas of the World, always courteous, always ready to read, and if in any way possible to print, such matters as I wrote in those old, happy, far-off days? In just such a manner will "Gibby's" pictures of Fleet Street, of the Press Club, of Bohemia in the pre-war years appeal to many another who has walked in paths parallel to his own, if not always precisely coincident.

But the book is not concerned entirely with these fascinating glimpses of an eclipsed moon. To most readers perhaps the chapters telling of East Africa, of West Africa, of Ceylon, and of strange and thrilling experiences during the War, will mean more than those with London as theme —simply because they are unable to bring the key that fits that lock. All books depend for real understanding upon what the reader can supply from his own mind. Therefore those who have edited papers in the tropics, who have been half submerged in the porridge-like mud of trenches under shell-fire, who have explored the hinterlands bordering the Niger and Zambesi, who have suffered red tape and brass-hats impatiently, will find here some tremendous thrills—for Mr. Gibson has done all these things. And from them he has emerged with a sense of humour undamaged, with a touch of cynicism that stops short of bitterness, and with that gift of fine style in writing (so far removed from "fine writing" in the purple-passage sense), which some of us knew he possessed, as evident as ever it was in that memorable "Ceylon" which he gave us some years ago.

Several passages I had marked for possible quotation—innocently enough; but I have decided that to quote will be unfair. It would be too much like cutting a square inch out of a portrait as a sample of the artist's work, or playing a couple of isolated bars from a symphony. There are pages of fun; of humour; of comedy; and of tragedy not less real for the delicacy of the author's touch. Pages also, and often brief paragraphs, of description so neat, so "right," that the reader gains an impression of having seen the event—and he has actually seen it as through a glass, clearly: the unobscured mind of the author. The passage of the Orama through the Suez Canal, where "the path we rode was bright and illimitable in the taut beam of our searchlight"; the voyage from Beira to Delagoa Bay in a Portuguese steamer where, in the cabin allotted to the author, reclined a Portuguese major whose "slumber was not deep enough to disturb that which fondled his brass buttons with its antennæ"; the vivid sketches of the front line in France; the amusing encounters and episodes of London's night life before war changed it into a more strenuous and artificial affair—so I might go on mentioning "bits" that "please me mightily" and still fail to give a fair picture of the whole. Therefore obviously the only thing left for me to do is to advise all who value good work and who appreciate wit and wisdom and high entertainment, to read this book. By the time they have finished it they will have made a friend: one who has seen the hard as well as the pleasant side of life, and has proved the truth of that wisest of sayings—that life, after all, is to a great extent what you make it.

THE MUSINGS OF M. CLEMENCEAU.*

One would have welcomed a frank communicative preface to the extraordinarily interesting volumes in which M. Clemenceau, on the brink of the grave, took stock of mankind and the whole universe—a preface telling us how he had contrived to get so immense a book written! Only his most intimate friends can have formed any idea of the magnitude of the venture on which he had embarked. At the age of eighty-six, with the vivacity and vigour of a quite young man, he poured forth for us the fruits of seventy years of wide study and deep reflection. Had he a serried array of notebooks to work from? Or should we acclaim in these two volumes an absolute miracle of memory?

To review such a book seriously in a couple of columns would be impossible for anyone, but it is a very easy book to review in desultory fashion because it is full to overflowing with noteworthy passages: pregnant thoughts, acute observations and criticisms, flights of fancy, bits of autobiography, epigrams, jests. While reading it I pencil-marked enough "cynical asperities" alone (as Dr. Johnson would have called them) to fill half a dozen of these columns entertainingly. Yet the general tone is by no means cynical. It is stoic, rather. Gratefully, cheerfully stoic. M. Clemenceau had no illusions about life, but he was glad to have lived and he bade all others be of good heart. He was of course definitely anti-Christian. "Have we not been told," he asked, "that we are but dust and that to dust we shall return?" These words, he contended, do "not too well accord with the joys of paradise and the pains of hell." Better so! "All in all, is it not possible for us to remain merely good children of the earth, without other ambition than that of making the most of ourselves in the terrestrial condition from which we cannot escape?"

The autobiographical bits remind us what a traveller M. Clemenceau had been. They transport us all over the world from Ceylon, where he noted that the French missions "have no appreciable effect in spreading the French tongue," and Bombay, where he admired the "cultivated and urbane Parsees" (of whose sun-worship he has much to tell), to Buenos Ayres, where an English lady, "connected with the diplomatic corps," was so shocked and angered by a lecture of his that she declared he "ought to be publicly whipped"! Now and again we are given glimpses of his life en province, in his retreat by the sea. "These are my thoughts," he says in one place, "as, buffeted by the wind, I wander like a restless sea-bird among the hollows of the sand-dunes." One feels that his happiest days were spent in that remote retreat of his. Here in a little rhapsody which deserves, I think, to be reproduced in full. It is very typical—M. Clemenceau allows himself many such digressions from the main line of his thought:

"Haunted by imperious questions and uncertain answers, I sometimes seek solace from the silent enchantments of the great forest of liveoaks that the jealous ocean has guarded from the intrusive public. In the soft sparkling light, a fine bright rain of sunbeams sift through the shrivelled leaves, and caresses the ghostly trunks that stretch out knotty arms. The woods are suffused with the charm of early morn filtering into the clearings, while gleams of every tint of white on the distant crest of the waves, wherever the sun breaks through the clouds, form the background of the wild rugged vista. Shadowy trails wander away under the ferns, and impart a new life to the tawny tapestry of the pines, with their trunks of violet, scale-like bark. Here a world complete in itself, without gesture and without voice awaits the human drama. What better setting could the fancy of a dreamer ask?"

And the dreamer proceeds to fancy this woodland peopled by the creations of Shakespeare—by Hamlet and Yorick, Montagus and Capulets, Bottom and Titania and Queen Mab!

CLEMENCEAU.*

Sympathy for the number of good writers who are busying themselves just now with books about Clemenceau will be the first consideration inspired in M. Martet's English readers. However excellent, their portraits must remain insipid beside that which is Clemenceau, a quite terrifyingly alive Tiger, "burning bright" just like Blake's. As biographer, M. Martet has served his old chief better than Boswell served the Doctor, for in the mass of material which these recorded conversations represent the chaff (if there ever was any chaff) has been winnowed away, every point tells, and on every page there are a dozen of them. What emerges is a convincing and absolutely complete portrait, a "speaking" likeness if ever there was one.

* "Clemenceau: The Events of His Life as Told by Himself to His Former Secretary, Jean Martet." Translated by Milton Waldman. Illustrated. 25s. (Longmans.)

Sidelights on the War abound here of course. More than one secret of the first magnitude is revealed. " During the final German offensive I was afraid; I was doubtful of him (Foch). I used to make it a rule not to meddle in military operations, but in certain cases I say to hell with rules—the country before everything. I therefore went to see Pétain. I asked him, 'Well, what is your conclusion about Foch?' And Pétain answered, 'I've seen his plans—there's nothing more to say.' So I let him go on. The Chamber demanded his head. I defended him." Elsewhere, Clemenceau reveals that in the dark days of March, 1918, England asked him which he wanted to defend, Paris or Calais? "I answered 'Calais'." Foch he did not like—" You see, Martet, all the shabby little tricks he played upon me "—yet he backed him up—" If it had to be done again, even knowing what I had to expect from Foch, I should choose him again." He pays repeatedly the fairest of tributes to England's share in the victory, yet in retrospect his comment is that we have begun to show "a kind of weakening, of lassitude. . . . What can you expect? Their history goes back such a long way. . . . The English to-day are less enterprising than those of a hundred years ago. Some virtue is going out of them." He seems not to approve of modern women. "They wear skirts nowadays which come above their knees and change them four times a day. My poor mother probably only had two dresses and they fell to her feet, which did not prevent her from bringing up six children properly. . . . I should never have been able to marry a woman doctor."

These conversations reveal how astonishingly wide were Clemenceau's interests and enthusiasms. This ex-doctor and journalist, this wrecker of dynasties and governments and saviour of his country, found time somehow for devotion to scholarship, a passionate interest in all the arts, and in his eighty-fifth year is found not only talking but writing about Monet, about Phidias, Praxiteles, and the glory that was Greece, discussing prehistoric flints and the foibles of Hebrew financiers, Maurois and his Colonel Bramble, the flowers in his own garden, and the English Royal family—" All worthy people, what do you expect? They do their job as best they can." In talk he lets nothing go by him, his reactions even to trivialities are like sparks from an anvil, nor are any bounds set to his audacities.

TWO POETS.*

It is not perversity or mere convenience which makes me couple these books. As I read first Mr. Eliot's and then Dr. Saito's, I was confronted with the problem—is it as hard for a modern man, who is not a Catholic or a theologian, to understand Dante as it would be, one would think, for a Japanese, even as learned and sensitive as Dr. Saito, to understand Keats? Mr. Eliot, who is certainly modern and, though not a Papist, Catholic in his convictions and sympathies, evidently believes that it is hard to appreciate Dante. He claims high honours for him, honours which most English readers will be unwilling to give: "the most universal of poets in the modern languages," though not so comprehensive as Shakespeare. Dante's "Commedia" is one of those poems "which can only just hope to grow up at the end of life." I am myself of Mr. Eliot's opinion in this matter of the position of Dante; but I cannot help debating how far my opinion is governed by my general agreement—both "philosophical assent and poetic belief," as Mr. Eliot puts it—with the thought of Dante. Is it not possible that, were their philosophies to come back to acceptance, as Dante's in a measure has to the modern world, Milton's "Paradise Lost" or even Spenser's "Faerie Queene" would seem poems as universal as the "Commedia" and of immediate significance to the modern mind? For, much as we may admire great ancient poetry, we are at times checked in our admiration by its lack of immediate significance to ourselves. We can, for instance, find in the Iliad a spiritual message; but are we sure we have not put it there? This is not true of Æschylus, nor for some of Euripides; but there are not many to-day, to take an obvious instance, who can think of Sophocles as Matthew Arnold thought of him, a kind of Athenian Goethe; and for Goethe most modern men, unless they are Germans, have a positive distaste. All of which goes, I think, to show that at the moment we must be very chary of underestimating the strong personal element in all our literary judgments. It is the penalty for our so recent enjoyment of a kind of criticism which may have begun as the adventures of a soul, but has ended as the mere impertinences of caprice. Mr. Eliot's critical work is in comforting revolt against the school of mere personal chat; and the essay on Dante should do much to make those who are out of sympathy with the thought that made the poem appreciate some at least of its qualities.

Glad as I am for Mr. Blunden's delightful introduction to Dr. Saito's essay, I must warn readers that this essay is not of the kind which needs a bush. I have found the reading of it a most enchanting experience. To be shown by a foreigner the beauties of a place or a country that one believes one knows very well is, if one is receptive, a very enlightening occurrence. For the old beauties seen from another background by a man with a different set of æsthetic standards, with different memories, with different canons of comparison, and with different canons of criticism—the old beauties then take on a new and unexpected splendour. Dr. Saito not only knows his Keats most thoroughly, he knows the literature about Keats; he has read with enviable industry old and recent books on the poet, and he quotes from nothing without making some happy comment of his own, or so felicitous a use of his citation that it is in itself a criticism.

Novel Notes.

MOORLAND TERROR. By Hugh Broadbridge. 7s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)

There is perhaps nothing quite so terrifying as madness, and Mr. Broadbridge uses it to good effect in this story of the Cornish moors. Professor Kingsbury and his charming niece lived tranquil, happy lives, the professor looking after the birds and securing a sanctuary for them; the niece looking after the professor, who was as absent-minded as a professor ought to be. Then a most objectionable neighbour came on the scene, shot the birds which the old man loved so dearly, and soon proved himself to be a shooting maniac. A wild man at large on the moor with a gun is calculated to breed fear in anybody, and an eerie dread haunts the latter half of the book, relieved by the pleasant contrast of a love romance. The story is an unusual one, thrillingly exciting, yet with the freshness of the open air about it.

STRENGTH OF THE SPIRIT. By Leonora Eyles. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

The psychic, the uncanny—they lure us into wild hopes and dreams and, in the hands of such a competent, imaginative artist as Mrs. Leonora Eyles, can form the subject-matter of arresting fiction. She uses them to full advantage in "Strength of the Spirit," which concerns the investigations into spiritualism of a young woman journalist. Flail, editor of the Sunday Criterion, is a man of unusual personality who, having exposed a notorious blackguard in previous years and caused his suicide, now finds himself persecuted by the man's spirit, or one who impersonates him. It is the aim of this evil force to take possession of Flail's body, and Mrs. Eyles works up a weird, thrilling contest between the human and immaterial forces. Incidentally Helen Kent meets various spiritualists, hears and takes part in discussions on psychic matters, lives mentally in the past and future, while her everyday life is divided between her work, her illegitimate child and a bewildering romance. The characters are ably drawn, and the book is obviously the work of one who has studied deeply and sympathetically a subject that she handles with considerable power and sensitiveness.

MRS. CLUTTERBUCK LAUGHS. By Guy Pocock. 7s. 6d. (Dent.)

Mrs. Clutterbuck laughs, and in her praise may it be said that the reader laughs with her. Of wisdom she has little, but of wit she has much, and her humour is tinged with that shade of malice at her neighbour's expense which, except from the few kind souls among us, will always raise a laugh. It is a very human story that Mr. Pocock relates—the petty jealousies, the amorous fancies and the social gaieties of a typical small village, where each and all know the other's affairs fairly intimately. In his characterisation of Dr. Rally the author gets nearer to the bedrock of human emotions. The Doctor has sympathy and discernment. He has suffered himself and he understands the unspoken tragedy in the lives of others; but of course in a battle with Mrs. Clutterbuck he fails, realising his own failure. Who could stand up against the almost Rabelaisian bonhomie of unbridled laughter? Even through his failure, however, the reader can realise that there are two sides to a question, as there are to a man's personality. As a philosophy of life the book is healthy, the hardy east wind that kills where it cannot cure, and as a novel it is good fun.

DEAD MAN'S QUARRY. By Ianthe Jerrold. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)

Miss Jerrold is so much of the true artist that while she never allows your interest in her intricate plot to flag, she keeps you intensely interested also in the various people whose fates are touched by the discovery of a dead man in a disused quarry in Radnorshire. Her characters are very much alive; one feels they have existence outside this grim murder story; that they will go on when the tragedy of a summer bicycling holiday has been forgotten by even those most closely affected. There were six in the party—including the not very likeable young man doomed to sudden death in the quarry; and it was he, the sixth, who lingered behind at the top of Rodland Hill, and was never again seen alive by any of his five companions. A stranger to them and to England—supposed to have been out of it for fifteen years—he had just returned to claim a title and estate, and had already contrived to make himself unpopular with sundry acquaintances and dependents. More than one person had a good enough reason for killing him, and suspicion falls first on one, then another, till the whole history of his past is unravelled and an exceedingly clever mystery ingeniously cleared up. The story, style of writing and especially the character studies, place this book high above the level of ordinary detective fiction.

OUT OF THE SWIM. By G. B. Burgin. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Mr. Burgin dedicates this, his ninety-ninth book, to himself, "because there is no author in whose career I take so great and personal an interest." And he has paid himself the compliment of dedicating to himself one of the best books he has written of recent years. There are vitality and humour in his story of a young man, defrauded by a tricky lawyer, and driven to poverty-stricken surroundings in "Moberly's Muddles," a block of dwellings near the Tower of London. Many odd characters are among his neighbours, and some of them, such as Mr. Montgomery Prout, have the true Dickensian touch. But Mr. Burgin's optimism does not blind him to the pathos and heroism also found where poverty has its home. For the unfortunate Captain Harley L'Estrange adventures lurk in that somewhat cheerless environment, and romance is waiting just round the corner. The book from first to last makes most enjoyable reading, and is brimful of youthful hope and faith in mankind—a singular contrast to the sophisticated fiction turned out by the young of this generation.

GENESTA. By Aceituna Griffin. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)

Mrs. Griffin, the clever authoress of what is, in spite of some defects, a decidedly clever book, is already known to readers by her previous novels, "Pearl and Plain" and "Amber and Jade." That the present story is a decided advance on those two works will we think be agreed. For it possesses no little originality of plot, and there is characterisation in it which shows that the writer is a close observer and possesses the gift of weaving a tale which is at once arresting and suggestive. It is, we believe, generally supposed to be the duty of a critic to find fault and let the reader discover excellences. Now fault can (and is) found with nearly every product of human activity; and we take it to be a better method to show where praise can properly be bestowed. Thus we find the figure of Genesta herself not merely a lovable one, but one which seems to us to be notably original in conception. That others figuring in the book are not so sympathetic is merely because, as in life itself, the world is not made up of unusual or pleasant types. Gerald and Nicholette (you will know all about them when you have read the book, which we recommend you to do) are frankly objectionable for different reasons, although the reason that makes them most so is one that they have in common. The main theme of the book, of the plot of which we think it unfair to reveal more than this, is the disastrous effect which the access of sudden wealth has on certain not too well balanced natures, and this theme is worked out cleverly and well. In these days when we have become the victims of innumerable novels dealing with horrors or fraught with indecency, it is pleasant to be able to take up a story without either characteristic being obtruded on one; and Mrs. Griffin shows in her last book that it is possible to produce an absorbing tale without having recourse to matters which are only fit for the sergeants' mess or the dissecting-room.

THE RED NAPOLEON. By Floyd Gibbons. 7s. 6d. (Brentanos.)

One thing is certain: when a quick, imaginative, well-informed brain gets hold of the idea of picturing the next great war—such a brain as that of Mr. Floyd Gibbons for instance—the results are sure to make the reader "sit up." Here we have a really tremendous drama, about Karakhan of Kazan, a being born (supposed to be born) on the slopes of the Urals in 1900, a boy who was later to unfurl the banner of race equality and to carry his conquests around the world, and to become Commander-in-Chief of the Red and Asiatic armies—in fact a world figure. (But ought he to manicure?) What is the plot? It rests on the idea that the rule of the white man must be ended, and that all races should be put into the melting pot, so that only one race should emerge at last. So Karakhan invades America in order to kill white men, and to capture white women. Imagine this theme, enormous and ruthless, recklessly and splendidly treated by the great war correspondent. It is rather disagreeable, very well worked out, and of course extraordinarily thrilling, and we believe the author gave ten years' labour to collecting his material. "The Red Napoleon" will not easily be forgotten.

A PAINTED CLOTH. By Guy Chapman. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

A satire that at times sparkles with keen interpretation and at times merely with mercurial vigour, enlivens the large, crowded canvas of "A Painted Cloth," a remarkably good effort for a first novel. Mr. Chapman attacks the modern shibboleth of "We must be successful at all costs," in fiery denunciation of a publishing house's sale of its standards through the steady output of cheap literature. It is no war novel, though war is introduced in colours of blood-red and dun; it is no book of post-war times, although conceived in part in the tarnished gilding of hopes misplaced; it is more properly a heterogeneous mixture of life-lines diverging and intercepting round the romance and deterioration of modern publishing. One of the best pieces of characterisation in the whole writing is the figure of Horatio Quarles, the reader for the house of Ord, with his quaint prejudices; and he unfortunately appears only too seldom. The author has gone to the English music-halls for his Scotsmen.

SUGAR IN THE FLAME. By Edith Nepean. 7s. 6d. (Stanley Paul.)

Meirel Martyn's extraordinary resemblance to her brother, and her habit of dressing in his old clothes and running wild on the coast of the Irish Sea in the neighbourhood of her father's Welsh estate, involved her in difficulties from which she could not extricate herself without getting her brother into trouble. But it also brought her high romance, as Mrs. Edith Nepean shows in this sensational story of love and passion. It is a story that will please all who like a blending of thrill and sentiment, and are not too exacting regarding probabilities.

THE W PLAN. By Graham Seton. 7s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)

Lieutenant-Colonel Graham Seton, who prefers a shorter writing name, distinguished himself by the most reckless bravery during the Great War. A military march, "The Mad Major," was dedicated to him. He has written one of the two best Secret Service stories of the great struggle, the other being "Bretherton." "The W Plan" has more circumstantiality. It deals with a German project to mine six miles under the strategical centres of the British front, and then take our army in the rear. The first hint of the plan comes when a clever officer hears the dying German prisoner, Major Ulrich Muller, raving about "the inverted M breach." The Commander-in-Chief calls in Colonel Duncan Grant, and instructs him to assume the dead German's uniform and personality prior to being deposited by aeroplane within the enemy lines. This is the beginning of a marvellous chronicle of searches and dangers. Colonel Grant has to obtain the confidence and affection of the dead officer's old mother (he goes to her as the friend of her son). He has to suborn his German sweetheart, Rosa, to betray her country. He has to kill in cold blood a harmless young German soldier. Things like these Secret Service men have to do for their country.

REGENCY WINDOWS. By David Emerson. 7s. 6d. (Sampson Low).

If this is a first novel—the name of the author is not known to us—one is tempted to say with some confidence that Mr. David Emerson is a new novelist who is going to "arrive" before he is much older. He knows how to write, and how to tell a story; he has imagination, a virile, attractive style—the gifts in short that a novelist needs if he is to do his work well and make a popular appeal. "Regency Windows" is steeped in the atmosphere of the eighteenth century, the political and social life of the period; the characters are alive and drawn very ably—in particular the dissipated Sir Coniston Langley and his clever, pretty, ambitious and unscrupulous wife. They and their family, their friends; or more especially hers; and the lively, lax, fashionable circles in which she lives and intrigues are sketched with a light hand and with a shrewd understanding of human nature. A picturesque romance of the days of the Regency which we recommend alike for the interest of the story and the skill with which it is written.

The Bookman's Table.

WHAT IF HE CAME? By Garfield Hodder Williams. 3s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

There must be something strangely wrong with the world when everybody who sits down to imagine what would happen here if Christ were to return is forced to the conclusion that His teachings would not be altogether in harmony with those of His own Churches, and that He would not long be welcome to more than a small minority even in Christian communities. The Dean of Llandaff has told the story of such a Second Coming, in, "What If He Came?" and told it with a quiet candour, an understanding of human character, a sense of its drama and of the poignancy of its final tragedy that hold the reader's interest and leave him impressed with the spiritual significance of it all. The Great Teacher arrives at the busy little town of Porth Llanfair, in Wales; he gathers disciples about Him, preaches to the people, heals the sick, and powerfully moves the multitude by His compelling personality, His human kindness, the beautiful simplicity and truth of His teaching; but there are many who object to His unorthodoxies, are jealous of His influence, and are not so ready to receive Him. He travels from place to place and at length comes to London, there to go through envy, misrepresentation and betrayal to the end. A scene at the close suggests that the whole story is part of a man's dream, and the Dean writes of it in a foreword as "a meditation on the Gospel of St. Mark, taking the form of an imaginative reconstruction in terms of to-day of the words and scenes described in that Gospel." It is anyhow a vivid narrative that resolves itself into the testimony of one who has faced the religious problems of the time with breadth of vision and courageously, and it will make a strong appeal to the increasing number of thoughtful folk who believe there is no way of happiness for the world except that which takes it back to the ancient simplicities and sanctities of the Christian faith.

DORIA'S RING AND GALLIPOLI. By A. D. Russell and Jacqueline Stoer. (Burns, Oates & Washbourne.)

Of the two poems contained in this volume the first and longest is a collaboration, an unusual and surely a difficult thing in poetry. It relates, in a measure strongly reminiscent of "Christabel," a romantic episode in the life of the heroic Andrea Doria, saviour of Genoa and champion of Christendom against the great Turkish corsair Barbarossa, and the long and unhappy consequences of that episode. It is written with no little vigour and contains passages of undoubted beauty, but the authors are too facile. They lack restraint and the sovereign gift of style, and are too easily content with dead phrases and insignificant words. The same faults are to be found in "Gallipoli," which is the work of A. D. Russell alone and relates the "authenticated facts of a miracle" wrought in 1910 at the Carmel of Gallipoli in Italy by Saint Teresa of Lisieux, who was born in 1873, died in 1897 and was canonised in 1925. The pious intention of this piece places it beyond ordinary criticism, but one cannot help feeling that the choice of metre for it—that made famous and even notorious by Swinburne in "Dolores"—was in spite of the author's elaborate defence, a very unwise one. It is difficult now to read any poem in that metre, except Swinburne's own, other than as a parody of Swinburne, and it must be confessed that such lines as

> "The rents of our foundress' endowing > Are gone in repairs and arrears" do little to dispel that feeling.

THE VOCATION OF ALOYSIUS GONZAGA. By C. C. Martindale, S.J. Abridged edition. 3s. 6d. (Sheed & Ward.)

In June, 1725, Pope Benedict XIII proclaimed Aloysius patron of all Jesuit schools, and a few years later he was declared special patron of all students throughout the world. The present Pope has left no doubt at all, by many allusions, that he wills that Aloysius should be regarded as uniquely powerful on behalf of young men and boys, and as their quite special patron. One need not be a Roman Catholic in order to enjoy this beautiful, thoughtful and enthusiastic biography by Father Martindale. He describes eloquently the sort of world in which the boy grew up—he was born in 1568 into a distracted Europe, at Castiglione, and early prayed with care, refusing a cushion for his knees. The course of his strange, wonderful life is traced here with charm and ability.

THE PRINCE. By Niccolo Machiavelli. Translated by Edward Dacres (1640). With an Introduction by W. E. C. Baynes. 10s. 6d. (De La More Press.)

This new edition of one of the most famous of treatises on the art of government makes a handsome book, and its comeliness is enhanced by a fine photogravure reproduction of a portrait of its author attributed (the great Dr. Bode thought wrongly) to Santi di Tito and lately bought for the Uffizi Gallery. The time has long gone by when Machiavelli was regarded merely as an outstanding example of moral turpitude, and in speaking of him the most emphatic accent was placed on the first syllable of his Christian name. He is recognised as the father of the modern science of politics, "inasmuch," says Mr. Baynes in his excellent introduction, "as he was the first to analyse various forms of government that had existed and to inquire how they had worked in practice." Mr. Baynes places "The Prince" against the background of its age, and relates its principles to the standards and the needs of that age. He also touches on Machiavelli's later influence. "How far," he asks, "have his rules of conduct been adopted with success by such modern creators of new states as Bismarck, Lenin and Signor Mussolini?" At a moment when some form of dictatorship has many advocates in England, this edition has almost a topical interest.

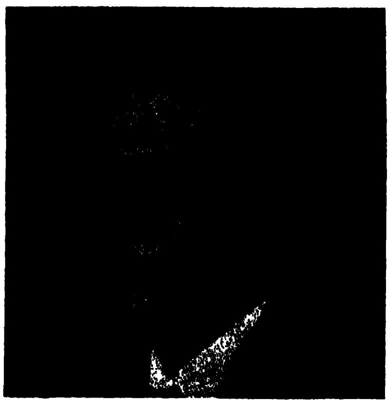
MORE CRACKS WITH "WE TWA." By the Marquis and Marchioness of Aberdeen and Temair. With 38 illustrations. 15s. (Methuen.)

Those who remember "We Twa," published some years ago and deservedly very successful, will be delighted to find that the authors have now issued a companion volume of random reminiscences. The subjects dealt with by the Marquis and Marchioness of Aberdeen extend in time from the seventies to their golden wedding in 1927, and cover a large variety of interests, mainly of a more or less serious nature—to which latter, however, an effective counterblast has been supplied in a number of humorous anecdotes told with point and wit. This is an agreeable and attractive volume which deserves as general a reading as its predecessor.

SAYS SERGEANT MURPHY. By A. P. Garland. 6s. (Arnold.)

What does he not say? He discusses Cruelty in Sport, Humility, Scaremongers, The Flapper Voter and many other things. The book is merry and witty and the very present for the heavy-hearted, especially if the depressed one be of the male sex! All men will like Murphy. Don't we sympathise with him in most of his grievances? If only, he sighs, the L.C.C. would have every public statue in London "thried for its life every five years, be a grand jury of the unforchinit citizens who have to work every day in the vicinity of it," we should see "the divil's own dhrop in the price of material for crazy pavements." His opinion of reviewers is arresting. "They're mostly beyond middle age, respectable, thrustworthy married men, addicted to bulb rearin', and gettin' foreign stations on their four-valve sets. They've no thruck with the modern school, and would as soon think of bringin' a live snake home as wan of them books." Excellent. True also.

Books of the Month.



From January 15th to February 15th.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

Both for its vivid pictures of the life and customs of the Navajo Indians and for its story of the young Navajo who gives his name to the book and of the strange, alluring Slim Girl whom he marries, LAUGHING BOY, by Oliver Le Farge (7s. 6d.; Constable) is a remarkable book. With all her faults, Slim Girl has perhaps a better right than Tess to be called "a pure woman." It is a story of great power, deeply poignant in its later developments, finely imaginative and touched with beauty of thought and of feeling.

Mr. Donald Maxwell has claimed various titles for himself from time to time. Not long ago it was that of highwayman, and now comes A DETECTIVE IN KENT (6s.; Bodley Head). If sometimes a vivid imagination is apt to run away with him, he sleuths here to excellent purpose. By means of close observation and indefatigable research he traces the old Kentish coast-line and the history of various place-names, out of which he constructs realistic pictures of long-past features and industries. The simile of the title is well maintained, and the reader quickly catches the author's infectious enthusiasm. Many local legends too are tracked down in a manner which adds considerable spice to the adventure. Numerous maps and pictures are included, the latter in our opinion reflecting some of his most careful and attractive work.

Alfred Sternbeck's FILIBUSTERS AND BUCCANEERS was first published in German in 1928, and now appears in an English translation by Elizabeth Hill and Doris Mudie (12s. 6d.; Methuen). These stories of sixteenth and seventeenth century adventurers carry the full flavour of hazard, intrigue, speculation, treasure trove, keen disappointment and overwhelming good fortune, but it is our indebtedness to them as naval pioneers, rather than a further embellishment of the romantic element, that has inspired them. Drake, Clifford, Captain Kidd (with whom originated Edgar Allan Poe's "Gold Bug"), Captain Roberts, not forgetting the two female pirates, Ann Bonny and Mary Read, and many another, are old familiars, but this different aspect gives a fillip to our allegiance. Very interesting too are the numerous illustrations taken from contemporary pictures.

Mr. A. E. Yarra, whose new novel, "The Vanishing Horsemen," Messrs. Selwyn & Blount are publishing.

For a guardian who stood "rather wistfully between a generation whose principles are demonstrably wrong, and a younger generation which seems to have no principles whatever," it was a somewhat delicate task to be responsible for such a modern young minx as DORINDA DARLING (7s. 6d.; Herbert Jenkins). With an amazing fund of humour and sparkling repartee, Mr. A. A. Thomson recounts the escapades which spared no one who came within the radius of this live wire. Bishops, millionaires, aunts, etc., all were good targets for her irresistible roguishness. An infectious gaiety runs right through to Dorinda's final and overwhelming victory.

During a chance meeting in a London hotel, the threads are steadily picked up which lead to the unravelling of the mystery surrounding a stranded schooner and some valuable pearls. The scene soon shifts to Mr. Ottwell Binns's familiar haunts, the South Seas, and in THE SECRET PEARLS (7s. 6d.; Ward, Lock), in his wonted colourful vein, he hunts out the truth of the many conflicting versions of the story. Intrigue, adventure and misunderstanding are kept at high pitch until the facts gradually emerge, while a charming romance is allowed to percolate, giving just the necessary rounded-off-ness to an excellent yarn.

"A couple about six feet by four; half a dozen at three feet square apiece, and a large one—family group or something of that kind—long-shaped—thirteen feet by nine." Thus ran the order for the family background, the lack of which proved such a vital obstacle to the establishment of the Halybots in the ducal mansion they coveted. In ANCESTORS (7s. 6d.; Cassell) Mr. Lennox Dryden depicts the predicaments of this ambitious pair in their efforts to found a "family" for their son and two daughters. With the help of Lady Barbara Burlington, in a somewhat ambiguous capacity, the old Jewish antique dealer and various others, they eventually succeed in merging into the de Haileybottes, complete with ancestral portraits and all the usual accompaniments, without losing however one whit of their own quaint originality. The whole story is a delightful riot of imagination, where the improbability is well smoothed down by its geniality.

There is nothing superficial about Martha Ostenso's work. It is clear and decisive, nor is it lacking in the polish that gives the trivial as well as the more outstanding features that real sense of finish. In THE YOUNG MAY MOON (7s. 6d.; Thornton Butterworth) a slowly gnawing remorse works its pitiless way through two lives, that of a young widow and her husband's great friend, who alone shared her secret, whilst round them hovers the grim, gaunt figure of the mother-in-law. The struggle is a formidable one, only increased by the cramping antipathy of the neighbours, but it is tempered with much that is delicate and charming, and wins through eventually to peace of mind and happiness. Out of the many faceted life in a small American town Miss Ostenso has produced a very human and tender picture.

In DIFFICULT WOMEN, by Katharine Brush (7s. 6d.; Cassell), which has a strong flavour of New York, we are told of eleven difficult women, each with a difficulty peculiar to herself. There is for instance the bride who finds out the day before her marriage that the best man is the only man she can ever love; and there is the ridiculous mother of forty who lies in bed and makes her daughter support her. We have a tragic "Gaudy Lady" who secretly keeps a disreputable night club that she may give her son great chances in life, and then comes a silly little girl who hitches her wagon to a star—and has to run behind. Some of the stories are just amusing, all are inspired with character and sentiment. The cleverest story is perhaps "Night Club," in which the ladies' dressing-room forms the background for glimpses into the lives of those who come and go.

With a delightful compound of vivid imagery, sympathy and faithfulness to historical facts, Lady Kitty Vincent gives yet another angle of the '45 Rebellion in THE FIERY CROSS (7s. 6d.; Herbert Jenkins). The fluctuating atmosphere is admirably realised. The Prince, with his gallantry, charm and vacillating ways, is frequently glimpsed, but the story is more closely concerned with the Jacobite women of varying degrees, with their courage, winsomeness and sacrifice, while reverting from time to time to their menfolk and the more definite scenes of action. From the Prince's landing down to the tragic days following Culloden, all the well-known happenings are ranged chiefly in relation to the imaginary figures of Ronald Ogilvy and his charming wife Mairi. It is a glowing book, vivid scenes stand out by sheer force of descriptive power, the battle of Culloden in particular, while the canine personality of Angus is bound to win admirers everywhere.

The COLLECTOR

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—BURTON

PUBLIC OPINION.

ONE of the pleasing experiences of an editor is to receive appreciation from his readers for a new plan. He has always a measure of anxiety in his mind when he embarks upon a fresh development, for in doing so, he invites criticism, and usually this is forthcoming. We have every reason for saying that the decision to add this "Collector" section to THE BOOKMAN has been more than justified. From all sides there has come to us, by word and by letter, approval for the new feature. It has proved to us, what we had already believed, that there was not only room for such a fresh section, but that it would be welcomed not only by collectors, but by our readers in general. We are glad indeed that "The Collector" has been welcomed both for its interest and for its real practical value. Our attitude to book-collecting combines that of those who feel the inestimable joys which come to a collector, whether his or her collecting be on a small or a large scale, and that of those who buy books for the sheer pleasure of reading them, as well as for their economic value. There is, we think, in such an attitude, a balanced view. We see no reason at all why a person should not both love a book for its literary value, and have at the same time a keen interest in its money value. We make bold to say that no real book-lover can, or ever will—remembering Burton's saying—turn over his books in the twinkling of an eye, and readily part with them for profit. It goes hard with the soul of those who have a high regard for books to dispose of them. That is our gospel. We look forward to the development of "The Collector" in the months ahead, as a means of adding to our own knowledge and delight, as well as to the entertainment and help that we believe will come from it to our readers. There is, happily, evidence that this is going to be so in the kindly words that have already reached us from many of them.

LIMITED EDITIONS.

Of recent years the limited edition market has been developed to an astonishing extent. A year or two since it seemed that it was being overdone; in fact, we would say it was definitely overcrowded with limited editions of almost every conceivable kind of book, irrespective of the normal expected demand, or the standing of the author of the book concerned. These too-many limited editions made their way for a time among those people who thought that any and all limited editions must have both a literary and a commercial value. But as time passed, this particular section of the public became a trifle suspicious, and many limited editions failed to achieve the necessary success. Many of them were, and still are worth while. We have even purchased certain volumes, by assuredly famous authors of no mean literary ability, which can now be bought at about half the price at which they were issued! Here again then is a similar situation to that which applies to stocks and shares. A new gilt-edged security is offered at £100 par, and there are many who, for fear of not being allotted the amount of their application, at once subscribe. After the date of issue it often happens that the particular share may be bought in the open market at a discount. And this is what has happened to us with certain limited editions—and probably to many others.

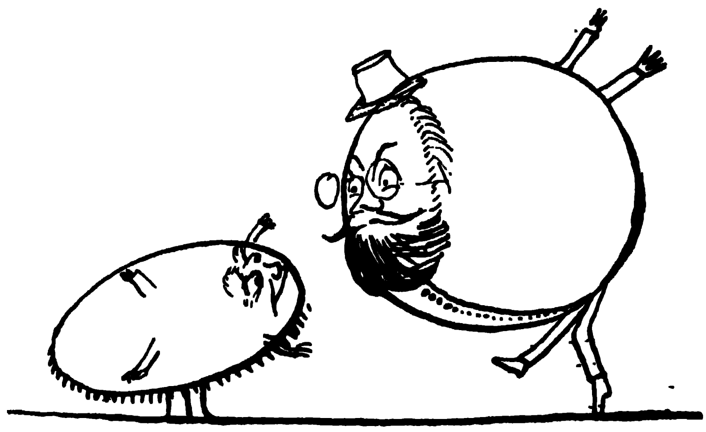
The situation to-day in regard to limited editions is very different. There is more caution in the making of such editions, and as a rule it is only the author with an assured literary market that is so honoured. Again, in the past, these limited editions comprised too many copies. This, in itself, was farcical. Limited editions for collectors should be limited. Five hundred copies, printed on hand-made paper, in larger form, and signed by the author, and by the artist if there are illustrations, and published at £3 3s., is a reasonable proposition. Of this kind of edition no larger number should be printed. Frequently the number is 250.

It is not easy for those who are interested in this kind of work to find out what books are appearing in this form. We agree: it is difficult. We have missed some ourselves. This is annoying from two points of view. One, we miss the opportunity of securing a copy of a special edition by a particular author whose books we happen to like, and we lose a chance of buying something that may bring us a rich profit, if we desired to sell it after it had appreciated. Here is a case in point.

A friend of ours rebuked us, at the time, because we had not told him that there was to be a limited signed edition of A. A. Milne's "When We Were Very Young." Speaking from memory—it was a few years since—it was published at something like two guineas, and a copy in mint state, because it is very scarce, might well cost to-day £70. Naturally our friend was annoyed, but as we were abroad at the time we think his strictures were a little unfair.

There is not always need to announce these limited editions, because they are sold almost as soon as the order is given for them to be made. We did have the good fortune to secure a copy of that really beautiful edition of Kipling's Poems, in three volumes, published at £15 15s., but we only just managed to do so. Also, by dint of much effort and quiet pursuing, we ran down a copy of Tomlinson's "All Our Yesterdays."

If you really want to make quite sure of obtaining limited editions of your favourite authors, or of any famous author, the thing to do is to make a list of those authors, and place an order for any or all of them, and take your chance of being lucky enough to get one. Some people are doing this, but it is impossible for everyone to have a copy reserved for him. Even the bookseller himself may order as many as a dozen, and perhaps be supplied with only two, or even one. There are those who place their order too late. It is all very difficult, and we know of no way out except that a larger number of copies be printed—and then the edition can no longer be said to be limited. There are occasions when a larger number of copies in a limited edition is justified, especially where the edition covers the two English-speaking markets—Great Britain and U.S.A., but usually five hundred copies is the sensible number.



A BATCH OF CATALOGUES.

And a very good batch it is. There are so many that we hardly know where to begin. These catalogues are excellent in every way, and we should like to be able to give more space and consideration to them. Perhaps, as this section of THE BOOKMAN grows in popularity—and we would remind our readers that this is the only journal in Great Britain that has so large a special part devoted entirely to book-collecting—we may find it practicable to increase the number of pages we are at present devoting to it.

In writing about these catalogues that reach our office during the month, we hope the information we give will be found sufficiently interesting to encourage the reader to ask the antiquarian bookseller to send him or her a copy. In this way our work will prove to be of value to everyone concerned. Addresses will always be found in the business part of these pages.

Quaritch has provided us with two catalogues of importance. One (No. 430) comprises a great number of books on American bibliography, European history, genealogy, numismatics, political economy, etc. The other list is of general publications and remainders. Another catalogue (No. 521) of Biographical works, pamphlets and tracts relating to all that concerns the production, collection and history of books, comes from Francis Edwards. This is of special attraction. There are nearly one thousand books, all of which we would be delighted to see on our shelves. Some are on those shelves, but not many. You may spend a pleasant time with this catalogue. There is one catalogue which kept us engrossed in it too long. This was another Edwards list (No. 4) of autograph letters of celebrated authors. It is most excellently produced. We like the lay-out of the page, the readable notes appended to each item, and the easy way one can see names, descriptions and prices. Moreover the list is admirably illustrated with reproductions of portions of some of the letters. It is so rich with interesting things that we dare not begin to deal with any especial item. Some of these letters contain clever drawings done by their writers such as the two we have reproduced. Reading through this list has given us as much pleasure as many a volume of fiction.

From Autograph letter of Edward Lear, Nov. 15th, 1860.
From "Autograph Letters of Celebrated Authors and Others." New Series, Number Four (Francis Edwards).

But we must hasten. Another good list, also well arranged, as so many are these days, comes from Miller and Gill. There are some fifty pages, containing entries of a number of first editions and private press books. The prices are sound. We mean by that, they are of the right market value. We notice a particularly fine collection of Mr. Wells's books, among which there is a very moderately priced copy of "The Island of Dr. Moreau" for £16. It is not in absolute mint state, otherwise it would cost somewhere about £30. If we did not already possess them, we should certainly order the three books by Mrs. Virginia Woolf, all marked at moderate prices. Readers will do well to keep their eyes open for all books by Mrs. Woolf. Those who understand, know her great literary value, and some day all her b oks, especially of course the earlier ones, will be valuable possessions. At present they may be bought for a pound each or thereabouts, but these prices won't obtain for long.

We must hold the other catalogues over until next month, as they are too interesting to dismiss with a casual comment.

I want a new Hat — but can I rise to this —

Would Mr Pennell think this, superior or inferior to the modest-cap of the two peaks,

Really I meet them like this —

With my love.

THE MARKET.

Since we wrote our last notes, the happenings in the book-collecting market have been many and interesting. All this movement, apart from the other multitudinous details concerning it, makes good reading for those who are attracted by the practical side of book-collecting.

We have been more than just interested during the past month in looking through The Clique, the valuable antiquarian booksellers' weekly, established in 1890. There is no better reply to the cynical comment that the collecting of first editions is a passing craze than this weekly. In the course of the month many thousands of books—some are of course mentioned a number of times—are advertised for, as wanted by the advertisers for their customers and for stock.

No end of paragraphs are appearing in various places in the press of this and that book being sold for a high price, perhaps a hundred or more pounds, whereas it was published at only a few shillings. We have written some ourselves. But we wonder if everyone knows that there was once a book published at one pound, which brought under the hammer, some three hundred years later, £8,600. It was resold for $100,000 and the chances are that, if it were put up to auction to-day, it might well run to thirty, forty or even fifty thousand pounds! Anyhow, Dr. Rosenbach said once that it was worth thirty thousand pounds. There is no one of us who can really estimate its price. It is the First Folio Shakespeare of 1623—the Comedies, Histories and Tragedies, printed by Isaac Jaggard and Edmund Blount.

Some first or limited editions to look out for:

"All our Yesterdays." By H. M. Tomlinson.
"A Writer's Notes on his Trade." By C. E. Montague.
"Europa's Beast." By R. H. Mottram.
"The New Hangman." By Laurence Housman.
"Shepherds in Sackcloth." By Sheila Kaye-Smith.

" Dream in Luxembourg." By Richard Aldington.
Facsimile Catalogue of Laurence Sterne's Library.
" Kindness in Corner." By T. F. Powys.
" A True Story." By Stephen Hudson.
" The Aloe." By Katherine Mansfield.
" Down in the Valley." By H. W. Freeman.
" A Rambling Discourse." By John Galsworthy.
" The Mirror of the Months." By Sheila Kaye-Smith.
" Violet Ryder." By Norah Hoult.
" Dandelion Days." By Henry Williamson.

Some of these are already issued, and copies are not easy to find, except at a premium.

There is coming a new series entitled " The Furnival Books." Each volume will comprise just one short story. The edition will be limited to five hundred copies, and each will be signed. The following will be some of the authors: A. E. Coppard, T. F. Powys, Rhys Davies and H. E. Bates. All books by these authors are worth collecting, expecially those by Mr. Coppard and Mr. T. F. Powys. And it is well to watch the work of Mr. Bates.

At a recent sale, Sir James Barrie's " Better Dead " was sold for £49; Mr. Galsworthy's " From the Four Winds " for £60, and " Villa Rubein " for £40; and Mr. Kipling's " Just So Stories " for £245. Mr. Kipling had signed the last mentioned book. Autograph of or a letter from the author placed in a volume, always add a great deal to its value.

Sothebys recently held a sale of valuable printed books, autograph letters and other MSS. They were the property of the Earl of Lytton and Viscount Ridley. The collection included many volumes of English literature of the sixteenth to the eighteenth century. There was a presentation copy of Burke's " Reflections on the French Revolution of 1790 to Sir Philip Francis," and an extensive collection of Dryden and other seventeenth century dramatists. There were also some first editions of Jane Austen, Byron, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Hardy, Kipling, Barrie and Shaw; early editions of Boccaccio, a fine Second Folio Shakespeare; autograph letters signed by James Boswell, Edward FitzGerald; some verses by David Garrick; manuscripts of Handel, Beethoven, Rossini; letters of Dr. Johnson, Shelley, Dickens, Thackeray and Scott. We shall refer to the prices obtained in our next " Market " notes, as we are going to press before the sale takes place.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon is to sell through Sothebys, shortly, many of the books in his valuable library.

In looking for bargains among the first editions of famous authors, it is well to bear in mind that first printings often run to many thousands of copies. A first edition in this particular form has very little value, unless it be the first issue of the first edition, and contains some feature of a special character, as in the case of Graves's " Good-bye to All That." In the first issue of this book there was a poem which did not appear in subsequent issues. Some idea of the popularity of notable authors may be gathered from the fact that Mr. Galsworthy's "Plays" have reached the sixtieth thousand. Some 20,000 copies were printed of the first ordinary edition of "All Our Yesterdays."

A signed copy of Oscar Wilde's "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" realised £175 at auction. Wilde had presented it to the Governor of the prison. It included a letter from the author.

We have just received, at the moment of going to press, a most interesting catalogue from that remarkable firm, Messrs. W. and G. Foyle, of Charing Cross Road. This house sends out special lists covering each of its many departments. The one before us comes from the Rare Book Department, and is crowded with many alluring books and manuscripts and autograph letters. The best suggestion we can make in this very brief paragraph is that the reader should send for a copy of Messrs. Foyle's "Catalogue of the Rare Book Department."

The Cambridge University Press is publishing a work on "English Collectors of Books and Manuscripts" from 1500 to 1900.

Some interesting auctions were held during February. Messrs. Sotheby & Co. sold a number of books that had belonged to the late Sir Mortimer Singer, K.B.E., and Messrs. Hodgson's auctions included a number of valuable books from an old country house, while at Messrs. Puttick & Simpson's there were disposed of many works of American origin, and quite a number of early printed books. At all of these sales there were many first editions of Victorian and Georgian authors: H. G. Wells, Sir James Barrie, A. E. Coppard, George Moore, and so forth.

There was an interesting sale of old engravings, Americana, and other items at Messrs. Puttick & Simpson's in the early days of February.

The more important prices realised at Messrs. Sotheby's sale of printed books on February 11th were:

Ackermann: "The Microcosm of London" (1808–10) - - £108 (Willis).
Combe: "The Tour of Dr. Syntax in Search of the Picturesque" (1812); "The Second Tour" (1820); "The Third Tour" (1821) - - - - £102 (Spencer).
The Sporting Magazine - - £450 (Banks).

The London First Edition Club has been established now for some years, and last December saw the inauguration of the Liverpool First Edition Club, with twenty-five original members, Sir Benjamin Johnson as its President, and Mr. J. W. Nance and Mr. I. W. Girvan as Honorary Secretary and Treasurer. The Club has its own rooms at 10, South Castle Street, Liverpool, and has had its two first lectures, one on the "Picaresque Novel," by the Chairman of its Committee, Professor W. Lyon Blease, and one by Mr J. W. Nance on "Edmund Blunden." I am told that the Hon. Treasurer is "a Jefferies fan," and may be expected to lecture on him shortly. The Chairman specialises in finely printed books from modern presses, and has a magnificent collection, though he started too late to get any Kelmscott; the Treasurer collects modern first editions of novelists, and has a notable collection of Coppard, a complete set of Williamson, and is pinning his faith to Mottram and Brett Young as writers who are dear and will become dearer to collectors. Mr. Nance confesses to a weakness for modern poetry and is rich in first editions of Blunden, Eliot, Sassoon, Graves, and others, and, he says, "some rarish Le Gallienne, who as a Liverpool author interests me considerably. Also L. A. G. Strong is a fad of mine." Founding the Club has not, he remarks, been an easy matter, but it is going at last and so very much alive that we are too late to wish it success but in time to congratulate it warmly on the success it has achieved.

THE CONFESSIONS OF AN AUTOGRAPH COLLECTOR.*

There is always more than one way of doing everything, but every way is not the right one. The other day I talked with a collector of autographs, and he told me of his sorrows. For long years he has made a practice of writing to established celebrities and to men who have newly burst into fame requesting them to oblige him with their autographs. He sends a small card on which the signature is to be written, and encloses a stamped envelope. Often he loses his stamp and receives no reply. I suggested that some of the famous were perhaps suspicious enough to be deterred by a fear that he might write above their signatures on the card "I O U £5." and go round to collect the money, but he had too much faith in them to believe that. Now and then nothing but his blank card comes back in his stamped envelope; sometimes a typed letter is with it, signed by a secretary, saying the great man never gives his autograph; one of the famous sent him a printed form announcing that an autograph would be yielded in return for a donation of five shillings, which would be handed over to a deserving charity. Nevertheless he was of good cheer and gave me an impression that his method of dropping a line to notabilities gave him all the joyous suspense and excitement to be obtained by fishing with a rod, and more often than not he had the felicity of catching the autograph he angled for.

But this is the wrong way of doing it, and if you would know the right way, you should read Lady Charnwood's delightful account of her own collection and how she made it. Unless it is of some very great person whose holographs have nearly all disappeared, a mere signature is of no particular interest; but a collection of letters from the famous to their friends is a treasure it is worth taking trouble and paying something to acquire. Such letters stand high in the class of collections, and Lady Charnwood gives you seven good reasons for their occupying that height:

* "An Autograph Collection and the Making Of It." By Lady Charnwood. 15s. (Ernest Benn.)

" There is the obvious fact that the more we learn about the great ones whose letters we collect, the more knowledge we obtain of the history of their time as well as of the actors in it, and the more literary in the true sense of the word we ourselves become. . . . If you cannot manage to devote enough time or money to get far into the business, you can still have interesting letters, if not valuable ones, and you can still work up the subjects alluded to and read the books by the authors. . . . Very much can be done among friends, or in an autograph club, or even at a dealer's, with very little buying, by way of exchange of duplicates " (i.e. where one has two or three letters by the same writer) " and here I should like to state that I have never asked for a letter, except as an arrangement with another collector, in my life. Nor have I ever descended to the odious practice of writing to strangers to get them to reply, a habit which brings serious collectors into disrepute. I have asked distinguished people to write in my book, with place and date, but very seldom, because a barren signature does not interest me."

That is the creed of the true collector. Autograph letters, again, as Lady Charnwood says, " are less subject to fashion than most collections." Their values do not fluctuate so alarmingly on the market, and " broadly speaking, good autograph letters are bound to appreciate " ; above all, in such letters " the double interest of the personalities of the writer and recipient may cause anyone of us—accidentally it may be—to become possessed of something of no price on the market, but of such deep interest as to be worthy of inclusion in even the best collection. I do not mean we shall come upon a letter extremely valuable because it is written by a man who commands a high price; that is more than unlikely. But I do mean exactly what I say, that we may find we have a letter of such interest as to be worth having by anyone. To put it differently, something that is personal in an unusual way."

From her interesting and useful preliminary chapters on how to start and go on with an autograph collection ; causes of its value ; how to arrange and index it, Lady Charnwood proceeds to write of various groups of letters in her own collection, and prints a large number of them. These include letters from Andrew Marvell, Pepys, Addison, a long and characteristically gossipy one from Shenstone, a long and equally characteristic one from Samuel Richardson ; letters from Horace Walpole and Cowper, a poem by the sometime poet-laureate Pye, letters from Clive, Burke, Sidney Smith, Pitt, Nelson, Hume, Gibbon, Macaulay, Froude, Carlyle, Gainsborough, Turner, Constable, Lamb, Hazlitt, a completely precious letter from Anna Seward, the Swan of Lichfield, criticising with complacent self-confidence poor Charles Lloyd's translation of Homer and comparing it with Pope's and Cowper's—these and more and an excellent series of letters from Shelley, Leigh Hunt, Coleridge, Dickens, Tennyson, Swinburne, Rossetti, Kingsley, Alice Meynell, Lear, Wendell Holmes, Millais, Caldecott, and other nineteenth century writers and artists make up a book that, whether you are a collector or not, you will read from beginning to end with unfailing enjoyment. In all she writes of the business of collecting Lady Charnwood is eminently practical and informing; but apart from practical considerations she is so evidently and keenly interested in the literary and human sides of her pleasant undertaking that she has known how to make it interesting to all and sundry. The book is illustrated with a photograph and several facsimiles.

THE CRAFTSMANSHIP OF BOOKS.*

Collectors and bookmen generally will be well advised to secure a copy of a small book published in January last. The author, Mr. J. Howard Whitehouse, has called his volume " The Craftsmanship of Books " and, as might be inferred, its contents are mainly devoted to suggestions for improvement of the book as a book, i.e. its paper, typography, binding, etc. The author is not concerned with questions of literary merit. The general text, epitomised, is that the more beautiful the book the greater its appeal. Preaching such a text, the dedication to William Morris will be understood.

* " The Craftsmanship of Books." By J. Howard Whitehouse. 3s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

On the subject of type sizes few will altogether agree with the suggestion that the minimum size should be 14-point. Eyesight, the determining factor in reading, varies so enormously that the matter cannot be dealt with in so arbitrary a fashion. One reader might find even 14-point too small, whilst another might pine for the close-packed pages of the Elzevir press. Nor will the author's plea for the total abolition of the italic type be welcomed. True, this type rarely appears nowadays beyond the pages of "preliminary" matter, but we should not like to see it thrust from thence. Dating from the days of Aldus, the type has a fine pedigree and, we think, has earned a permanent place in our typographical life. Furthermore is the suggestion quite in accord with the author's plea for the retention of the thirteenth and fourteenth century type patterns?

Nearly all collectors will disagree with Mr. Whitehouse's definition of uncut pages as "ridiculous affectation." As a matter of fact we think Mr. Whitehouse has not quite got the definition right himself. What he calls "uncut" the collector (and book dealer) calls "unopened." The former expression being reserved for books that have never known the printer's plough, while the latter term is self-explanatory. Even though the love of the uncut page cannot perhaps be logically explained, it is a very definite feeling and has been acknowledged by such bookmen as Andrew Lang and Austin Dobson.

The suggestion for more use of the woodcut as an illustrative medium is both sound and timely. Nothing goes so well with the printed page, and its use allows us to rid ourselves of the "art" paper bugbear. Although few of us expect another Bewick to appear in our midst, there is a capable woodcut school to-day, and the beauty of some modern cutting can be seen from recent publications such as "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" or "Precious Bane," which are wholly illustrated in this manner.

Space will not allow us to deal with all the points Mr. Whitehouse raises, but we must heartily commend one suggestion—a suggestion that the author has also carried into practice. In the back cover of the book the reader will find two loosely inserted printed slips. One is a brief description of the book under the author heading, whilst the other contains the same information but under the subject. The utility of the arrangement is obvious. The reader extracts these slips, and by pasting them in a book (or on a card) is able to prepare a complete and legible catalogue of his library.

No bookman's shelves should be too full to include a copy of this well written and long overdue book.

THE FABLES OF T. F. POWYS.*

If duels have not been fought, nor friendships broken, in controversy over the writings of T. F. Powys, that is simply because this is not an age of duels, nor one which takes its art very seriously. It is certainly not because Mr. Powys has not merited such furious partisanship.

Critics, it is true, have taken sides for and against him, with no half-heartedness; but even they, of late, seem to have wearied in the battle. The fight reached its climax with the publication, some years ago now, of "Mr. Tasker's Gods." Here, said some, was a writer at last who had the courage to paint the country-side as it really is. Here, said others, was a writer who perversely prostituted his genius (for that he had genius both camps admitted) by a foolish concentration on mud and blood and lust. As a matter of fact, neither view was very astute. Country air is not all tainted with a miasma of immorality; nor was Mr. Powys perversely concentrating upon the painting of such a so-called "realist" picture. He was merely, like any other sensitive and sincere artist, groping his way towards the light. And if he did seem to concentrate upon a rather earthy aspect of things, that was because he intuitively knew that art, if it is going to flower among the stars, must have its roots deeply and firmly embedded in the earth.

Mr. Powys is, paradoxical as it may sound to some ears, a mystic. Remote as he may seem from the Crashaws, the Herberts, and the Trehernes of our literature, he is nevertheless decidedly in their train. The difference is mainly that he, being born in the twentieth century and not in the seventeenth, objectifies his mysticism in a different way. Their deity wore something of the aspect of biblical times; his comes to visit the earth in a Ford car.

"Mr. Tasker's Gods" was after all an experimental piece of fiction; before pronouncing their verdict his critics should have waited to see what the next book, and the next, would be like. They would have seen, in "Mockery Gap" and "Innocent Birds," a slow releasing from the old obsession and a growth towards a kind of mystical fantasy. Then, in the next book, "Mr. Weston's Good Wine," they would have seen that fantasy marvellously consolidated. The roots were still in the earth all right, but the flowers were now most certainly among the stars. Mr. Powys, as an artist, had found himself.

It was the experience of the present writer, after following Mr. Powys's progress from "Black Bryony" to "Mr. Weston's Good Wine," to come upon his very first book of all, a book written as far back as 1918, and called 'Soliloquies of a Hermit." The text of this illuminating little work was "He that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also." And the quaint mixture of Paganism and Christianity that was its key-note has been the key-note of all the work he has ever written since. Mr. Powys has always been something of a pagan at heart—but a mystical pagan. All his writings since those "Soliloquies" have been an attempt to "square" the Pagan and the Christian in him—or, if you will, to find the highest common denominator between ancient Greece and modern Dorsetshire.

Such a writer was not likely to devote his energies and genius entirely to fiction. He began with a religious tract (for the "Soliloquies," despite their whimsical nature, are that), and now, at the height of his powers, he has essayed the oldest and finest of all forms adopted by the truth-tellers (the sooth-sayers) of all time, i.e. the parable—or, as he calls it, the fable. (And, with Mr. Powys, the two are practically synonymous.)

The present volume, "Fables," consists of about a score of stories mirroring a far deeper and subtler meaning than lies on their surface. Here Mr. Powys's pagan and fantasy-loving mysticism finds its best expression yet. The "lessons" are in most cases very far from obvious; but they are often all the more revealing for that. If the last test of success in fable-telling were clarity of objectification, then we fear Mr. Powys would come a long way behind La Fontaine. But the fable, like all other forms of art, grows and changes with the centuries. Mr. Powys is no imitator of anything. True, he makes pots and pans, tree and leaf, dog and rabbit, bucket and spittoon, wave and candle hold conversation one with another; but the things they tell are far from being in the convention of such strange conversations. The one thing indeed that is classical about these "fables" is the style in which they are written: it is no exaggeration whatever to say that at times it has the purity and the dignity and the beauty of the prose of John Bunyan. And strange and untoward as these stories sometimes are, set in good (if a little soggy) Dorset soil, all alike seek some answer to the eternal enigma of truth, and all alike find some sort of answer—however fragmentary and however brief They represent, so far, some of Mr. Powys's best work and their appeal (when, as we hope will soon be the case, they are published in a cheaper edition) should be constant, if not yet wide.

C. HENRY WARREN.

MONTAIGNE AND SANCHO PANZA.*

In this provocative and characteristically elusive essay, for the format of which warm praise is due to the publishers, M. André Gide tells us that what he enjoys contemplating in Montaigne's company is "the veritable human being, that naïve, sincere creature he is bent on bringing to light." He sees in him anticipations of both Dostoievsky and Freud, a challenge in advance to Proust, a wisdom closer to the pagan wisdom of Goethe than to the Utopianism of Rousseau. He is persuaded, heart and soul, that if Montaigne were to return to earth to-day he would alienate both Peter and Paul, seem to give his adherence to every cause and anger them each in turn. The central theme of the essay is the sincerity or otherwise of Montaigne's Catholicism. Was he after all the first of those Catholics who are not Christians—a representative sceptic?

Scepticism, says M. Gide, is neither the attractive force of Montaigne's Essays nor the primary teaching to be found therein. True. But M. Gide never travels far from the problem. Montaigne lived and died, to all appearance, a Catholic; spoke ever with reverence of the Scriptures and the Church; had a private chapel in his tower; was accustomed to daily prayer, and attended Mass regularly when in Rome. Was all this merely outward observance? We have to remember the wars of religion waging in his time, that while he taught toleration and moderation he hated the Reformers for bringing disorder to the country, and liked Catholicism because it was shapely and old. But where in the Essays, in their original state or as emended by him, he says anything that might be taken as a declaration of faith, writes "stuff whereon to build cathedrals," it is suggested that he was but setting up lightning conductors to save himself from the fate of men like Dolet and Servetus and to "ensure the safe passage of his goods to our hands." Did he not write: "My reason is not framed to bend or stoop; my knees are"? Is his doubt the doubt of reason? Are those seeming expressions of piety the prudence of expediency? Had he more in common with Pyrrhon and Lucretius than with St. Paul and the Gospels? Pascal, Port Royal, Sainte-Beuve and the Holy See, which retains the Essays on the Index, were convinced of his heresy. M. Gide agrees with them, also that "too many of Montaigne's commentators have busied themselves with supplying buttons to his foils," till he is at the point of laying down the pen. Then, in a reference to the death-bed scene and the contention that Montaigne "made a most Christian end," he says: "It may have been. I would admit it more readily if his wife had not been there. . . . Let it be as you wish." Why not Que sçais-je?

The problem remains open. Of Montaigne as of Shakespeare it may be said: "Others abide our question. Thou art free." Even the erudite Dr. Armaingaud's emphatic repudiation of Montaigne as a believer leaves loopholes for doubt. There may be irrational as well as rational truth. Despite his apparent contradictions, Montaigne's common sense is constant. Lecky never made a greater mistake than when he spoke of it as "somewhat superficial." And this brings one to a striking passage toward the close of M. Gide's essay in which he declares it a thousand pities Montaigne died without having been able to read Don Quixote:

> "The book was written for him. It resembles him to such a degree that I should be surprised if this had not already been remarked on by others. But it is the characteristic of this great work (I mean that of Cervantes) that it is played out in each one of us, and in no one more fully than in Montaigne. It was at the expense of Don Quixote that, little by little, Sancho Panza came to great stature in him."

Over and above the good-humoured wisdom of a Sancho Panza however, M. Gide is careful to remind us, there are in the Essays glimpses of the most exquisite truths.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

By Dr. W. S. Crockett.

SIR WALTER SCOTT has had many biographies, all more or less based on Lockhart's great Life of his father-in-law, which must remain the ultimate interpretation. One fairly comprehensive biography was penned before that of Lockhart, and there are some things in it which Lockhart must have utilised. But afterwards there is no account of Scott but has been indebted to Lockhart's opulent quarry. That to be sure was inevitable, since the son-in-law not only knew Scott with an almost perfectly intimate fidelity, but he had access to all Scott's papers, as well as to scores of people in and out of Scott's immediate circle who could furnish him with a wealth of first-hand information. This is not to say that Lockhart knew everything, for there are things in his biography which are manifest mistakes; suggestions too which are unfounded. Since it was written much new matter has come to light, and if Lockhart were in the flesh to-day he would recast not a few passages and revise some of his opinions. Yet his "Scott," so long one of the classic biographies, in spite of what others have written and may continue to write about Sir Walter, cannot be superseded. It is capable of considerable annotation (in course of time this may be done, and better now than later), otherwise it is the crown of all the literature that has been assembled (in Stevenson's happy phrase) around "the King of the Romantics."

Sir Walter Scott in his study at Abbotsford.
Sir William Allan, pinxit. National Portrait Gallery.
From "The Life of Sir Walter Scott" By Stephen Gwynn (Thornton Butterworth).

I do not remember to have come across anything very definite from an Irish pen on Sir Walter, and certainly no biography of him. This volume[1] however sets forth in solid, masterly, always interesting and quietly sympathetic fashion, the wonderful story from an Irishman's point of view. Mr. Gwynn of course confesses his obligation to Lockhart, and he follows that trail blazed almost a century ago. Nevertheless in another way he has equipped himself with care and precision for his task. That is to say he has not only tackled the theme from a mere bookman's angle in the sense of an exhaustive, perhaps even voracious "reading up" for it. He has also walked in the veritable steps of Scott, rambling through Scott's own pleasant country, taking stock of things there—always necessary for a true elucidation of what the romancist was as a man, a laird, a master, a host, a public servant, facile princeps among Scottish Borderers, a perfervid Northerner with whom love for his native land was ever in the ascendant. Mr. Gwynn has lived by the Tweed and the Jed, by the Eildons and the Cheviots, by Abbotsford and Edinburgh. Thus surely has he come to imbibe the true spirit of those scenes amidst which the young Scott revelled, the landscapes which filled his later life with a never diminishing fascination. The result is this excellently conceived biography, written as Scott himself would have liked it, and no higher attestation is possible.

Mr. Gwynn, it is true, does not tell us anything actually new as to the career of Scott. He does not make digressions regarding the genesis of the novels, or expiscatory remarks on the originals of their "characters."

Walter Scott
(Father of Sir Walter Scott).
From a painting at Abbotsford.

He criticises, however, and among other things he suggests that but for his lameness Scott would never have taken to literature. The army would have claimed him. This is perfectly true, and Scott says so himself. It was his delicate constitution which sent him to Sandyknowe, where even as a child a love of literature took hold of his germinating mind. He was a bookman from the beginning—that beginning which assumed shape at Smailholm (following Andrew Lang, Mr. Gwynn persistently and wrongly spells this name with a final e, which it never possessed). As a soldier, however, Scott might have indulged in literary studies, for suppose Edinburgh had claimed all his boyhood he would still have been bookish, more or less. But he would not have been "the author of 'Waverley.'" He would beyond doubt have won his spurs in another field. He might have been one of Wellington's lieutenants. His lameness was a more fortunate affair. If it deprived militarism of a born leader, it gave to the world one of its proudest achievements through the victories of peace. Most certainly, as I am persuaded, it was the peat-fires of Sandyknowe, and the unsophisticated personality of the "cow-bailie" with his stock of legends and fairy stories, which created the immortal romancist.

A room in Abbotsford, 1832.

The curious thing is, as Mr. Gwynn reminds us, that in all such victories Scott never thought of himself as a victor in the sense in which his countrymen accepted him. He stood in the front rank, but he hardly realised his own genius, indeed he rather disparaged the notion of being a genius. He thought little of his poetry, and the superlative success of the Waverleys surprised him. Mr. Gwynn does not (could not) plead for Scott in the matter of a graceful literary artistry. He was not an artist as Stevenson was, or Hardy. He made many mistakes. He wrote often uncouth, disjointed, execrable, despairing sentences. Yet whoever told a story like him? And after all it is the story that tells. For one who understands and appreciates style, there are ninety-nine who do not, but all are yet led captive by a well-told tale, and all understand Scott. He has something for all; and none can read him without betterment. Mr. Gwynn has much of excellent and generous discrimination to make about the novels, and he has a just perception about the poems also. Altogether he has given us a charming volume—after Lockhart much the best of numerous Scott biographies. It appears at an Entrance Porch, Abbotsford.

Abbotsford.

opportune time, in view of the centenary of Scott's death in 1932. And it should fulfil a fine service in helping to bring Sir Walter to his own again.

Mr. Gwynn does not enter into the mystery of Scott's early love affair. But was there mystery? Nothing save what has happened a thousand times over. Scott loved—and lost! He loved with an extraordinary passionate devotion one of the most eligible partis of his time. And he conceived he had a good chance for her hand. Somehow—we do not know how—she preferred another—the rich suitor, afterwards Sir William Forbes, the eminent banker, himself a close comrade of Scott.

Sir Walter Scott, Bart.

(By Sir John Watson Gordon).

From "Sir Walter Scott's Congé." By Hon. Lord Sands (A. & C. Black).

Lord Sands has given to this subject a very careful study,[2] and amongst much else of deep and absorbing interest he prints a couple of letters rescued from the unhappy destruction of Will Erskine's correspondence, which throw considerable fresh light on the movements of Scott at the hour of his rejection and the manner in which it may have come about. Lockhart, it may be said, is in serious error over this. The book is an instructive little essay on a matter which gravely exercised Scott, more than anything else in his younger years—a disappointment which cut so deeply into his life and remained a bitter recollection to the last.

I have had the privilege of perusing something of what promises to be the most important Scott publication within recent years. Readers of the Daily Express have already seen portions, in the series appearing in its pages. This is the "Private Letter-Books of Sir Walter Scott," edited by Mr. Wilfred Partington, with a Foreword by Mr. Hugh Walpole. The volumes will be published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton during this month, and until they are available for me to review them in the next issue of the BOOKMAN I can give no more than a few general particulars here.

It is to Mr. Walpole that the books are owing. Himself an enthusiastic Scott-lover, and owner of other precious manuscripts of Sir Walter (among them the autograph of "St. Ronan's Well"), Mr. Walpole purchased this extensive collection at Sotheby's several years since. He thus patriotically saved it for his own country, otherwise it would certainly have crossed the Atlantic. All Scott-lovers are infinitely obligated to Mr. Walpole for such a gallant and generous service, the more so as most, if not all, of the collection he proposes to hand over to the National Library of Scotland, surely one of the noblest gifts it has yet received.

Sir Walter preserved all letters he considered worthy of filing. They number close on 6,000. He bound them together in three-and-twenty large volumes, and these having remained at Abbotsford for over ninety years, were sold by instructions of his successor there. Scott would refer to them on occasion, and they were used, to some extent, by Lockhart in his preparation of the Life. Not all however were utilised, and even of those used, only portions, often mere fragments, were printed. They were addressed to Scott by correspondents in all parts of the country, and came from all ranks and classes—from royalty to hero-worshipping schoolboys and bookish working-men, and from people of all shades of opinion—those who agreed with Scott or those who differed. Many of these letters are concerned with literary and historical subjects; others deal with political and public questions, with points of biography and genealogy, incidents of travel, expiscations of antiquarian and local lore, family gossip, society scandals, the general news of the day—in short, with almost everything under the sun. Some are Scott's replies to his correspondents; some came from his children; from Lockhart, and from the troops of friends always welcome to the circle at Abbotsford and Edinburgh. All the leading poets of the time are represented—Wordsworth, Southey, Byron, Hogg, Campbell, and scores of others, the lesser as well as the greater known. Scientists, statesmen, soldiers, sailors, artists, divines, down to humble cottage folk, have all a niche in this goodly sanctuary of heart and pen. Probably no more miscellaneous assortment has ever been compiled, and I cannot think of any possessing a more real and universal interest, save perhaps the Letters of Queen Victoria.

Sir Walter Scott.
From a Bust by Chantry, 1820.

In every letter, as the Express readers found, there is something arresting. Everywhere we come across the human touch, the flash of humour, the record of an event related at first-hand by those who took part in it, a naval battle or a duel, an election episode, a literary squabble, a domestic trouble or a personal grievance. Not a few are apropos the Waverley romances, in commendation, criticism, remonstrance. In this remarkable series we live in the light of a century ago. We see people as they existed then, toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing, their pleasantries and gaieties, their foibles and idiosyncrasies, loves and hates, madnesses and follies, losses and tears. All the round of the ordinary and of the extraordinary reveals itself here. Not to have preserved this singularly illuminating correspondence would have meant an irretrievable loss of distinctively valuable details not only of everyday life, but of the wider affairs of men and nations. We should be grateful to Scott for the meticulous care bestowed on those voluminous records; for his foresight, unconscious no doubt, since one scarcely imagines that he ever dreamt of their being served up to a future age in such appetising fashion. The volume cannot be other than a feast for mind and heart, for the lover of history and the lover of men. Most of all is it another splendid cairn to the memory of the good Sir Walter, greatest of Scots, most beloved of all figures in the story of his race. I anticipate for the "Letter-Books" a phenomenal circulation both at home and abroad. It is but just and fair, as well as a mark of gratitude to Mr. Walpole, that such should be the case.

BYRON.*

By Wilfrid Gibson.

It is curious to reflect that, just because a man should have had the faculty of writing verse a hundred odd years ago, every detail of his life and of the lives of those who had the fortune, good or ill, to get tangled in the web of it, should become matters of absorbing interest to succeeding generations. Had Byron been merely a profligate peer, how little we should have known, or cared to know, of his rake's progress through society; yet because he wrote immortal verse (for it would seem that verse may achieve immortality without being great or even good poetry), it is improbable that the scandal of his brief but hectic story will ever be allowed to drop into oblivion. There will always be a writer eager to dig up the bones and polish them with his wit; to articulate the skeleton and set it once more dancing for our delectation. M. André Maurois, the author of "Ariel," a novelistic sketch of the life of Shelley, was pretty certain to turn his hand to the task sooner or later, and to do it as well as it could be done. Of course as regards his "Byron," most of the spadework had already been done by his predecessors; and his job on this occasion has been that of reassembling the parts. As one would expect from a workman of M. Maurois's dexterity, the work has been done very neatly; and the french polishing is of the very best. To my mind it is rather a grisly business, this exhibition of Byron jigging it among his innumerable mistresses, but I cannot but acknowledge the art of the showman. A critical examination of Byron's verse would be quite a different matter; but M. Maurois only turns his attention to the verse momentarily when he can quote a passage that will illuminate the actions of his hero, or perhaps I ought to say rather, protagonist; for no man is a hero to his biographer nowadays.

"Mad, bad and dangerous to know!" wrote Lady Caroline Lamb in her diary on the evening of the day she fell in love with Byron at first sight; and in this summary characterisation she undoubtedly told the truth, though by no manner of means the whole truth. Byron may not, at any period of his life, have been certifiably insane, but so monstrous and inhuman an egotism as his almost amounted to insanity, and it might at any moment have thrust him over the border. Bad he certainly was, if the word has any meaning in these days, because he was not only weak but also cruel and treacherous in his dealings with others. And dangerous! well, it is always dangerous to encounter a comet in its flight! However, fortunately that is not the whole story. Byron was by no means merely a brutal and callous libertine. One might for example write him down as a shy and over-sensitive, but abstemious and hard-working poet; and this estimate of him would be just as true in its particulars and as false in its general effect as Lady Caroline's summary verdict. For his times Byron was, as regards the pleasures of the table, a singularly abstemious man; and on occasion his hosts found him as embarrassing as they would have found Bernard Shaw himself; while as an author, for all his pose of the aristocratic amateur, he must have worked very hard indeed to turn out such a volume of accomplished verse. And as for shyness and over-sensitiveness—surely it was the exasperation of nervousness that drove him to commit some of his worst blunders and spurred him on to acts of criminal cruelty! Every man is a bundle of contradictions; but the character of Byron would seem to have been more complex than most, or at least its diversities were more dramatically opposed, and their conflict was not only exhibited to the eyes of his contemporaries in his rash and melodramatic actions for having an almost fatally fluent gift of metrical expression, Byron seemed impelled to inscribe a faithful if somewhat rhetorical record of the fluctuations of his passions for all the world to read; in the drama of his life he was protagonist and chorus as well. His ancestors being such as they were, on both sides, he could hardly, if heredity counts for anything, have escaped being "mad and bad"; and his actions were at all events no worse than those of his forefathers; but just because he had that turn for sentimentalising and romanticising them in verse, somehow they seem to us even more despicable, now that the specious gilding which dazzled his contemporaries is beginning to wear thin. Byron's poems are almost always a dramatisation of his own experiences, and the real name of his heroes, or rather hero-villains, is Byron—Byron as he was or Byron as he would like to be thought to be. And surely enough, by incessantly playing a part in the theatre of his own mind, he was able to humbug himself, as he certainly humbugged most of his contemporaries, into a belief that his was an essentially noble character, and he himself a Titan struggling in the toils of an implacable destiny. Humbugged?—assuredly; for Byron, who was always railing against hypocrisy in others, was himself the prince of humbugs. As M. Maurois truly says in one passage: "Byron had wished to storm the mist-wreathed hill-tops where sat British Conventions. But no man can attack unscathed the gods in whom he secretly believes. . . ." By "conventions," I take it, M. Maurois means the proprieties, and I for my part have not quite enough imagination to picture them perched on a mist-wreathed hill-top! Nevertheless, in spite of an unfortunate image, he manages to convey the truth of the inwardness of Byron's revolt. But even more needs saying about the matter. Byron, while attacking the British conventions of propriety, accepted readily enough the equally British conventions of the Georgian rakes and the Holland House circle. In struggling to escape the clutches of Mrs. Grundy he fell into the arms of Lady Melbourne. Well, tastes differ—but would not a really great rebel have kept himself clear of either lady? Still the worst of it was that, in making his choice, he affected to pretend to think that all men were at heart as vicious as himself, and that it was only their hypocrisy that prevented them from acknowledging, nay, glorying in their vices. But this simply was not true of the men of his or any other time. I know that, in pointing out the fundamental falsity of the Byronic attitude, I run the risk of being charged with what Continental critics, especially the fellow-countrymen of Tartuffe, are pleased to call British hypocrisy. Just because an Englishman declines to admit that Byron and Oscar Wilde in their personal relationships behaved like normal human beings, it seems that he in the eyes of foreign critics must bear the stigma of insincerity. Yet in the days of Byron, as in the day of Wilde, there were undoubtedly men, aye, and men of genius too, living lives of a crystal integrity. Surely this is not a matter of pitting one nation against another; neither vice nor hypocrisy is the prerogative of any one country. Byron was undoubtedly a rebel, when any convention threatened to prevent him from doing just what he liked; but his values were all wrong and were as false as the falsest of the conventions he rebelled against; for he saw life only through the distorting glass of his own egotism. Even when his friends died, he did not so much seem to grieve for them as to resent the injury they had done to him in dying and leaving him to get along without them. And as for the living, his path was strewn with victims—victims, it must be said, for the most part of their own folly as well as of Byron's ruthlessness. The dear gazelles of the poet's love who died were indeed the lucky ones!

And yet when all is said—as if all ever could be said!—Byron was a man of genius, and a man capable at moments of acts of a singular nobility. Heredity and environment did their worst with him and came nigh to turning him into a devil; and he was in truth the fallen angel that he liked to imagine himself. But even though in the conduct of his life he fell short of the most ordinary standards of human decency, "at least he died at Missolonghi"! His expedition to

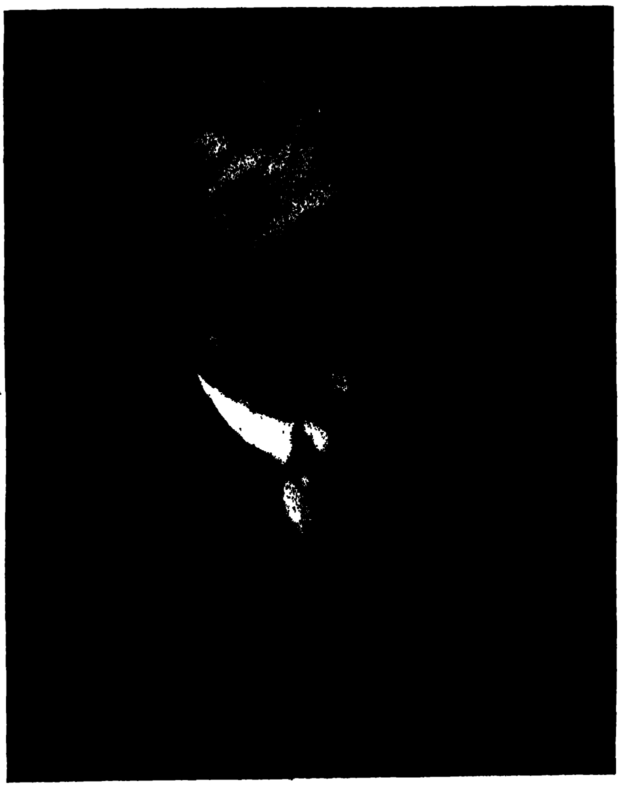
("THE HEART OF MIDLOTHIAN.")



Greece may have begun as an heroic gesture; yet when the trappings fell from his shoulders, and he realised the naked realities of the atrocious and tragically ridiculous situation in which he found himself, the prey of sordid schemers and bloodsuckers of the vilest description, he did not desert his post. Only a man who had some element of greatness in his soul could have behaved so decently and with such patient courage in all the mess and muddle of that comic-opera campaign. On that occasion at least he was clear-sighted enough to realise that he had rashly allied himself with a rabble of incompetent fools and charlatans; and yet he did not leave them to their fate, but carried on to the end. He carried on even when the cause seemed to him to be hopeless, and when the Greeks, for whom he was losing all, seemed hardly worth the sacrifice; and in dying he won everything. His death—the death of a poet in the cause of freedom—fired the imagination of his hesitating countrymen; and from that moment the liberation of Greece was assured. It was not given to Byron to fall on the field of glory, yet the field was made glorious by his fall.

And the poet? Well, this sonorous, fluent and rather superficial verse may not mean very much to us at the moment—Byron said himself that his gift was rhetorical rather than poetical; and yet it is well to remember, among our complacent chirpings and twitterings, that the voice of Byron was once the voice of Europe. And even if we cannot respond to the theatrical rhodomontade of "Childe Harold" any more than, in certain moods, the author himself could, where is the satirist of this very knowing and cynical generation who can hold up a candle to the sustained brilliance of "Don Juan"?

FROUDE AND CARLYLE.*

BY GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

IT is to be feared that, if not an actual majority, a large proportion of people who see Professor Dunn's title will cry or mutter, according to their temperament, "What! that come up again?" It is at any rate certain that not a few—including perhaps some not ill-qualified—have hoped that the question had been relegated to the company of the Man in the Iron Mask and the Letters of Junius. But it has not been so; and this book had not been published more than a score or so of hours when that question showed its remarkable but not exactly delightful power of setting folk by the ears. The present writer—a Carlylean of seventy years standing (he had the luck to be initiated early); a devotee for fifty of that Princess of Dulcamaras, Jane Welsh Carlyle; and in several ways an admirer of Mr. Froude's—has been set to work, not by his ears, on it. He thinks that not the least profitable and certainly not the unsafest way of dealing with it will be to start with a short account, in the old and recently revived dramatis personæ style, of how the three characters mainly involved appear to him as a result of the seventy years study of the chief of them and of the fifty "keeping up," as far as a man may keep up and live, with the squabbles over all three.

National Portrait Gallery. Carlyle (1877).
From the painting by G. F. Watts.

CARLYLE, THOMAS.—One of the greatest men of letters, not merely of England in the nineteenth century; not merely of all English literature at large; but of all the world and all time. But also what the Greeks, with their unmatched faculty of suiting sound to sense, called a σφόδρα μελαγχολικός—a man utterly under the sway of that Goddess more dread than any Fury and most dread of all the instruments of Fate—Melancholy: and somewhat unfortunate, not in his actual upbringing itself but in the suitableness of that upbringing to his future society and occupations. Afflicted with curious patches of mental blindness as to some things in books and life; but not seriously damaged as to his vision and his creation in others. Not likely to be a happy man and only too likely to make others unhappy, without the slightest intention of doing so or indeed clear perception of having done it.

CARLYLE, JANE WELSH.—A woman of extraordinary talent and quality but, as indicated above, deeply imbued with that "bittersweetness" which infuses a superstrength into the sweetness and the bitterness themselves. One of the cleverest—in more than one or two senses of that slippery and rather awkward word—of her sex Likely to be either very much liked or very much disliked by her own. As for the other it would appear that they not infrequently seemed to feel, as a beautiful phrase in another story has it, "a mission to kiss her"—though she was not exactly pretty—and that, as no doubt men should do with missions, they sometimes carried it out.

Froude, James Anthony.—A person whom to judge requires some judicial faculty. His actual conduct in first joining and then leaving the " Oxford Movement " is a matter for God and himself. But it is an unlucky truth that the two little books he wrote at this period show bad taste and bad writing. He afterwards became, though with some irregularity and variation, one of the very best writers of English prose in his time. For beauty of style and thought the well known " Bells " passage, though some advertise their critical quality by decrying it ; for dry savour " The Cat's Pilgrimage " are of the absolute first class. But on these sides he was unequal, and though the sort of Hetz which pursued him as an historian was excessive and unfair, he was inaccurate. It was a strange sort of inaccuracy, for it would occasionally make him spoil evidence on his own side : but it certainly existed, and it is exceedingly unwise of his partisans to deny it. Admission could do him no or very little harm except in the eyes of people who think it important in such a matter as this to be accurate in deciding whether there were on a certain day two horses in a stable or only one. It might be of course in a question of horse-stealing : but the questions involved here are not of that kind.

To which one might add several things such as a splendid and not very common patriotism which is not here very relevant : and an unlucky kind of thoughtlessness and slapdash of which the incident recorded here, when Sir James Stephen's good advice saved him from his own folly, is a striking example ; but on the other hand a gift of conception and production of historical incident and character, accurate or inaccurate, which has seldom been matched.

Well : take three characters like these ; add that the first charges the third to be his literary executor and for many years gives him miscellaneous and, it would seem, sometimes contradictory instructions about the matter ; and then (if you have a fairly lively faculty of imagination in a good sense) imagine what is likely to happen. If you wisely obey that counsel of "Wait and See " the original authorship of which is disputed, you will certainly admit that what has happened—half a century of squabble included—was not so very unlikely. " What, however," the reader will quite properly say, " do you think of the book which is actually before you ? " Well nowadays the " jackets " of books seem to think that they ought to do the thinking. This one tells us that the book " attempts to give a complete survey of the Froude-Carlyle controversy." The most cheerful thing about this is that it suggests a controversy between Froude and Carlyle himself, which would have been fun. The jacket further opines that the book's verdict " runs counter to that recorded in almost all histories of English literature "—a statement with which we cannot agree—and that it " restores confidence in Froude's biography."

Undoubtedly Professor Dunn has given a good deal of documentary text, and has discussed some points of it at great length. If anybody wants fourteen pages on the physical adequacy of Mr. Carlyle for one of the tasks which he undertook in life, there they are, showing that the evidence on neither side of this momentous question would convict either the traditional " lodging-house cat " or that cat's owner. It sometimes seems as if our author wished to antedate and antidote the effect of Mr. David Wilson's very remarkable thesaurus (" medley " Mr. Dunn calls it), which, though far from faultless, will do future students much good and can do none of them, if he has any brains of his own, much harm. It was no doubt a mistake of Mr. Wilson, as Mr. Dunn quotes him here, to call Froude " foolish," but only a greater fool than one usually meets would think Froude a fool because the adjective is applied to him.

That anybody should want to write—still more that any other body should want to read—such matter as this is truly wonderful. There is stuff of the first quality to read in the published work from " Sartor " to " Frederick." There are letters of the very first quality—in Mrs. Carlyle's case especially—to reinforce this older publication. And with all this at hand people busy themselves with Dick, Tom and Harry's interpretation of it ; with Dick's abuse of Tom and Tom's contempt for Harry ; and with discussions of the exact value to be attached to Mrs. Carlyle's extremely laconic entry in her diary that on a certain day there were " two blue marks on her wrist " ! Now the wisest as well as the most comfortable way of taking this would be to remember not the least delightful passage of Sir Walter's, where my lord Lindsay of the Byres produces a similar effect on Queen Mary's arm and excuses himself by alleging the unfair sensitiveness of feminine flesh. Some, on the other hand, of the Froude-Carlyle folk, would take it for a text to show that Carlyle was always beating his wife : and some others for one to prove that Froude (a) invented it (b) had no business to tell such things whether he told this or not, etc. And it is all such utter " waste of labour, and [not " light " as the poet has it, but] heavy-minded folly."

There will still be books about the subject of course : and perhaps some day some person of genius will get hold of it. He will talk mainly if not quite wholly about the Carlyles themselves ; he may have to say something about Froude. But about the " Froude-Carlyle controversy " he will say as little as possible, though he may make that little as strong as his genius will let him.

PIECRUST.

By Daisy Fisher. 7s. 6d. net. (John Murray.)

It all began with Camilla forsaking " the boy with the glowing, mocking eyes " for the Fat Man who had a " woollen voice " and a " flannelette voice." And the boy, Hayward, being only twenty-one and a poet, turned with loathing from Camilla, who later sought her revenge. But Hayward by that time had invaded the enclosure of the Lavender family—to the joy of Sir Richard Lavender and the horror of his mother. Old Lady Lavender and her daughter Anne could not exclude Hayward from the house, and that high-spirited and temperamental young man had his way. That he did not marry Rose was fortunate and there is every reason to hope that with Stephanie and her baby to " keep him good " Hayward will march prospering, and become a successful writer. A lively and entertaining piece of work is this tale of broken promises.

WHAT GREAT-GREAT-GRANDMOTHER USED TO READ.

By A. ERMATINGER FRASER.

A FAT old book—very worn as to the brown leather back and the dingy marbled sides, very yellowed as to pages—The Lady's Magazine, or Entertaining Companion for the Fair Sex, for the Year 1780; so far as appearances go, faded and forlorn-looking, if compared with any of the numerous Journals, Companions, Monthlies,. richly illustrated and beautifully printed, that at present offer themselves for woman's especial consumption. Yet, contrasting this literary fare, feature by feature, the " fair sex " of 1780 manage to hold their own tolerably well.

The wood-engraving by Dighton, which makes " the Superb and Elegant Frontispiece," shows the " flapper " of that generation at the cross-roads between an ultra-fashionable Folly trying to entice her away to the haunts of Extravagance and Gaming, and a modish and sprightly Minerva who is gently inducing her towards the temple of Wisdom. Fourteen such plates are included in the volume, each a fine piece of craftsmanship. One depicts Ella, King of Northumbria in the ninth century, who was evidently a man of rapid action, as he has eloped with a fair lady, slain his rival, and is now kneeling to claim the parental blessing of the bride's father. With delightful naiveté, the artist has clothed his Early Saxon hero in the doublet and hose, ruff and slashed shoes of Queen Elizabeth's day!

Frontispiece to " The Lady's Magazine " for 1780.

According to the index, each number was originally equipped with folding fancy-work patterns —" An elegant sprig for working a Gown," " Fashionable Apron to be worked in catgut," " Neat and elegant designs for Watchpapers," etc. etc. But these have all been taken out, evidently for use by the owner, almost a century and a half ago. This earliest mistress of the book, " Miss Isabella," employs her family arms, correctly placed in a lozenge, as a book-plate; she has copied out on the fly-leaves in a small sloping Italian hand the twenty-four stanzas of Mallet's doleful ballad, " Edwin and Emma "; and passages in the essays, " Rules to Make the Connubial State Happy " and " Essential Requisites in the Choice of a Husband," have been deeply pencilled and underscored. Let us hope reality turned out not too far astray from the sentimental dreamer's wishes.

Each number still includes, folded in, a piece of sheet-music, newly composed by Hudson, or Hawkins, the two most noted musicians of that day in London: " Sophia! Name forever dear! " " The Blushing Rose," " Wake! gentle Sylvia! "—sweet, tinkling, tuneful melodies " set for harpsichord or ' guittarr '."

One advertisement appears, and various readers write in high dudgeon about the wretched commercial effect it gave to a magazine otherwise suited for the drawing rooms of "quality." The editor apologises profusely for the oversight which had caused such a signal breach of good taste, and meekly adds that the obnoxious notice was only placed on a small portion of the flyleaf and might easily be removed.

In fact, the prefatory page, " To our Correspondents," is, quite unintentionally, rather entertaining to modern readers. G. Robinson, the editor, is assisted by " The Female Coterie," who act as a " Senate of Inspection," to censor any production not eminently befitting the perusal of young persons of gentility. As their identity is unknown, G. Robinson finds it convenient to let them shoulder the responsibility for all rejections. Hence, " The Coterie have decided that the poem, ' Venus Triumphant,' is rather too luxuriantly descriptive to appear in our repository." Considering the outspoken statements which do at times appear, Venus must have been indeed very glowingly delineated!

That icy missive, the printed rejection slip, apparently had not yet been invented. Would-be contributors are thanked profusely, or very gently discouraged. "We are not a little obliged to our ingenious Hester K. for again assuming her pen in our behalf." . . . "We feel deeply grateful to have been once more honored with an essay from Constant Reader." . . . "We make it our ardent study to oblige all our correspondents with the greatest impartiality, and we can only ascribe our seeming neglect in not publishing these valued contributions to our having temporarily mislaid certain manuscripts."

The gentle contributor of the French section is at times urged to diligence: "A further instalment of Henrietta R.'s serial, 'La Vie d'Epaminondas,' would be more agreeable to us than the revenues of Hindostan or the income of the Dewanee. There have been such clamorous complaints from our readers on account of the intermission of her production that, unless a suitable number of pages arrive forthwith, she must excuse us if we snatch the inactive pen from her idle standish, and continue the work ourselves."

Occasionally, however, the editor voices a spirited protest: "The profusion of poetical Enigmas, Acrostics, Rebuses, transmitted to us is so great that we should not be hyperbolical if we were to say that they amount to over a chaldron in measure. Why, then, should this individual be angry with us for not printing his favorite, the child of his own brain? Neither diatribes nor encomiums from persons within the narrow limits of a narrow town can be for a moment supposed to intimidate or seduce us to the least degree of partiality towards him, or any friends of his." This haughty rejoinder goes to a mere man; but an irate member of the "fair sex" receives gentler treatment: "If we have unwittingly offended Ida L. we trust to be forgiven; for a frown is incompatible with beauty. Who can imagine a scowling Venus?"

One may remark that a few honeyed words were certainly due to the valued contributors; for they received nothing else for their literary labours. Perish the thought that any genteel female could so far demean herself as to accept base lucre in exchange for the product of her soul! Nor might a modest young lady, of any breeding whatever, permit her real name to appear in a public print, except on the two occasions of her marriage and her funeral. However, a vulgar proverb remarks, "Fine words butter no parsnips," and the mercenary modern aspirant to literature prefers a cheque to a compliment.

"In the poetical line," as G. Robinson puts it, the supply is very abundant. Each number contains ten or twelve effusions, and the preface bestows honourable mention upon many more. Most of it is extremely sentimental and melancholy; the death of friends or loss of lovers are favourite subjects; also ditties upon pet spaniels and tame birds. There are several poems by Fanny B*ry—Burney, surely, as this magazine was published only two years after "Evelina" had taken London by storm. However, neither her ballad of pensive Alonzo and perfidious Kitty, nor the mournful "Reflections on Miss Nancy, who died of the Smallpox, aged Eighteen," will add particularly to "Fannikin's" laurels. The name Angelica Kfn appears in answer to some of the poetical enigmas. Evidently, as a slight pastime between her usual occupations of painting portraits and pouring conversation into Sir Joshua's ear-trumpet, "Miss Angel" sat herself down to wrestle with something like this:

Fanny Burney (Mdme. D'Arblay).

"Letters five compose my name,
Read backwards, forwards, 'tis the same:
But when twice fifty's from me taken,
There remains a mother's name."
—(Level).

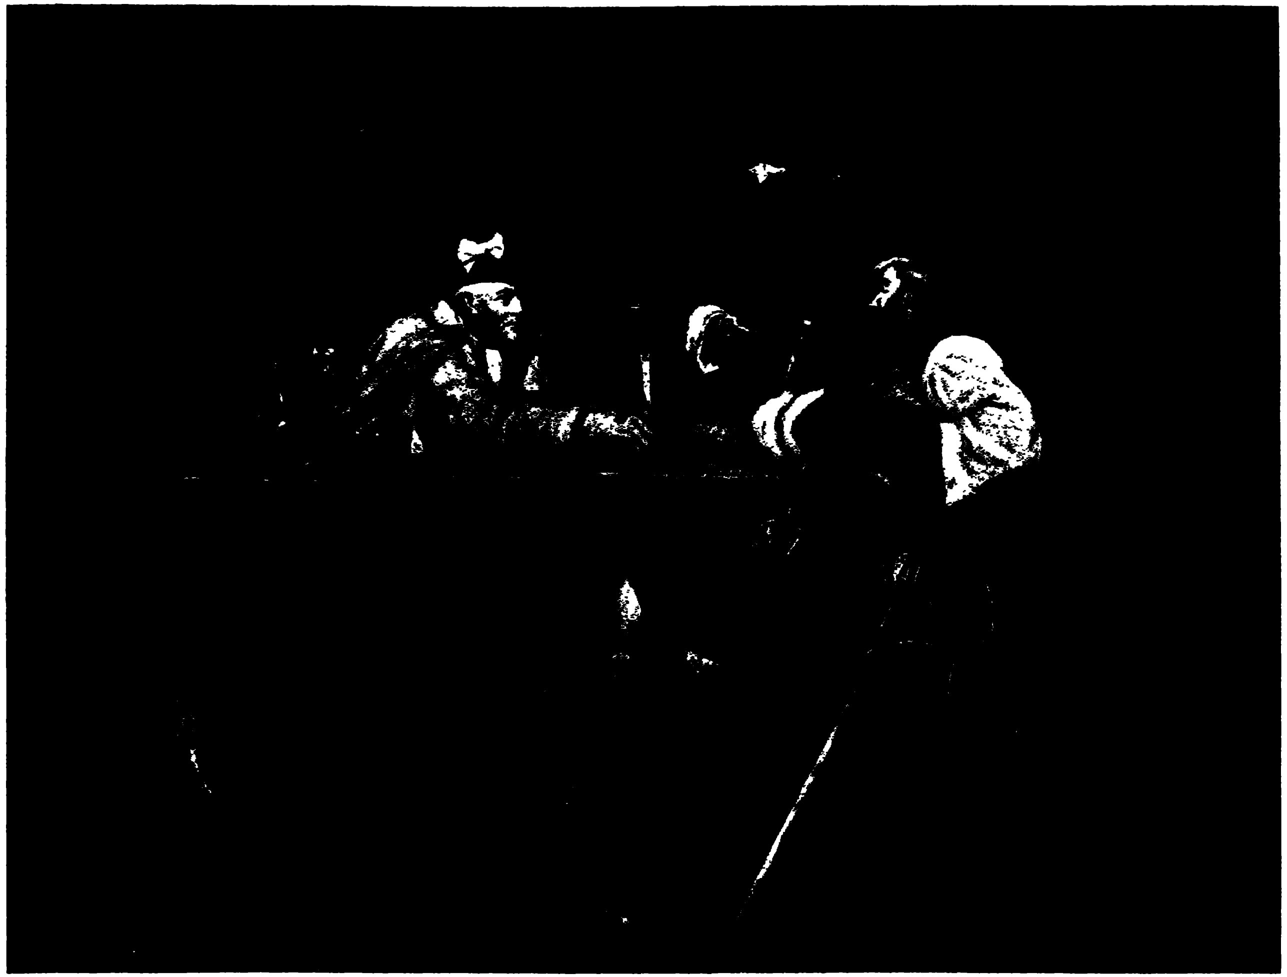
The then poet laureate, William Whitehead, furnishes a few dutiful odes on His Majesty's Birthday, on the birth of a Prince, and on the Great and Glorious Victory off Cape St. Vincent.

When we think of the pièce de résistance of the modern magazine—short stories—it seems odd to notice that here there is none. Occasionally one comes across an anecdote, or the relation of some historic incident; but the great bulk of the fiction is serial in style, and the story is carried on by interminable letter-writing, on the plan of "Pamela" and "Evelina." All the novels turn upon the difficulties and dangers of Beauty in a licentious age; and the moral lessons are instilled with unstinted plainness of speech.



These epistles are sometimes amusing, more often tedious, to a present-day reader; but they shed much light upon the average point of view then in matters moral, social and economic. To employ children three years of age, in winding cotton all day for fourpence hire, is considered highly laudable, since it keeps the offspring of the poor usefully employed. One of the novelettes contrasts the career of "Ella Worthy," who knew her proper station in life, with the "Downfall of Kitty Tasty," who, poor child, although a farmer's daughter, ventured to adorn her white frock with pink ribbons, and persuaded her father to allow her to take music lessons. It is pointed out very plainly that this was a most iniquitous proceeding on Kitty's part, hence nothing but catastrophe could be expected.

Books also, except such learning as should teach them "to order themselves lowly and reverently to all their betters," appear to have been almost taboo for the working-classes. The deplorable result of modern laxity is lamented as bitterly in 1780 as in 1930. Owing to the absurd ideas of mistaken philanthropists, in encouraging the spread of education, "Miss, the taylor's daughter, talks now as familiarly to her confident,

Miss Polly Staytape, of swains and sentiments, as the most accomplished female in fashionable life." Both novels and essays lay great stress on methods of dealing with "the girl of the period." A paper, "On the Peculiar Management of Daughters," indicates that parental perplexity was little less acute in the eighteenth century than in the twentieth. "Mr. Manly" writes indignantly desiring that sensible people combine "to keep down the little saucy female upstarts of this age, who are nuisances wherever they come, by their carriage and their conversation: who are, indeed, so idle and impertinent that they treat men with a supercilious neglect not to be endured."

A number of the novels claim to be written by these abused creatures—girls of seventeen and eighteen. In spite of the "sauciness" with which they are charged, they appear to prefer the most lugubrious style of narrative. "Military Distress" piles every kind of agony upon a wretched officer and his family, and finally leaves him stranded on the coast of Finisterre. (To be continued in our next volume.) "Fatal Effects of Pressing" (no, not about "petting parties"!) recounts the tragedies that have arisen from the occasional over-zealous action of the press-gang in seizing, by mistake, "A young Gentleman of Good Family." Apparently, it mattered not at all how many tragedies arose, if the man were not "of Good Family."

Engraved for the Lady's Magazine

In "The Nuptials Interrupted," the Lady Clarissa is desired by her father, noble in ancient name and equally so in soul, to wed a man of his careful selection; but her mother, "volatile, giddy, and idle, who cared naught for progress in science nor advancement in morality," presents a gay, frivolous, and worldly marquis as a candidate for her daughter's hand. Clarissa listens meekly to each parent in turn, and "makes a bow of filial reverence." The story is "To be Continued in our next Annual Volume," and the reader is left to gaze upon the illustration, and decide for himself with which aspirant the dutiful Clarissa is about to drive to church for the wedding ceremony, and what are the contents of the letter which "interrupts the Nuptials."

The most madly thrilling of the romances has the scene laid in South America. Aza, the hero, at the wildest moment of despair, when fleeing from treacherous Spaniards, or tortured by the thought that the detestable Deterville has snatched from him the enchanting Zilia, can yet always stop to pen a dozen pages after this style to his confidential friend, the noble Peruvian, Kaminhuiscap: "Generous Friend, canst thou conceive the desolation of my soul? My heart is surrounded by the most cruel fury! Zilia, the perfidious Zilia, sighs for my rival! Heavens! Upon whom shall my burning rage first fall? Fatal jealousy! Ah, Kaminhuiscap, a blinding mist of agony obscures the very words I endeavour to trace. . . ." and so on, ad infinitum.

The life-story of Gabrielle D'Estrées, the favourite of Henri Quatre, runs in detail throughout the volume, with occasional asides to remind fair readers that her career is not to be considered worthy of emulation, but merely in the light of a shocking example. The very different story of Joan of Arc is also given, rather quaintly translated from the old French of "John Nagarel, Canon of the Church of Notre Dame at Rouen." He calls her "Joan Taré," a version of the name not usually seen. Rousseau had not yet (in 1780) had his name bracketed with that of Voltaire to spell Anathema in England; and a translation of his "Émile" throughout the greater part of the volume leads to considerable discussion of his views upon education and child-rearing. Many short articles of literary criticism appear dealing with Molière, Racine, Ronsard, Boileau, Marmontel, as well as with Shakespeare, and other English writers.

There are no "Household Hints"—I suppose our ancestresses would have regarded such advice as a reflection upon their personal skill in domestic management. There is only one recipe, but that reappears in several numbers and occasions a vast deal of agitated correspondence. It is upon the best method of making butter sauce, and the keenly-debated point is, whether to rub the flour into the butter before, or after, melting it. Mistress Bessy Bluitt (who seems to have possessed a sense of humour) at last writes, vowing that this point must be settled, that her health cannot stand the nervous strain of uncertainty any longer, and that it is also affecting the welfare of her young infant, since she, the mother, cannot sleep at nights until this question of butter sauce, so vital to the comfort of every family, is authoritatively decided. The "Female Coterie" do not approve of Bessy's strain of ironical trifling; and the Preface says haughtily, "We have received an ungenteel letter from Bessy Bluitt, which we do honour far too much in publishing, and thus acknowledging." There is no more "writ" of Bessy and the butter sauce.

"Beauty Hints" are also at a minimum—only a plea for methods of avoiding redness of hands, and some dissertation on the fashionable degree of powder for complexion and hair.

Though a comparatively small space is devoted to it, the fine art of Dress is not neglected. The Fashion Page comes only twice a year—midwinter and midsummer—but then, such fashions are well worth waiting for! There is always a division into three groups: Full dress, Undress, and the Deshabille. The Full dress paragraph begins at the head, which must be adorned with "a toupée Frenched, five curls down each side, one long braid coiled behind, fastened with a pearl knot; Rubens hats ornamented with a profusion of varigated and white spiral feathers and flowers." The most fashionable robe is "The long Turkish polonaise of rich plain sattin, trimmed with painted wreathes of flowers, edged with blond and crape, full picoteed treble ruffles; large hoops." Satin shoes with brilliant knots or diamond buckles are also required. "The following colours are considered à la mode: Burgundy, pale clay, prune, pearl pink, vive laylock, French grey."

The "Undress" merely appears to necessitate the addition of an apron and a kerchief to give a domestic touch. This costume requires "gowns of gauze, lined with Persian, or gold and silver muslins lined. . . . Pantheon aprons tied up with tassels. . . . Vandyke handkerchiefs round the shoulders, with narrow black ribbon collars buckled about the neck." One may wear "The Italian cap, which is made entirely of crape and fine blond, with flat lappets, which hang very low behind"; or instead, "The hood hat, trimmed with one row of very fine deep blond round the edge, set on straight crape, or tiffany in puffs around the crown."

"Dishabille" had nothing of the "Mother Hubbard" or "Bungalow apron" about it in 1780. Caps and short aprons appear to be the distinguishing marks, but, "Large caps, with three deep wings," or "Large French caps, with six plaitings to the face," "German gowns, silver-sprigged, with short flounced aprons," or, "Circassian gowns of buff lutestring with short full-trimmed aprons . . . shapes small, long waists, small hoops."

But I forbear, lest this paper be taken as a piece of special pleading for the modern maid, with her bobbed hair, one-piece frock, and limited "undies"!

Every monthly number devotes several pages to News of the World—Home, Foreign and American. This was the year of the Volunteer Convention in Ireland, of the Gordon Riots in London, of the naval victory off Cape St. Vincent. Necker at Versailles was then striving to avert the rising storm of Revolution. News came in January of the murder of gallant Captain Cook nearly a year previous, and letters are quoted from explorers in China, and from the Asiatic ports east of the Caspian Sea. This was also the time of the crisis of the American War of Independence, and the correspondence of Sir Henry Clinton with Lord George Germaine, dealing with Benedict Arnold, André, and Washington, with dashing Banastre Tarleton, and with the unexpected movements of Paul Jones, is published in full detail from the "Gazette Extraordinary." Reading it thus from the same pages as did those who felt it the very latest war news, some of the dust of a century and a half blows away, and a stronger sense of the reality of these past events comes upon us.

Samuel Richardson.
By Joseph Highmore (National Portrait Gallery, London).

A complete article might be written upon the "Notes of the London Theatres" which appear in the Lady s Magazine. Garrick had died in 1779, but his great tradition still lingered. "Perdita" Robinson concluded her brief brilliant stage career in the spring of 1780, and she is several times commented upon in these criticisms. Besides synopses of the popular plays "for our readers in the provinces," discussion of stage management and comparisons of histrionic skill, there are biographical sketches of many prominent actresses such as Peg Woffington, Kitty Clive, Mrs. Abingdon ("Nosegay Fan"), Elizabeth Farren, later Countess of Derby, and that reckless and luckless George Anne Bellamy, whose account of her own deeds (and misdeeds) was of sufficient interest to enthral even so staid a reader as John Wesley, who remarked, when he finished her book, that he was sorry for the poor pretty thing.

Having thus given a partial summary of this magazine, "appropriated solely to the Use and Amusement of the Fair Sex," in the year 1780, we may, in spite of all our higher education for women and our throngs of feminine university graduates, ask ourselves the question, What journal especially for "The Ladies" of the present year gives a more complete account of current events throughout the world, of music, art, drama, poetry, travel, biography, history, not neglecting fiction, fancy-work, and fashions? I pause for a reply.

GRANVILLE-BARKER'S SHAKESPEARE.*

By Francis Bickley.

Those whose theatrical memories go back twenty years or so know that Mr. Granville-Barker is one of the finest actors of his generation—perhaps the finest of all. In the sheer intelligence of his acting he had no rival, unless it were the late Leslie Faber, whose death was the greatest loss sustained by the English stage since the War. It was this quality which made him the supreme exponent of the Shavian hero—if the phrase be not a contradiction in terms—and we who saw him in that unforgettable series of productions at the Court Theatre in 1904 and 1905 can never be quite satisfied with any successor in the parts which he created. His own plays, except "The Madras House," are a little over-subtilised and consequently lacking in dramatic force, but in their actual writing there is a distinction of style to be found in the dialogue neither of Mr. Shaw nor of Mr. Galsworthy. As a producer Mr. Granville-Barker is a recognised master, "the greatest English producer of our time," one of the best of our dramatic critics has called him.

That nowadays he neither acts nor produces plays is deeply to be regretted. But there is consolation in the fact that his withdrawal from active participation in the business of the theatre has enabled him to make a study of the stage-craft of the greatest of dramatists which is without parallel alike for its critical insight and its practical value. "Anyone," said the critic already quoted, in reviewing the first series of "Prefaces to Shakespeare," "who in future attempts to produce any of the three plays so far discussed, without reading Mr. Granville-Barker line by line, deserves to lose his job with ignominy."

One reason no doubt why Mr. Granville-Barker can write with such understanding of Shakespeare's stagecraft is that he has had practical experience in producing plays, Shakespeare's own among others. But it is equally true that the understanding displayed in these essays explains why his productions were so good. The way in which he combines brilliance of perception with a gift for patient study and practical sense is remarkable. The new prefaces are to "Romeo and Juliet," "The Merchant of Venice," "Antony and Cleopatra" and "Cymbeline"; and each play presents a separate problem to him—the problem of how it should be most effectively and appropriately staged. His way of solving this is to try to discover exactly what was Shakespeare's own intention, with due regard—and on this he lays great stress—to the conditions of theatrical production in his time.

Mr. Granville-Barker will have nothing to do with the conception of Shakespeare as a sort of inspired lunatic, who wrote great plays as it were by accident. He believes that he had a clearly conceived reason for every line of dialogue, every change of key, every entrance and exit. His minute scrutiny of the text—the text, the whole text and nothing but the text—increases our sense not only of his own critical ability but of the magnificence of Shakespeare's craftsmanship. He goes very thoroughly into the questions of act-division and scene-division, and exposes the arbitrary and unjustified nature of most of these, the wrong they have done both to the rhythm and the sense of the plays, in the quartos, the folios and later editions. Having regard to the unlocalised character of the Elizabethan stage, and the audience's innocence of any desire for more precise definition of time and place than is indicated by the dialogue, he believes that, generally speaking, though he is sparing of generalisations, the action of the plays is meant to be continuous.

It must not be supposed that Mr. Granville-Barker's essays are the concern only of those whose business it is to produce Shakespeare's plays. Regarded purely from the literary side, they are in the front rank of Shakespearean criticism. The analyses of individual characters are, in their imaginative insight, worthy of Lamb.

KATE GREENAWAY: A TWENTIETH CENTURY IMPRESSION.

BY WILLIAM E. DOUBLEDAY.

MISS KATE GREENAWAY died in 1901, and to think of her to-day is like turning over the fragrant petals of a delicate bowl of rich potpourri. For, like the flowers which she loved so well and drew with such exquisite fidelity and charm, her popularity has faded and, after delighting two continents for a quarter of a century or so, her work has, for the time being at least, fallen into undeserved oblivion. "Sic transit gloria mundi" might well be inscribed over the temple of her fame, but in this respect she suffers in excellent company:

> "There is no armour against fate;
> Death lays his icy hands on kings;
> Sceptre and Crown
> Must tumble down,
> And in the dust be equal made
> With the poor crooked scythe and spade."

The twentieth century is apt to be somewhat disrespectful to the nineteenth, and Kate Greenaway was, for good or ill, an artist who carved out for herself a distinctive and distinguished niche during the Victorian era. But she was something more than a mere exponent of her time. She was one of the little company of artists who revolutionised the art of book illustration. Walter Crane and Randolph Caldecott were contemporary workers in this refining process, but it was Miss Greenaway and her talented printer, Edmund Evans, working with her, who made book colour-work a thing of beauty and "a joy for ever"—a legacy for which we ought to be sufficiently grateful.

Portrait by Elliott & Fry.

Kate Greenaway.

No claim can with reason be made by her admirers for pre-eminence in the technique of art. This much is apparent in some of her work, and may readily be admitted. Her drawing is sometimes out of truth; her children—delightful as they are—are, like their originals, not invariably perfect; and her colour schemes, albeit often glorious in their harmonies, were occasionally at fault, especially in her earlier efforts. It has been alleged that she was deficient in landscape, but some of her illustrations offer a handsome defence against this charge, although it is undeniably true, as Ruskin pointed out to her, that she was sometimes careless of perspective and relied too exclusively as a rule upon her foregrounds. Those who desire to find fault with her work will find flaws enough to justify adverse criticism. There are defects in Keats's finest odes; even the sun has spots!

On the other hand she was peerless within her own particular little domain. Nowhere else can be found such captivating pictures of child life, and a crictic has suggested that only Botticelli surpassed her in the drawing and painting of roses. It was in such subjects that she was supreme. "What are Edouard Frère's little children to her?" Mr. Spielmann asked shortly after her death. "And what are Richter's?" he continued; "Cruikshank's children were caricatures; Leech's little manikins were never young, and Richard Doyle could give us sprites and fairies galore, but hardly a living boy or girl." Kate Greenaway's artless little folk were described by Austin Dobson as "the sweetest little child figures that have ever been invented," and Ruskin, her faithful mentor and friend, alternated his severely critical observations with outbursts of warmest praise. Cleverly as many of her drawings are reproduced in volume form, it is to be remembered that her work was frequently of so delicate a nature as to defy all the resources of the wood-block cutter and the colour printer, and it necessarily suffered by reduction. A professor of botany has been known to declare that her drawings of flowers and leaves are so exact that he could lecture from them, but in the course of translation into pictorial print much of the finest essence of such craft escapes.

In the seventies and eighties the "Greenaway" child took England and almost the whole of Europe by storm, and her birthday, Christmas and New Year cards, and February valentines, enjoyed a tremendous vogue both in Europe and America. Valentines are now outmoded, and Miss Greenaway's seasonal cards are almost totally forgotten, but like the first editions of her books, or indeed any book containing an example of her work, they are unceasingly the quarry of the connoisseur and the collector with an eye to rising values. During recent years the market value of these examples has rapidly increased.

But it is upon her books that the fame of Kate Greenaway rests and will continue to rest, although those who appreciate them most highly cannot agree among themselves as to which is entitled to pride of place. Austin Dobson thought that the artist herself had an especial affection for "Under the Window." Ruskin seems to have singled out her drawings for "The Pied Piper of Hamelin" for especial commendation, but he was more than cordial to other of her books.

Swings.

From Kate Greenaway's "Book of Games" (Warne).

"Some of the pages of 'The Piper' are magnificent pictures," he wrote to her, "though with a white background. You will be led by the blue mountains and the deep glens to a deeper colour melody, and to how much else there is no calculating." She was then about to visit him at Brantwood, hence the reference to scenic backgrounds, which she never developed as the critic hoped. Others have expressed a preference for "The Language of Flowers," a production of quite bewitching beauty, but owing to the absence of interesting letterpress it has undergone unmerited neglect. Its flowers and many of its subject pictures are a sheer joy, and the colours are finely done. The Almanacs, which were an annual feature throughout many years, undoubtedly contain some of the choicest of her pieces, but "Mother Goose," "Marigold Garden," "Little Ann," and possibly even "A Apple Pie" and her "Book of Games" are all rival candidates for preference. The fact is of course that in all these books her genius and charm were manifest, and liking is a matter of personal choice.

The characteristics of Miss Greenaway's art are grace and charm, and the charm and grace are of a kind peculiarly her own. She had many imitators but no rivals. The whimsicality of her children—almost invariably happy, for she hated to think of suffering!—and the simplicity, the unconscious dignity and the humour of her drawings have an atmosphere which is unique and inimitable. As a French critic has prettily observed, Kate Greenaway was "a fairy who did not dwell upon the globe at all, but only visited it from time to time for love of earthly children, just to leave another little book, and then fly away again."

Without being guilty of suggesting any close parallel between the writings of Jane Austen and the drawings of Kate Greenaway, one may perhaps venture to suggest that these two artists in different forms had certain traits in common. Each restricted herself to a narrow sphere and explored and depicted it with genius; each enjoyed and displayed a delightful sense of refined humour; each in her own manner was a keen observer of human nature, but Miss Greenaway's pencil was almost wholly confined to children and to flowers. At her best she has something of the graciousness, the subtlety of perception, the unerring sense of style which delight us in the writings of Jane Austen—but there is a difference; Miss Greenaway is entirely innocent of the great novelist's pungent, ironic humour.

When we went out with Grandmamma.

From "Marigold Garden." By Kate Greenaway (Warne).

Three decades have elapsed since this artist was laid to rest in the cemetery of the Hampstead in which she had lived so long, and where she had accomplished so much of her life-work. Her fame is yet under eclipse, but this is a matter which time and posterity may perhaps adjust. Meanwhile through the generosity of her brother, Mr. John Greenaway, an extensive collection of her studies and finished drawings, with proofs in various states, often with the text inserted in her picturesque script, has been presented, as alms to oblivion, to the Central Public Library at Hampstead. There it is being exhibited as a reminder of an artist of unique gifts, without whose work the world would have been the poorer.

And every sort of dance they knew.

From "Marigold Garden." By Kate Greenaway (Warne).

"Farewell, kind Heart, and if there be
In that unshored
Immensity
Child Angels,
they will welcome thee," sang Austin Dobson in his tender little requiem on the death of Miss Greenaway. Indeed her children ought to be immortal, and her flowers should never be allowed to fade in a Valhalla of neglect.

RESULTS OF COMPETIONS FOR MARCH.

I.—ONE GUINEA is awarded to J. Fisher, The British Library, Montana-Vermala, Switzerland, for the following:

FROM A STRANGE LAND.

Who said that memories fade with the years?
It is not true, O Heart! It is not true.
Always Remembrance greener grows with tears;
The pictured past is daily seen anew.—
That small and gracious house, whose warm brick walls
Yearly by climbing plants are closer pressed;
The mist that wraps it round as evening falls
O, my heart cries for home, and will not rest!

For there grows lavender in massed array,
Each scented blossom hung with honey-bees.
And while September pauses on her way,
Painted crab-apples glow on slender trees.
The little cup-like lawn, set close with flowers,
Is filled with sun, by him all day possessed—
O, who shall give me back those warm, sweet hours?
My heart cries out for home, and will not rest.

And there are roses all the summer-tide,
Spilling their scented glory equally
From bush and bowl. Doors, windows, open wide,
Offer the winds their hospitality—
And there are small, kind rooms, with walls of white,
And my tall windows, open to the west—
Friends, and one more than friend, my Love, my Light—
O, my heart cries for home, and will not rest.

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN,"
APRIL, 1930.

Drawing by FREDERICK ADCOCK.

GREENAWAY HOUSE, FROGNAL, HAMPSTEAD, N.W.

Additions have been made to each side of the house since Miss Kate Greenaway lived there.

"Tread ye warily the track
As ye pass these trees;
Here are violets, purple-black
As waves of stormy seas.

"Softly tread the woodland deep!
Dreaming mysteries
Under moss and beech-mast, sleep
Wood anemones.

Let your silent steps fall light!
Under last year's leaves
Nestles winter aconite
Gold as sunlit sheaves.

"Tread ye softly in these parts,"
Calls the woodland soil;
"Here is balm for broken hearts,
Peace for those who toil."

THE CURTAIN.

Like some seraglio of an Eastern king,
Secret and screened from gaze of prying eyes,
So is the soul of many a friend we know.
And as some gazer hidden 'mong the palms,
In some fair garden by the water, sees
A dark Sultana for a moment stand,
Dreaming, behind the casement curtain's folds,
The red gold gleaming on her dusky brow:
The hidden beauty for a moment stands,
And gazes, dreaming, from some well known eyes.

III.—The Prize of Three New Books for the best advice to anybody about to be married are awarded to Eileen Newton, Hildawell, Southend Gardens, Whitby, Yorks, for the following:

Dear John,

It was nice of you to ask your old auntie's advice in view of your forthcoming marriage. Without further preamble, here it is.

Do not lose the lover in the husband; tell your wife occasionally that you love her, rather than let it be taken for granted. Never forget her birthday, and do take some interest in her attire; wives whose husbands consistently fail to notice their appearance often become dowdy. Make your wife a reasonable allowance, so that she will not have to ask you for every little thing she needs. Should you differ, talk the matter over quietly and try to arrive at a compromise; never bottle up grievances or brood over imaginary wrongs. Be frank with your wife as to your business and finances, so that she may give you counsel in times of depression, and rejoice with you when your affairs go well. In short, treat your wife as a friend, not a plaything, and she will probably prove to be the best "pal" you ever had.

Your affectionate aunt, Charlotte.

P.S.—The enclosed cheque will, I trust, contribute to your happiness. The best part of my letter is the postscript, isn't it?

We also select for printing:

Dear Margaret,

You are about to take one of the most important steps in life and, as one who wishes you only happiness, I should like to give a little advice.

Don't expect too much! No man is perfect and you will soon find that your husband has his little failings as other people have. A little help and sympathy from you will do more good than all the fault-finding in the world!

After a time you will miss his caresses—for the husband is not as the wooer. Don't sulk and think yourself ill-treated. He does not love you the less, but he has so much to think of, and men do not notice these little things which mean so much to us women! Don't pry into his business affairs; a man cannot tell his wife everything. Just be a good comrade, helping with tender sympathy over rough places, being enthusiastic in his success, and then your marriage will not be wrecked as so many are to-day.

Your sincere friend, Beatrix.

(Iris Ottaway, Bungay.)

Mr. Beverley Nichols.
From a drawing by H. A. Perry.

To any Bride,

You stand to-day outside the Gate which leads to the Land of True Romance. In old-fashioned fiction the closing pages were concerned with wedding bells and orange-blossom, which originated the foolish idea that marriage meant the end of the love story. The lover overcame difficulties, the lady comforted and encouraged him, all through the book, but, having reached the haven of matrimony, one felt that all sacrifices and efforts were at an end. Now this is altogether wrong. So far as we know, marriage is going to last you your lifetime—anyway, you feel certain, just now, that nothing will ever shake your trust and happiness in each other. It can only be what you dream it if you remember that you married—for Love. That is the aim of every life, however that aim may be disguised.

There will be disillusion and unhappiness in the years ahead, though you cannot imagine that now. When that time comes, remember Love; triumphant over life and death, stronger than all the powers of ill-fortune and accident, unassailable by sorrow or pain. It is the talisman for this life and Eternity. Remember—Love.

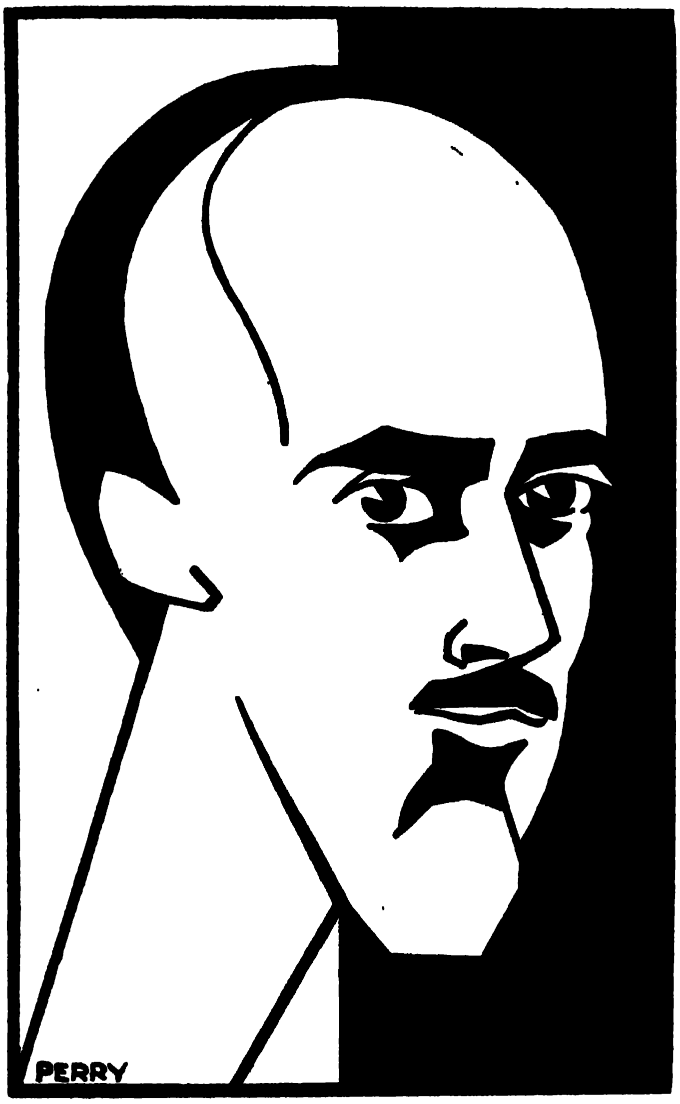
IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best set of one-line comments on six lines quoted from well known poets is awarded to Sir Duncan Grey, "Windgarth," Weston-super-Mare, for the following:

1. Procrastination is the thief of time;
But punctual folk are punished for the crime.
2. Sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care,
Too much indulged leaves hose in disrepair.
3. There is in souls a sympathy with sounds,
Which stops at milk vans doing early rounds.
4. Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well;
Which publishers insist means books that sell.
5. 'Tis not in mortals to command success,
Is what fools urge who botch their business.
6. Man wants but little, nor that little long
Is woman's plea for modes which prudes think wrong.



We also select for printing:

1. Procrastination is the thief of time.
The more you wait, the less you find sublime.
2. Sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care
Cannot disguise that it is worse for wear.
3. There is in souls a sympathy with sounds,
So all the world in Wireless now abounds.
4. Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well,
But many only write their ills to tell!
5. 'Tis not in mortals to command success,
And what they gain, ne'er makes their wishes less.
6. Man wants but little, nor that little long,
But what he wants is his unceasing song!

(Marjorie Crosbie, 10, Birches Barn Road, Wolverhampton.)

1. Procrastination is the thief of time,
And never Speed can expiate the crime!
2. Sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care,
Which Nightmare's clumsy hoof alone can tear!
3. There is in souls a sympathy with sounds.
"Alliteration's Artful Aid" Astounds!
4. Nature's chief masterpiece is writing well;
'Twill charm all countries by a different Spell!
5. 'Tis not in mortals to command success,
But some may coax it to them ne'er-the-less!
6. Man wants but little, nor that little long,
Yet jot, nor tittle, bates of right or wrong!

(Ada F. Strike, 38, Harrow Road, West Worthing.)

Spedding (Bolton), Mrs. Isobel Anderson (Guernsey).

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best statement of "Why I like or dislike detective stories," is awarded to Miss J. A. Jenkins, 139, Heathfield Road, Handsworth, Birmingham, for the following:

WHY I LIKE DETECTIVE NOVELS.

Detective novels are to me as good as a tonic, and I find them refreshing beyond words when I want a change of thought. They delight me with their unusual situations and tense moments. They give me a glimpse of a world, exciting and intriguing, in which wonderful things happen and heroic deeds are done by those whose work lies in this region of crime and vice. The morality of it has nothing to do with the side which interests me, and I merely enjoy the problems thus roused and solved by the clever minds dealing with them. There is sheer joy, even for the reader, in the outwitting of one by another, and the climax is reached when the whole sequence is unfolded and explained by the master-mind which has unravelled the plot from start to finish, in a way often utterly unsuspected by even experienced readers! Yes, the Detective Novel is a boon and a blessing to the world's workers, and is responsible for many an hour of rest and refreshment, which has sent them back invigorated to their own humdrum toil in the ordinary world, in which such happenings would be entirely out of place!

We also select for printing:

WHY I DISLIKE DETECTIVE NOVELS.

I dislike detective stories because I see so much of them and so little in them. Everyone in our house reads them—the old aunt of eighty-six, the father of the family, the children and the servants in their spare time and, apart from the thrills afforded, all the books do for their readers is to improve their spelling, and increase their knowledge of crime and of detective wiles. Bookstalls are full of these sleuths; with the arrogant air of policemen and the alluring faces of sirens, they shoulder improving books into corners, and beckon foolish seekers after excitement towards their fascinations. Constant readers of detective stories suffer eventually from literary diabetes, not sugary so much as spicy, and need strict dieting to regain their appetite for normal fare. Detective tales are the savouries (or unsavouries?) of fancy's feast, as love stories are the sweets, and, partaken of too freely, are apt to upset the digestion of the diners who omit the main course, the wholesome meat and vegetables of more improving literature. Perhaps the decrease of crime among women in real life is due to their being utterly "fed up" with their family's flights into those realms of criminal fiction.

WHY I LIKE DETECTIVE NOVELS.

For the same reason, I suppose, that a crowd will gather round an accident or a fight in the street: because they bring a thrill of excitement into life that is in itself a tonic. Most of our days are made up of the same old routine, and there is little scope for the adventurous strain hidden away in most of us. A detective story in which I can live and participate opens the doors of imagination, warms my blood, invigorates my spirit and is verily a safety-valve. Then I like to be intrigued by a good plot. My mind is stimulated, and the longer the author can keep the solution from me the better I am pleased. I find in this a detachment from my own problems. They are forgotten for a time in the difficulties of others. I think my sympathies are enriched too. Most detective stories contain vivid descriptions of the underworld where poverty and drink and heredity have a great deal to do with the making of crime. I find myself coming down on the side of the bottom dog every time. So all hail, Father Brown, Sherlock Holmes and the one and only Edgar Wallace!

Mr. A. P. Nicholson, author of "Scraps of Paper" (Ernest Benn).

If space permitted we would print the next half-dozen of these replies. Quite as many competitors dislike as like detective stories. J. E. Parsons (Ware) goes so far as to hate them. Agatha Honeywill (Bristol) finds they are "best beloved by schoolboys, parsons and elderly ladies." Miss G. Pitt (London, N.) used to read them in "an absolute rapture of excitement," but finds such a sameness in them that they now only bore her. Miss B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath) is also bored by them, but enjoys a mystery story that does not depend on detectives. The list of the dislikers runs on to a formidable length, but E. M. Cogswell (Lewisham), B. A. Billings (Manchester), Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Alfred O. George (Minehead) and very many others delight in the detective novel and have nothing but praise for it. We specially commend the replies of all these for and against it, and the replies of Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), Mrs. Maude R. Fleeson (Withington), J. Morton George (Woodford Green), S. Barrington McClean (Glasgow), Emily Davis (Dublin), Eleanor L. Sinclair (Belfast), Mrs. E. G. Elton (London, S.W.), C. C. Fraser (Liverpool), Daisi Dunlop (Cornhill-on-Tweed), K. M. Sanders (Bridport), Ella Tucker (Althorne), C. Burton (Forest Hill), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth).

NURSERY LIFE THREE HUNDRED YEARS AGO. By Lucy Crump. (Routledge.)

This charming book is based on the detailed Journal of Dr. Héroard, physician to Louis XIII as a baby and child, and fondly devoted to his charge. It gives us a vivid and intimate picture of the little boy, his daily life and his companions, in that strange, jumbled household. Here we have a new aspect of Henry of Navarre as affectionate, if injudicious father, and there are delightful baby letters to him from "Loys." Against a background utterly remote from modern conditions, the little Dauphin stands out as real and human as any child of to-day.

We also select for printing:

RED WAGON. By Lady Eleanor Smith. (Gollancz.)

There is a latent desire in all of us for the free-and-easy life of the nomad. Children at heart, we cannot suppress a gleeful tremor at the sight of a circus. Small wonder then that "Red Wagon" is so satisfying. Intermingling pleasantly with the story of an ambitious boy's rise from drudge to circus owner, one finds exquisite passages describing the English country-side. By subtle simplicity one is made to sense the tawdry, yet romantic atmosphere of the circus—and the freedom and comradeship of the open road. Altogether it is justifiable to say that not since Borrow has such a delightful exposition of "open-air" life appeared.

(Clifford Bower-Shore, "Ramillies," Offerton Lane, Stockport.)

CARRIE NATION. By Herbert Astbury. (Knopf.)

There is a sense of battle about the life of Carrie Nation that makes exhilarating reading. Her biographer has brought out all the indomitable pluck and fiery ardour of this woman with a hatchet with striking success. Whether one agrees with prohibition or not, one cannot but admit that in America the influence of this middle-aged, undisciplined, eccentric woman from Medicine Lodge was a vital factor in the triumph of Temperance. Carrie Nation died in 1911, and on her memorial are graven the words: "She hath done what she could." The story of a curious, repellent yet fascinating personality.

(Margaret Owen, Cherryvale, Whitstable.)

We also select for special commendation the reviews by Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), John P. Coghlan (Dublin), Michael Brown (York), J. A. Jenkins (Birmingham), Mrs. Cecelia Naumann (Cranleigh), Winifred Bates (Bridport), Daisi Dunlop (Cornhill-on-Tweed), J. E. Parsons (Ware), Ada F. Strike (West Worthing), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), SHELLEY AND HARRIET.*

By R. Ellis Roberts.

In desperate and ineffective self-defence (how often do any but the saints run to rescue others except with the recollection of past, or the fear of future needs of their own ?), mankind is always trying to isolate its problems. In a sense this process is inevitable. If we do not have recourse to categories and analyses we cannot contrive to think to our own satisfaction, and if we do not so think we remain animal, or else mope into fantastic melancholy. One persistent form of such self-defence is the division between an artist's life and his work. " It is, after all, only Shelley's poetry that concerns us ! " " How terribly unfortunate that Keats's letters to Fanny Brawne were ever published ! " " What matters is ' Manfred,' not the truth of Byron's love for his half-sister." " Do let us end this chatter about Harriet ! " And the men who make these appeals often, no doubt with sincerity, appeal to our sense of refinement, of discretion, beg us to consider whether it is not wrong to peer into the intimacies of the dead and to disturb the shape of the dusty and long-discarded cocoon which once, how deceitfully, sheltered the butterfly. But it will not do. Arnold's complaints, when he writes of Shelley and Keats, are only too evidently (if unconsciously) the protests of a man who realised that there was a strange lack of coherence between his actual and poetic life - and he was quick to defend the privacy of other poets similarly situated. He was wrong of course about Keats. There is no inconsistency, rather a splendid and passionate agreement, between the poet who wrote the Odes and " Hyperion " and the lover who wrote the letters. Arnold was led astray by a false standard of gentility, and failed to recognise the glory of Keats's love because he suspected the existence of a Cockney accent. It is a sober thought that the breadth and rusticity of Shakespeare's accent might send a university critic wrong about him too. Arnold was however right about Shelley. There was a glaring inconsistency between Shelley's poetry and philosophy and his treatment of Harriet. If any doubt this, let him put the question at its bluntest. If Harriet had not been Shelley's wife, had she been, say, his sister or a niece, can we imagine him writing as he did to any other pregnant woman ? By all the standards that Shelley invoked, his wife was at the least entitled to as much consideration as any other friend ; and she did not get it. I believe Shelley knew this. I believe he knew, if not at the time, very shortly afterwards, that he was here false to his own ideals, unutterably wrong ; and the knowledge poisoned his whole life afterwards. No doubt he believed he was being generous when he offered Harriet a place beside Mary and himself ; but it is a generosity which no one else can admit to be of any value. You offer something if you offer brandy to a man who is dying of the burning force of corrosive sublimate, and begging you for water to ease his agony, but your generosity is not of a kind that in your less enthusiastic moments you will expect him to recognise.

Shelley.

> " I repeat (and believe me, for I am sincere) that my attachment to you is unimpaired. I conceive that it has acquired even a deeper and more lasting character, that it is now less exposed than ever to the fluctuations of fantasy or caprice. Our connection was not one of passion and impulse. Friendship was its basis, and on this basis it has enlarged and strengthened. It is no reproach to me that you have never filled my heart with an all-sufficing passion ; perhaps you are even yourself a stranger to these impulses, which one day may be awakened by some nobler and worthier than me ; and may you find a lover as passionate and faithful, as I shall ever be a friend affectionate and sincere ! "

So he writes in the first letter, rescued by Mr. Hotson from the dirt of Masters's Papers in the Record Office. Two months later, after he had eloped with Mary and been forced back to England by money difficulties, he writes :

> " You think that I have injured you. Since I first beheld you almost, my chief study has been to overwhelm you with benefits. Even now when a violent and lasting passion for another leads me to prefer her society to yours, I am perpetually employed in devising how I can be permanently and truly useful to you, in what manner my time and my fortune may be most securely expended for your real interests."

Did he guess how Harriet would burst into tears at that word " lasting," how she would mutter, when she came to the words " devising how " : " Oh ! why devise ? Come back to me ! " I do not think he did, and therein lies his sin, and his forgiveness, if he can be forgiven. The miserable interchange of letters, of interviews goes on. Harriet confides in her sister ; her sister recommends a lawyer. Shelley is furious, but persists in his attempts to persuade his wife to accept " the influence of his superintending mind." And Harriet, bewildered, never apparently makes the one retort that was hers by inalienable right : " I am carrying your child, Bysshe. Can you imagine nothing of what pregnancy means ? " Here Shelley was ready with advice :

> " I do not apprehend the slightest danger from your approaching labour. I think you may safely repose confidence in Sims's skill. Your last labour was painful, but auspicious. I understand that cases of difficulty after that are very rare."

These last two sentences almost compel one to believe that there was some natural affinity between Shelley and the ineffable Godwin. " Your last labour "— how could he, in these circumstances, remind his deserted and despairing wife of that other preparation and birth, when she was blissfully happy with her husband ? " I understand "—but the man understands nothing. He has no idea, it would seem, that there is any connexion between the body and the mind and that, as Harriet is situated, every psychical activity is of poignant difficulty to her.

* " Shelley's Lost Letters to Harriet." Edited by L. Hotson. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

"I am united to another; you are no longer my wife. Perhaps I have done you injury, but surely most innocently and unintentionally, in having commenced any connexion with you. That injury, whatever be its amount, was not to be avoided."

"You are no longer my wife"—By whose decree? Shelley, at once prosecutor, defendant, judge and jury, dissolves his marriage, acquits himself of blame, and determines the character of Harriet's punishment for having been led into "a connexion" with him. It is one of the most unnecessary tragedies in history. That they were children, that Harriet's sister, determined, vulgar, match-making, could make Harriet do as she would and could frighten Shelley; that Shelley and Harriet each (he culpably, she only very slightly so) deceived themselves about the character of their love; that the sight of Mary Wollstonecroft's daughter drove Shelley into a frenzy of passion that he did not even try to control—that is all perhaps that we can say by way of accusation or excuse. The nine new letters, discovered by Mr. Hotson and admirably annotated by him, do not change our view of the problem, or of Shelley's character. Some are perhaps even more priggish in expression than one had thought possible, but there is nothing in any to lighten our judgment of Shelley.

D. H. LAWRENCE.

By C. Henry Warren.

D. H. LAWRENCE is dead. He died last month in Provence. For years before his death he had spent most of his time in the south—Italy, France, Mexico—and the burden of the sun is to be found, in one form or another, in most of his later work. The pagan blood in him responded to the sun, fiercely, passionately, so that he seemed to see in it some kind of symbol of the way life should trend. His most vehement cry in later years was that modern life tended too much to go "against the sun"; and to go against the sun was in his eyes synonymous with decay and death. "Conscience" (he wrote in his last book of poems) "is sun-awareness and our deep instinct not to go against the sun."

One of the finest short stories he ever wrote (it is to be found in the volume called "The Woman Who Rode Away") was an almost perfect objectification of this sun-theme. He called it simply "Sun." It told of an American woman who with her child came over to Italy, rebellious against the way of life in her own land. Every day she would go down to the shore, playing with her child among the olive trees, giving herself unstintedly to the sun, and teaching her child to do the same. So they lived, naked, sun-drenched, until no tiny core of them was left unfed by the sun. They learned freedom in their responses to life. They lived from their roots. And then one day the husband came over on an unexpected visit—pale Maurice, respectable, bowler-hatted, embarrassed in their presence. He, the child of modern Western life, with its industrialism, its blind intelligence, its anti-sunwardness: she, the child of the lands of the sun, intuitive, free. "Nevertheless" (so the story ends) "her next child would be Maurice's: the fatal chain of continuity would cause it."

That story is in a sense a dramatisation of the gospel Lawrence spent all his art in later years to expound. There is even a hint in its conclusion of the all but futility of such a gospel to-day. What, it may be asked, drove Lawrence to take up such a cause? His early years had been lived in England: he was born in the industrial Midlands, among the mines, the grime, the greed, and the grey skies. His father was a miner, and he himself left school at an early age to follow his father's calling. By dint of hard studying he pulled himself free of the mines and became a schoolmaster. That, by the nature of things, could not last long. He wrote. Just before the War his first books appeared and attracted attention as something new and rather startling in their frankness. One, "The Rainbow," was suppressed. Then in rebellion against the conditions of life here and in obedience to the "call of the sun," he left the country—to return to it again only on occasional visits. The damage however was already done. Those early years left a scar on his life that never healed. Indeed, in the bright sunlight of the south, by contrast, his memory painted the grey skies of England even greyer than they were. He became a violent propagandist for the sun—not the physical sun only, but the metaphorical sun too. He fled from greyness as from the plague. It was a favourite term of abuse with him, when he wished to revile those who seemed to him narrow, conservative, pettifogging, to call them "the grey men"—the men in whom the sun was dead.

It is necessary from the first to understand Lawrence's passion for the sun. Without that understanding his life's best work seems thwarted. Perhaps he went to unnecessary lengths to propagate his cause; so that his last book of poems was seized by the customs authorities, his last novel was banned, his pictures were forbidden. Quite likely there was some physical explanation of this obsession. He died of consumption. But such explanations do not in this case get us very far. Lawrence's passion for the sun, and the philosophy he evolved from that passion, had something more than a physical bias in it. He had tasted modern life, and the taste was exceedingly bitter in his mouth. As he understood it, the focus of life was gradually and ruinously shifting from the east to the west, from the intuitive to the intellectual, from craftsmanship to industrialism, from the gold to the grey. It was as if the sun of life itself were setting. He watched men grow more and more untrue in their responses: nothing they did seemed to have any abiding roots: their motives were all estranged from any vital cause. And why? Men were no longer able to be true to themselves, because, deep down in themselves, they were already dead. They cerebralised their feelings until there were no longer any true feelings left. They even made love with their heads instead of with their hearts.

It was in an attempt to do what he could to remedy this state of affairs, that Lawrence all but sacrificed his art. As time went on, he came to write novels that were not so much novels, perhaps, as dramatic and emotional tracts exploring the perversities and complexities he seemed to see in all the life of to-day. Sooner or later, in his books, the characters would yield up their individuality and become the passionate mouthpieces of their author. Purposely he would set his scene (as he did in "The Plumed Serpent," a tale of the clash of the old and the new in Mexico) in places where still the relics of an older and apparently truer life prevailed. Even his poetry, that had shown in "Birds, Beasts and Flowers" how fine and sensitive a poet he could be, changed its nature so that his last book ("Pansies") was more akin to a notebook filled with the rhythmic jottings of his philosophy than to a volume of verse.

D. H. Lawrence.

From a drawing by H. A. Perry.

It is very doubtful however whether Lawrence, the propagandist, would have considered that the sacrifice made in favour of Lawrence, the artist, had been in vain. He must have heard it said, over and over again, that the greatest book he had ever written was one of his very earliest, "Sons and Lovers." There was without doubt an epic note in that book. As a novel, pure and simple, it was never again matched by anything that came from his pen. It had no axe to grind. Its main characters had a life of their own. It was set in the English Midlands, and it was clearly in some degree autobiographical. With a dignity and richness that was quite unusual it pictured the cross-currents of life in an ordinary working-class family. It was in fact a great novel. If such an achievement, then, were attainable so early, what might not have been achieved later on, if Lawrence had not chosen to exploit (as he did) his astonishing gifts? The question is a futile one. He remains an undeniable genius. Even his enemies will allow the truth of that.

Lawrence has never won popularity in the widest sense, and never will. Those who happen to favour his philosophy gladly overlook his failings, and thus get all out of him that he has to give. But the greatest artist surely is he who, by a clear and disciplinary objectification of his philosophy, wins in the end the ear of all. That discipline and that clarity Lawrence never exercised in his art. He couldn't. As well might one ask the storm to be less tumultuous and still be a storm. A riot of words seemed somehow essential to his genius; as if only by the rush and impetus of words could it win through. What to some therefore was verbiage and a waste was in fact, in Lawrence's case, the storm which was necessary for the working of his genius. His dark clouds, however, forked with electric stabs of truth, were far too uncomfortable for the majority of readers. It was just those snake-fangs of lightning that most of all alienated him from the public. People do not as a rule like to pay to be castigated by an author—unless, like Shaw, he is possessed with a rare humour; and humour Lawrence never had in any substantial measure.

His place then, for all his genius, remains a rather limited one. His later novels, when it comes to the final test, fail—though they remain more vital than nine out of ten of the novels being written in our time. In his short stories he stands among the masters: there a certain degree of discipline was enforced upon him, and his characters had not time to turn themselves into the mouth-pieces of their author. In his poems of the early and middle period he is among the few poets who count. Whilst of his novels, "Sons and Lovers," "The Trespasser" and "Aaron's Rod" have a beauty and veracity and sweeping power rare enough in the novels of the last twenty years.

MORE ABOUT ANTHOLOGIES.

By St. John Adcock

BY common consent, Palgrave's Golden Treasury is the ideal, the as-near-as-possible perfect anthology of English lyrics written between the later years of the sixteenth century and the earlier years of the nineteenth. It became and remains that, I think, because Palgrave instinctively or otherwise conformed to the unpretentious standards of good taste and good sense which also prevail in the first of English anthologies. Tottell's anthology; Edwards's "Paradyse of Daynty Devises"; Bodenham's "England's Helicon," and such Elizabethan miscellanies, hold in their treasuries much of the work of the greater poets of the period, and much of the minor poets which else might never have come down to us; and it is significant that those anthologies are said to have had far larger sales than were obtained by the books of any one of the poets named in them. For the anthology does not, or should not, appeal primarily to the student, to men of letters, to the cultured person of leisure who reads widely, and naturally prefers to follow his own judgment in such matters rather than the guidance of others; the anthologist who knows what he is doing has no eye on posterity but works for the immediate multitude who, being preoccupied with other business, make nothing but a pleasure of reading. That is why the books of the Elizabethan editors sold more largely than did the separate works of their great poets. And you may depend they included many poems that no longer strike us as anything particular in the way of poetry simply because such verse happened to be in favour at the moment with the majority.

By Raphael Nelson. Mr. Horace Annesley Vachell, whose new book, "The Best of England," is published by Messrs. Faber & Faber.

Palgrave followed the same modest plan. He deferred to the public for whom anthologies are intended and included certain verse of little or no merit in technique or in phrase that yet held some poetry of thought or emotion that had carried it to the hearts of average men and women. He seldom allowed himself this freedom when he was dealing with the older poetry, though he found room for Colley Cibber's commonplace but once popular lines on "The Blind Boy"; for Cowper's popular "My Mary"; and for J. Collins's homely lyric, "To-Morrow,"

> "In the downhill of life, when I find I'm declining,
> May my fate no less fortunate be
> Than a snug elbow-chair can afford for reclining,
> And a cot that o'erlooks the wide sea"— which an old countryman once told me he had often heard sung by sentimental farmers after their "ordinary" on market days. But when he came to the verge of his own era Palgrave was more generous in yielding to popular liking and took in Campbell's "Freedom and Love," with its

> "Other smiles may make you fickle, > Tears for other charms may trickle";

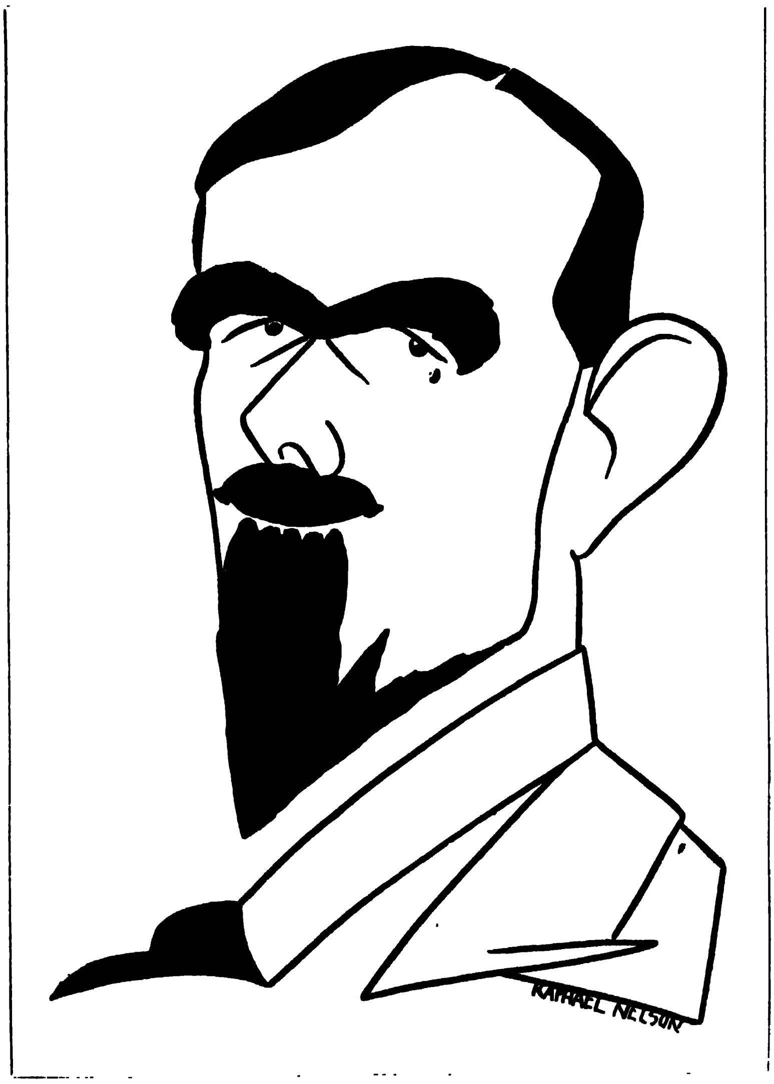
Moore's dreadfully maudlin

> "At the mid hour of night, when stars are weeping, I fly
> To the lone vale we loved, when life shone warm in thine eye";

and other perishable verse, by Moore, Campbell and Southey, that was then in vogue and was sensibly, therefore, given place in an anthology that should adequately represent the poetry of various kinds which the public of that generation loved or admired and wanted to read.



For lack of adopting this catholic outlook a good many recent anthologies have been born almost dead, and have died soon after birth. They have addressed themselves intolerantly to the student, to the person who possesses all the books from which their selections are taken, instead of to the general reader, and so have not even had a sporting chance of falling between the two stools. The best anthology I have seen lately, the best on the right broad, comprehensive lines, is Miss Elizabeth D'Oyley's "Modern Poetry."* She has included almost every contemporary English poet of any distinction, with several that are good but little known, and six whose names I have not come upon before, but I shall look out for three of them at all events in future. Miss D'Oyley has selected very sparely from the aggressively "modernist" poets; two of the loudest are omitted; but if she considers they have not yet made sufficient impression on the general sensible reader for whom anthologies are designed I shall not dispute that. I took it as auguring well for her book when I saw she had chosen J. C. Squire's poignant ballad, "The Bulldog." It is not his finest poem; but he is represented by two others. I have heard a superior person remark that "The Bulldog," with its easygoing metres and homely pathos, challenged comparison with the ballads of George R. Sims; however that may be it has pleased its thousands, and I felt it was an ominous opening when one recent and unsatisfactory anthology complacently announced that "The Bulldog" was excluded because it was too popular. Here, in Miss D'Oyley's pages, you find Kipling, Symons, Bridges, Noyes, Davies, de la Mare, Yeats, Martin Armstrong, Chesterton, Belloc, Brooke, Frank Kendon, Monro, Middleton, Newbolt, Shanks, Sassoon, Muriel Stuart, Stevenson, Vernède, Wolfe, Newbolt, Masefield, Meredith, Gould, Alice, Francis and Viola Meynell, Sorley, Thomas—indeed, there are remarkably few omissions, and only one that seriously matters. An anthology of modern poetry that omits William Watson cannot be complete. Apart from this, I have no complaint, except that it might have been better to leave Edward Shanks represented by three admirable poems and not to have put in as a fourth his "Sleeping Heroes," telling of how when, at last, Barbarossa, Arthur and Charlemain rise from their tombs they will look at the weather and

* 2s. (Arnold.)

> "Arthur will swear it is
> A very cold morning :
> Charlemain says a red sunrise
> Is the shepherd's warning" – which young humour belongs to the school magazine; but, the collection as a whole being so good, I am almost ashamed I did not swallow that and say nothing.

By Raphael Nelson. Mr. Richard Hughes, author of "A High Wind in Jamaica" (Chatto & Windus).

Messrs. D. B. Wyndham Lewis and Charles Lee have collaborated to produce in "The Stuffed Owl"* a very entertaining anthology of bad verse. They have excluded living writers, not because nobody living has written any, but, as Mr. Wyndham Lewis intimates in a preface, out of a feeling of delicacy or politeness; it was felt that "the enrichment of this book (not to speak of its considerable enlargement) with extracts from eminent living English poets would not compensate the momentary hot embarrassment all round which would perhaps have followed our request to Mr. Boom, Mr. Tweet, Mr. Blandish, Mrs. Henry Bodnick, and the others, for permission to quote from their works." Therefore the anthology begins with Cowley and ends with Tennyson. "There is bad Bad Verse and good Bad Verse," says the preface. "Good Bad Verse is grammatical; it is constructed according to the Rubrics, its rhythyms, rimes, and metres are impeccable." And the good badness of some of the verse written by our great poets is both laughable and lamentable; though, on the whole, it is the smaller bards who take the palm, and their absurdities are accentuated by the titles the editors have given to some extracts and by occasional foot-notes. Longfellow, who is crowned with praise in an introduction, escapes with nothing to his discredit but "Excelsior"; Tennyson is not so fortunate; his worst specimen is the too treacly "Lord of Burleigh," but I think there is worse in "The May Queen." Wordsworth furnishes his tale of Harry Gill, and other infelicities that fill ten pages. Byron does not escape, nor Goldsmith, Johnson, Keats, Emerson, Poe, Southey, nor "Night Thoughts" Young. But here the lesser poets rise pre-eminent. Tupper is a master of this particular kind of verse and his "Portrait of a Victorian Author" a pure joy:

> "Yea: how dignified, and worthy, full of privilege and happiness,
> Standeth in majestic independence the self-ennobled Author!

* 6s. (Dent.)

> For God hath blessed him with a mind, and cherished it in tenderness and purity, > Hath taught it in the whisperings of wisdom, and added all the riches of content " ; and what a beautiful thought is this for those who are offered a peerage :

> " If he meet honours, well ; it may be his humility to take them."

Tupper is hard to beat, but Dr. Watts equals him ; and Poet Close is not far behind him in the memorial lines,

> " And have we lost another friend ?
> How sad the news to tell !
> Alas ! poor Mr. Yarker's gone—
> Hark to the tolling bell ! "

And when you read what was written by those " Della Cruscans " who were the " new poets " of a hundred and fifty years ago, you will be more contented with the " new poets " that we call our own. Blackmore contributes his quota and Erasmus Darwin, Shenstone and Leigh Hunt ; Julia Moore is too bad to be called good bad, and Alfred Austin is not forgotten, though I miss that song in which, since the word " guns " would have marred his metre, he urged the volunteers in time of national peril to " stand by your barrels " and guard our shores. If he had been writing an anti-prohibition war song —but he was not. " So," as Mr. Lee concludes his neat and witty " Proem,"

> " So sing the Masters of Bathetic Verse.
> Follow their lead ; do better, doing worse.
> So shall your brows be crowned with bays unwith'ring ;
> So shall the world be blither for your blithering."

It may seem rather unkind thus to put these poets in the pillory, but, as the editors observe, the great ones among them, despite these descents into bathos, are still great ; and it is something to their credit that even the offshoots of their unconscious humour help to make a book that is more amusing than are most anthologies of intentionally humorous verse.

Manchester is commonly regarded as a severely commercial city given over to the activities of hard-headed men of business, but we know that under its practical exterior Manchester has a soul of music and of art, and that it also has a poetic soul is exemplified by the fact that some while back it founded a Lyric Club which is now flourishing with a considerable membership. The aim of the Club is to " encourage the study of the works of living poets," and " to form a centre for the literary interests of lovers of poetry." In pursuance of its purposes the Club has issued " A New Lyric Book,"* an anthology of poems by some score of its members, and by well known poets who are associated with Manchester or are in sympathy with the objects of the Club. Among the latter are Walter de la Mare, Galsworthy, Humbert Wolfe, Lady Margaret Sackville, J. C. Squire, Edmund Blunden, Louis Golding, Marion St. John Webb, Margaret Woods, Laurence Binyon—these, and others, combine with the Club's members to form a collection of present-day verse that should make a strong appeal to lovers of poetry in Manchester and wherever else they may be. If I may do so without seeming invidious I would single out for particular praise from among the work of members of the Manchester Lyric Club certain of the verses of William C. Hall, Tinsley Pratt, Mildred Fielding, George A. Bamber, and F. T. H. Turner. As was to be expected, the poems by some of the members bespeak the prentice hand, but there is, on the whole, more than enough in them to justify Mr. H. Ross Clyne's introductory sonnet which describes " our Lyric Club of songsters " as a > " Little crown

> That decks our city's head with poesy."

One other anthology on my table is Mr. Hugh I'Anson Fausset's " Minor Poets of the Eighteenth Century."† His minor poets are five : Anne, Countess of Winchelsea, Thomas Parnell, Matthew Green, John Dyer and William Collins. Greatest of the five is Collins, by virtue of the magical, exquisitely delicate art of the " Ode to Evening," and by some beautifully imaginative passages in other of his Odes. Such things were in Swinburne's mind, no doubt, when he eulogised Collins as " a solitary song-bird among many more or less excellent pipers and pianists." The much admired Song from Cymbeline and stanzas on the death of James Thomson are too artificial in sentiment and in their use of the formal poetic diction of the period to have much æsthetic or emotional value. Collins was the finer artist, but Lady Winchelsea had always a spontaneity, the true " song-bird " gift, which came but occasionally to Collins. He has little of the charm, the natural tenderness of feeling and witty playfulness that you find in her verses to her husband and in divers of her miscellaneous poems and songs. It is strange that still, as in her own day, she is so inadequately appreciated. Wordsworth recognised her sensitiveness to the beauty of external nature and the poetic realism of her descriptive sketches ; Gosse praised her lines " To the Nightingale " as having " lyrical qualities which were scarcely approached in her own age " ; two years ago Middleton Murry edited and Jonathan Cape published a selection of her poems ; all this and the ampler selection in this anthology should win her the place that belongs to her among the poets of her time.

In an excellent introduction Mr. Fausset criticises the various qualities of the five minor poets of his selection, and argues rightly that to those " who study eighteenth century poetry sympathetically such critical catchwords as ' the tyranny of Pope,' or ' the domination of the heroic couplet,' must appear not only superficial, but definitely misleading. ' There are small traces of Pope's influence on Lady Winchelsea, rather more on Parnell, and in the early eclogues of Collins ; but none on Dyer, who as Dowden said, " in an age of city poets found his inspiration on the hillside and by the stream " ; and none on Greene, Akenside, Somerville, Thomson, Shenstone, Smart, and other of Pope's contemporaries. It may have been an age of city poets, but Mr. Fausset indicates that " the underlying interest of the eighteenth century is to be found in this growing tenderness of mind, a tenderness for animals and green places, for the poor and unfortunate, or for an evening sky." The romantic revival only reached its meridian with Wordsworth and his contemporaries in the nineteenth century ; that it was dawning all through the eighteenth is emphasised by Mr. Fausett's introduction and by the work of the five poets in his anthology.

New Novels.

ROGUE HERRIES.*

Mr. Hugh Walpole's new novel, "Rogue Herries," is set in the eighteenth century, and is a remarkable study of a man. Francis Herries is a rogue, a waster, a libertine, and yet a gentleman, such a man as has been dear to a hundred and one women novelists, but no woman novelist could have drawn this man so convincingly, so accurately, with such masterly and artistic detachment, with so clear an insight into his muddied and struggling spirituality. I do not know whether it is Mr. Walpole's masterpiece; perhaps I am not far enough from its first reading to judge properly as to that; but I do not think it will ever rank among his lesser achievements. It seems to me to be a major book—not only for Mr. Walpole, but for any writer.

It is more, too, than the study of a man. It is the study of a family, of a period, of a whole district of England. Its setting, the Lake Country, is quite as important as its events, and the coloured spaciousness of his descriptions has a value that is subtly dramatic, perhaps more dramatic in essence than many of the apparently more dramatic moments in the plot. Mr. Walpole does not write like a poet—he is too accomplished a technician to write sentences that might be mistaken for "poetic prose," yet there is something of a poetic sweep, of a poetic creativeness, about this long, mellow and wholly coherent book.

Mr. Hugh Walpole posing for his bust to Mr. David Evans, R.B.S.

From the first moment when we see Herries in the inn at Keswick we are conscious of the truth of his presentation. As a psychological study the man is alive from his first entrance, and Mr. Walpole has a felicitous power of making his characters betray themselves in their insignificant actions as much as in their larger. It is by our trivialities that we are known, and the cumulative effect of a character's trivialities is the real triumph in his creation. Herries's wearing of his rich clothes to meet his pompous brother is a revelation all the more sure because it is not thrust at us, but insinuated to us, without undue comment at the moment, and without analysis beyond its own open fact. Yet how significant it is of the rebel!

The book, as well as being a full-length portrait of one man, is a whole gallery of portraits, some of them sketches of people in a particular moment, others of people growing, developing and reacting through a whole series of moments. It is impossible, in a review's short space, to give a proper idea of the variety of men and women who are painted in this book. The whole Herries family seems to be living before us; when certain members of it are entirely in the background we are yet conscious that they are still living and going about their daily rounds somewhere outside the book covers, and we wait for this or that member to reappear, produce his or her reactions, and show the family characteristics coming out with almost the sureness of fate. Perhaps the family was, to the Herries, fate.

There are many studies of child life, and these are as profound as they are exquisite. The study of the son of Rogue Herries, David, is as masterly as that of the father, yet a little less interesting because he was himself a little less interesting. But we are able to watch the father and the son diverging and yet never separating; we can appreciate the antagonism in temper which never becomes an antagonism in appreciation. Both are men. Rarely has the almost feminine jealousy of a father been more finely described than in the chapter entitled "The Sea—Father and Son." The emotion is so masculine; there is sentiment, but no sentimentality; and at the back of it there is something so virily wilful. Both are men—for indeed it is at that moment that the young Herries comes into his manhood.

The women are no less admirable. The wife of Herries, so truly feminine in her lack of intuition rather than in her possession of it; the daughter, Deborah, subtle in her very subduedness; and, most of all, Mirabell Starr. There is a touch of Goethe's Mignon in Mirabell. She has not the poetry of Mignon, but she has something of her peculiar apartness, as if she were a being not perhaps of some other world, but of some other manner of inner life. It is not often that characterisations so primitively simple are so symbolical, too.

I find, looking back on the book, that nearly all my impressions of it are either of the people in it, or of the country in which it is set, and I wonder whether that was Mr. Walpole's intention. Scenes of drama and outside event in the book are neither few nor far between; yet it is the people I remember first, and the happenings afterwards. But, as I think again, certain chapters do leap out with intensities of their own. The death of the wife of Herries; the funeral of great-aunt Maria—with its extraordinary little study of the dog; the pitiful drowning of Mrs. Wilson the witch: these undoubtedly are at the very height of modern fiction, and I am far more tempted into by-ways of appreciation than along the high road of direct criticism. If I may be allowed to remember that I am supposed to be "reviewing" this book, I will venture one point of criticism, though I feel ungrateful in doing so: there is little humour; but there is a wealth of quiet irony.

Mr. Walpole does not repeat himself, and this period novel the 'Forty-five occurs in the middle of it—has a genuine freshness of inspiration. At the same time, its psychological wisdom is too penetrative and true for it to have the false freshness of romance. It is a serious study of life, a mature study, and a work of art.

EXILES.*

Warwick Deeping has so many of the qualities of a born story-teller that it fits in with one's ideas of literary justice that his books should be best-sellers. "Sorrell and Son" sold half a million copies; "Roper's Row" cannot have been far behind; and now "Exiles" completes a trio in which the story makes a general appeal and the characters are of absorbing interest.

The scene is set in Tindaro, on the Italian Mediterranean, a languishing town in which the legend and the voice of Circe linger. The exiles are the people out from England seeking sunshine. "Sorry for exiles," says Tom Frevick, "people cut off from their jobs." Cut off from their jobs they carry on an aimless existence which centres round the Café Ceres. Billy Brown, aged twenty-six, open-air and modern, comes from England to take up work in an English tea-room and library. She is one of the most attractive of Mr. Deeping's heroines, and in portraying her in the various experiences which Tindaro brings her, he shows an unerring knowledge of just such a girl's way of looking at life and her reactions to it. The affair with Oscar Slade, which ends so tragically, is a masterly piece of writing, and the effect is increased by Mr. Deeping's fine economy of touch. It is not one novelist in a hundred who could have handled such a situation, rounding it off so graciously in the scene where Billy learns the truth from Mrs. Burt. Humiliated and broken, Billy, true to type, presents a hard front to the curious world, throws herself into her work and decides to live for it. But the story ends as a best-seller must end, with the future opening out into another order of happiness.

One always admires the shapeliness of a Deeping novel, and "Exiles" is no exception. It runs smoothly and inevitably. And always the story and the incidents of the plot are uppermost in the author's mind. He uses description admirably, but not for itself, rather to set the scene. He gives his characters some effective things to say—"Funny mix-up, life, silly sort of muddle. It's one's fool body that will go and play in the mud, just like a kid"—but they are always in character, not set down for the purpose of being effective. "Exiles" is a thoroughly competent piece of work, by a craftsman who knows his job.

THE MIRACLE OF PEILLE.*

This is a sort of tale that, except for its up-to-date setting, might have been told by mediæval firesides, where its miraculous happenings would have been received without question, almost without surprise. For there is nothing more wonderful in it than is in some of the ancient Lives of the Saints; the wonder is that, with a subtle and delicate art, Mr. J. L. Campbell has told such a story, as of the present day, steeping it in an old-world atmosphere of superstition, magic and simple religious faith, and told it with such realistic, matter-of-fact directness that a sophisticated generation of readers has succumbed to its charm and, while its spell is upon them, would sooner believe it all than ask whether it is believable.

The daughter of a shepherd and a gipsy woman, Thérèse Ursule Corbeille was born in the ruins of a monastery on the skirts of a tiny village in the mountains behind Monte Carlo. Saints and martyrs, painted on the broken walls, and an image of the Virgin, "all in white with a blue scarf in her hands," looked down on this little secular family; and resenting the presence of the gipsy in that holy place, the villagers came one night to drive her out. Massino, her husband, was absent; the mother fled before them in terror, and in the morning, having missed her footing in the dark, was found dead, but the child was alive. She grew up a cripple, and after Massino, a morose, violent fellow, who was believed in the village to have dealings with the devil, had been executed for a murder of which he was innocent, she lived on in the ruined monastery alone, sooner than bring trouble on the kindly villager who for a while took the helpless orphan into her home. For rumours spread that Thérèse, like her father, was leagued with the devil. So she lived alone in the ruins, giving shelter to passing tramps and beggars, once being arrested and, for a time, in prison for hiding an escaped German prisoner of war. She developed psychic gifts. The Virgin appeared to her, and her lameness was cured. In a trance she wrote something on the altar in a language she did not understand, and when the old priest, who took an interest in her, had it translated it proved to be a detailed description, in Arabic, of the original plan of the monastery, and thereafter Thérèse was impelled to make it her life-work to get the monastery rebuilt as a refuge for the poor.

Pauline Portraits, Ltd. Mr. J. L. Campbell.

How she accomplished this is not to be summarised. Believing she was under divine guidance, she finally accepted the offer of a genial American producer who, promising large rewards, carried her off to the States, where she was to have exhibited on the stage her power of healing the sick and the lame. This bizarre episode is vividly and significantly handled. In such circumstances, her miraculous power deserted her, and the enterprise was a failure. But the journey had other results, and leads to a series of incidents and to an accident, when she arrives back in France, which causes her death and is the means of realising her one ambition. It is a very poignant story, rich in beauty of thought and suggestion, and very simply and beautifully told.

THREE PRIZE NOVELS.

THE SHIP OF TRUTH.[1]

Miss Cooper has chosen a difficult theme for her book which has won the £1,000 prize in Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's religious novel competition—and that theme is the evolution of a man's soul. Clement Dyson, clergyman in an industrial West Riding parish, had entered the Anglo-Catholic Church without submitting his beliefs to close scrutiny, and it is only when he is well on in the thirties that doubts as to his own sincerity begin to creep into his mind. "Why did the Church make things so difficult for ordinary people? Why was everything so hedged about with restrictions? . . . Why didn't the Church understand that working men and women had hard lives, and wanted to lie in bed on Sundays? Christ would have understood. It was those ordinary things in ordinary lives He always had understood. Why then didn't His Church understand?" Thus the young parson argues with himself until, having married a divorced woman to the man she has run away with, he feels himself entirely out of harmony with the Church, and breaks from it. This to a married man with two young children means a terrible upheaval. He sends his wife and babies to her father's home, and goes to London in search of work. Nearly starving, he suffers a period of despair in which he loses all contact with his God. "I hate orthodox views and opinions," says the woman under whose spell he falls for a time. "I don't," he replies. "I wish I had them." He makes the appalling discovery that the world is governed by fear. "Fear, not God, is the primary motive of the universe. . . . That's the big fear, the fear of doing wrong. It's at the bottom of all the religions in the world." Because men were afraid "they made standards of right and wrong. They made gods, and when they went against those standards, they said that the gods were angry and would punish them." Thus he delves down through bitterest misery in quest of truth, and having touched the rock-bottom begins to struggle up again toward some glimmer of faith. "'All our relationships with other people are voyages of discovery.' And suddenly he thought: 'Is there a greatest discovery of all—is that God? Is that what we are here for—to explore and find Him?'"

Clement Dyson is a real person, intensely human, pathetic in his earnestness; and the other characters in the book are no less real—Joyce, his wife; Legard, who found consolation for his doubts in the Roman Catholic faith; Veronica, who understood Clement in his desperate struggles and did not know she was exercising a strange fascination over him; the younger people too, who are drawn with skill and sympathy and not a little humour. "The Ship of Truth" is a deeply interesting, sincere and courageous piece of work.

NONE SO PRETTY.[2]

Since "Jew Suss," writers of historical novels are conscientiously stripping the past of romance and presenting us with what are probably very true pictures of those bygone centuries to which Victorian fiction writers have given an heroic glamour. Of course writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were not themselves so delicate in describing their own periods, and we seem to be imitating them and speaking with a frankness which, if it destroys romance, certainly produces a background of reality. Miss Margaret Irwin, winner of the first prize in Messrs. Chatto & Windus's competition for the best historical novel, recreates in vivid detail the Caroline times, with their debauchery and loose living, showing the degraded position of women who, without education or any means of independence, were delivered from the bondage of their father's house to the bondage of their husband's. Little Nan Ingleby was pleased rather than otherwise to be sold with some of her mother's property to a neighbouring squire, at the age of seventeen. One of a large and lively family, she was merely a child, a "merry and friendless little creature" in her husband's great house, which she was incapable of managing. Furthermore her husband had no use for her; he kept a mistress at his lodge gates; and in her loneliness she turned to the squire's elderly chaplain, Mr. Cork, and half believed herself in love with him. Only when real love comes does she realise her error, and love—the real love—brings death in its wake. Miss Irwin has made of Nan a bright, pathetic figure, with her gay innocence, her girlish imaginings. If the story is sometimes sordid, it has flashes of beauty, and is lit with the magic of Nan's personality.

THE SEVENTH GATE.[3]

With "The Seventh Gate," Miss Muriel Harris has won the prize of £1,000 in Messrs. Jonathan Cape's competition for the best novel written in English. The judges were Miss Sheila Kaye-Smith, Mr. Hugh Walpole and Mr. Frank Swinnerton; so you may be sure that this is a book of uncommon merit—and indeed it is. The characters have an astounding and vigorous life of their own. The Troon family—the aged mother and two middle-aged sisters; Arnold Risaleur, the dreamy, disillusioned anthropologist, and his practical wife, and the minor characters too, are drawn with an exquisite realism and a richness of humour which gives them depth and vitality. They are indeed almost too real for the fantastic, though very original plot of the story. Catherine Troon, a faded, neurotic spinster, inspired by a theory set forth in an article by Arnold Risaleur, and assisted perhaps by a knock on the head, undergoes a remarkably swift process of evolution and becomes a genius. She concentrates all her forces on developing into a great singer, using everything to strengthen her power, wrecking hearts, shattering domestic ties. A woman without feeling, except for her one great passion, she grows young and beautiful, and only when she is brought in contact with Risaleur again—he whose strange theory created her—is the spell broken. But not so much for its plot—ingenious and unusual though it is—as for its character studies and delicious comedy, may "The Seventh Gate" be reckoned a novel of distinction and more than ordinary achievement.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.
A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

The Life of Lord Rosebery, by the Marquess of Crewe, is to be published in two volumes next year by Mr. John Murray.

An interesting book which the Cambridge Press is publishing is "New Links with Shakespeare," by E. A. B. Barnard. It is based on a collection of letters discovered at Hanley Court, Worcester, five years ago, and includes a signature of Henry Condell, one of the editors of the First Folio.

Mrs. Marion St. John Webb's new book of verse for children, "John and Me and the Dickery Dog," illustrated by Miss A. H. W. t.on, is to be published this month by Messrs. Harrap.

Mr. Augustine Birrell, whose new book of essays, "Et Cetera," has just been published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus.

Mr. Kennedy Williamson's "Life and Letters of W. E. Henley" will be published this month by Messrs. Brentano. Later in the year, or early next, we are to have a book on "The Literature of Prisons," on which Mr. Williamson is engaged at present in collaboration with Mr. J. A. R. Cairns, the Thames Police Court magistrate.

One of the cleverest, most ingenious mystery stories I have read for long past is "It Walks By Night" (Harpers). The pages at the end, in which the mystery is unravelled, are sealed up, and no reader should break the seal until he comes to it through all that goes before. No reviewer ought to give away the secret or do more than advise people to read the book—for it is well worth reading.

"Saturday Night" is the title Mr. Thomas Moult has given to his third novel, which Messrs. Heinemann are about to publish. In this he leaves his native Peakland and tells a story of the pathos and humour, comedy and tragedy of the multitudinous life of London.

Herr Karl Tschuppik's history of the Reign of the Austrian Emperor Francis Joseph will be published this month by Messrs. George Bell & Sons. This is a biography of the last of the Hapsburg monarchs as well as a history of Austria from 1848. An introductory note on Europe in 1848 is contributed by Professor R. W. Seton-Watson.

Last month the English Committee of the Femina Vie Heureuse and Northcliffe Prizes Committee awarded the Northcliffe Prize, which is given by Mr. Jonathan Cape, to the French writer, Léandre Vaillat, for his novel, "Le Sourire de l'Ange." The Femina Vie Heureuse prize for 1929-30 has been awarded by the French Committee to Mr. Charles Morgan for his novel, "Portrait in a Mirror." Both prizes will be presented at the Institut Français, South Kensington, in May.

A monumental and definitive edition of Cobbett's "Rural Rides," in three volumes, will be published by Mr. Peter Davies this month. The "Tours in Scotland" and "Letters from Ireland" are included in these volumes, which are edited by G. D. H. and Margaret Cole, and contain numerous vignettes by John Nash.

Messrs. Longmans' New York house is offering a prize of $2,000.00 for the best original unpublished story in English suitable for boys and girls from twelve to sixteen. MSS. must not be less than 50,000 nor more than 70,000 words in length, and must be received by Messrs. Longmans, 55, Fifth Avenue, New York, U.S.A., before September 1st next.

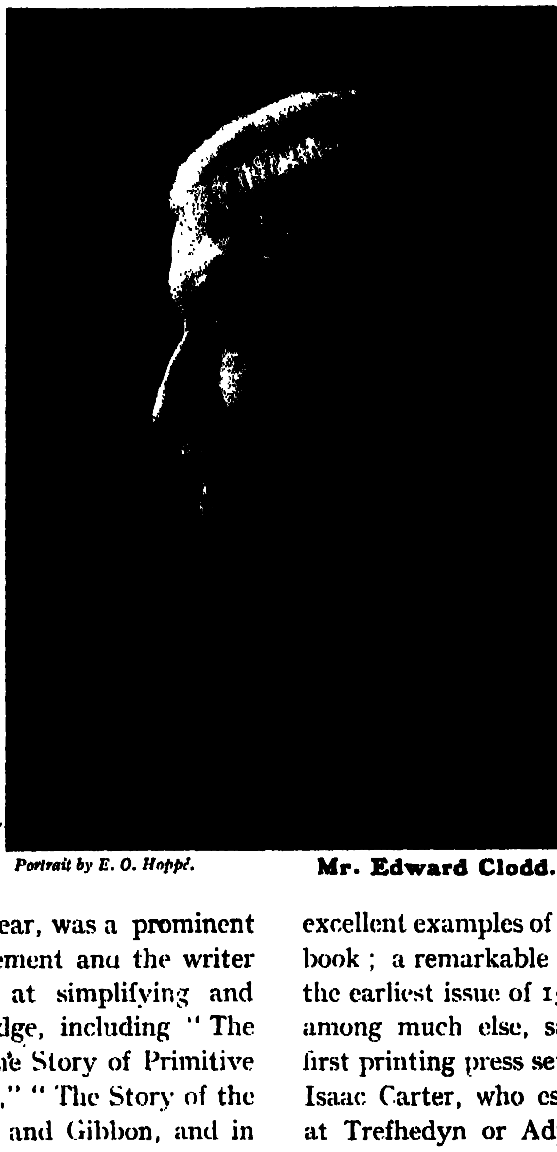
Author of "Dixon's Cubs." (Dent).



Major George Haven Putnam, head of the well-known American publishing house of G. P. Putnam's Sons, died in New York on the last day of February, in his eighty-sixth year. He was born in London, where his father had, in 1841, established a branch of the firm. His military title dated from the days of his youth, when he served with distinction through the American Civil War. Returning home after peace was declared in 1865, he joined his father's publishing business, and a year later came to London again to re-establish publishing relations which had been discontinued during the war. He told the story of his war experience in "Memories of My Youth," and of his later years in the two volumes of his "Memories of a Publisher." In addition to several other books, he wrote much on the subject of international copyright; following his father's example, he protested vigorously against the piracy of English books, and strove, as he said, to bring the law of copyright in America "into line with European copyright law." English authors owe him a considerable debt for the valuable and disinterested services he rendered in that direction. And England had no stauncher friend in America during the Great War, when in the press and on the platform, making nothing of his burden of seventy years and more, he championed the Allied cause and did much to bring his own people into sympathy with it. For long past the firm has had a branch establishment in Bedford Street, Strand, and Major Putnam never failed to pay an annual visit to London, where he will be greatly missed, for his friends here were legion. I shall not attempt to make a list of the famous authors for whom he published, nor to catalogue his various "best-sellers," which have ranged from "The Leavenworth Case" and Mrs. Barclay's "The Rosary" to the phenomenally successful "All Quiet on the Western Front" of the present day.

The late Major G. H. Putnam.

The Old Lady of Threadneedle Street, the staff magazine of the Bank of England, entered upon the tenth year of its existence with an interesting and well illustrated March Number on which the editor, Mr. J. A. Giuseppi, and his editorial committee are to be heartily congratulated. One of the most interesting articles in the Number is "Some Bank Memories of Fifty Years Ago," by Allan Fea, the well-known author of "The Flight of the King" and many other historical works. Mr. Fea became a clerk in the Private Drawing Office of the Bank "close upon half a century ago," and his lively, amusing anecdotes of himself and his colleagues in the eighties move the editor to remark, in his Editorial Notes, that those were days "when close attention and devotion to duty seemed able to walk hand in hand with almost unlimited leisure, and when life in all its courses flowed much more easily and smoothly." They were evidently days when men did not live at such high pressure as now, and when, as Mr. Fea says, "in all the Bank offices, big and small, could be found among the older hands some very remarkable specimens of humanity," such as are not met with in these strenuous times. He sketches one old gentleman, in one of the Transfer Offices, who still wore "knee-breeches and a high 'stock,'" and "rumour had it that in the virile days of the fourth George or William, he daily took his early morning row upon the Thames, carrying his weighty and tubby craft from his diggings in Crutched Friars to the water-side by the Old Swan Pier." There are some good stories and verse in the Number, reviews of recent books, a capital article on "The Failures of Dickens," by J. H. McNulty; reports of the doings of the Bank of England Sports Club and, in the Editorial Notes, of the Winter Lectures given by Ian Hay, Oliver Pike and Colonel John Buchan, and of other events of moment in the life of the Bank. The illustrations include a delicately finished pencil drawing of Waterloo Bridge, by A. J. F. Bond; Seymour Lucas's drawing of Allan Fea; other portraits and caricatures, a cartoon of Gillray's and a view of the Bank in the eighteenth century from an old print. In the miscellaneous literary and artistic contributions, there is so much that reflects the personalities and official and unofficial activities of the staff that one can appreciate the editor's statement that the magazine has become "so much an integral part of our social life that nothing but the direst calamity could assail its security." So I hope next century will find The Old Lady of Threadneedle Street still running, and that it will always be the only run on the Bank.

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. Edward Clodd.

Mr. Edward Clodd, who died last month at Aldborough in his ninetieth year, was a prominent figure in the Rationalist movement and the writer of many books that aimed at simplifying and popularising scientific knowledge, including "The Childhood of the World," "The Story of Primitive Man," "Pioneers of Evolution," "The Story of the Alphabet," studies of Huxley and Gibbon, and in 1916 he published his Memoirs. Abandoning an early intention of training for the Baptist ministry, he started a business career at fifteen; he became secretary to the London and Joint Stock Bank in 1872, and retired forty-three years later when he was 75. He was a fierce controversialist, but a genial, kindly man of many friends, chief among whom in their day were Gissing, Meredith and Hardy.

A lesser known side of George Washington's character and activities is dealt with in "The Unknown Washington," which Messrs. Scribner are publishing.

The "Confessions and Impressions of Ethel Mannin" will be published shortly by Messrs. Jarrold.

Mr. A. E. Baker, of Cardiff, writes to me: In connection with the St. David's Day celebrations this year and with a view to spreading the use of educational books and the study of the Welsh language, a Book Festival was opened in Cardiff from February 22nd to St. David's Day, March 1st. Emanating from the Rev. Gwilym Davies's experience of book festivals in France and Italy, the movement had the whole-hearted support of the Cardiff City Libraries Committee, who authorised their librarian to co-operate with the Festival Committee, and loaned a large hall in the City Hall for the exhibition, and also placed at the disposal of the committee for exhibition all the books and manuscripts that might be required from the priceless collection in the Welsh department of the Cardiff Central Library. The Welsh MSS. exhibited ranged from the unique Book of Aneirin (Y Gododdyn), a manuscript written 700 years ago, to the Welsh grammars of John Jones (1605–1610). There were excellent examples of the peithynen or bardic wooden book; a remarkable collection of Welsh Bibles from the earliest issue of 1567 to the edition of 1799, and, among much else, samples of the product of the first printing press set up in Wales, the printer being Isaac Carter, who established his business in 1718 at Trefhedyn or Adpar on the Cardiganshire side of the River Teivy, where the town of Newcastle Emlyn now stands. Hundreds of visitors attended the exhibition, and the committee are satisfied that their appeal to Welsh-speaking people to "pledge themselves to buy Welsh books" to recoup the authors and the publishers has gone very wide and reached the right public. During the week many parties of school children under their teachers from the industrial valleys and the surrounding districts visited the exhibition. Lectures were given each evening upon various subjects and each has been well attended. Altogether the first Welsh Book Festival has been an unqualified success, and the committee mean to repeat it.

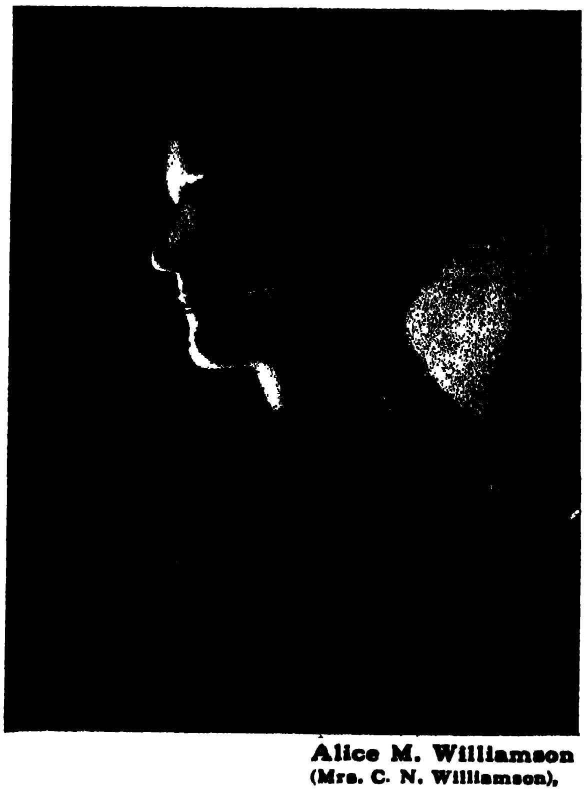
whose new novel, "The Secret of the Creek," has just been published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

An important book on Whitefield and his times, "George Whitefield the Awakener," by the Rev. A. D. Belden, superintendent of Whitefield's Tabernacle, will be published shortly by Messrs. Sampson Low. Mr Belden shows how the same neglect of religion, the same social misery, the same tragic war atmosphere existed in Whitefield's day as in ours, and that there is now, as there was then, the need of a great awakening. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has written a foreword for the book.

Mr. Somerset Maugham's first novel, "Liza of Lambeth," a vividly realistic tale of London slum life, written out of his experiences in the days when he was a doctor, has just been reissued by Messrs. Heinemann in the Travellers' Library series.



The abolition of Capital Punishment is the theme of Mr. James Owen's novel, "Deferred Payment." Commander Kenworthy has written an appreciative introduction to it and Messrs. Alston Rivers are its publishers.

The Temple still remains an oasis of old romance in a city that is fast becoming glaringly modern, and there was evidence in his first book, "The London Comedy," that Lieut.-Colonel C. P. Hawkes is sensitive to the magic that lingers in those ancient courts and lanes haunted by Johnson, Goldsmith, Lamb and a host of others famous in literature or the law. Literary men and women, as well as barristers of both sexes, have their offices or homes in the Temple still, and of these, and the porters and laundresses, and the social and business, literary, legal and general life of the place Colonel Hawkes has written in "Chambers in the Temple: Comments and Conceits in Camera," to be published this month by Messrs. Methuen.

Mr. Frank H. Shaw has completed a book of true stories of all the most famous shipwrecks in British naval and mercantile history. This, illustrated with authentic photographs, is to be published in May by Messrs. Elkin Mathews & Marrot.

There is an interesting interview with Mr. Warwick Deeping in the current issue of Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's excellent quarterly, The Book Window, in the course of which Mr. Deeping confesses that his thoughts have lately turned toward the stage; he has been working on an idea for a play, but does not yet know whether "it will ever come to anything." The interviewer deftly leads Mr. Deeping to speak of his methods of work—he never dictates or uses a typewriter—and to comment on that serene philosophy of life in his books which makes the restless, flashy ideals of the ultra-modernist seem immature and cheap. There are other good articles, in addition to reviews and notes on new books in this Number, and competition pages, including a capital "Children's Corner," in which prizes are offered for solutions of an ingenious cross-word puzzle built up round "Alice in Wonderland."

Most of us—for most of us are taxpayers—will read with a strong sympathetic interest "The Dupe as Hero," by "Logistes," which Mr. Jonathan Cape is publishing this month. The anonymous author knows his subject from the inside; he disentangles the intricacies of international finance and presents Great Britain as the heroic dupe who has been induced, for the sake of universal peace, to make such sacrifices to her own detriment that we are now struggling under heavier taxation than is imposed on any other nation.

We have received a reprint of a special "Artificial Silk" supplement to the Drapers' Organiser, all the colour and black-and-white engravings in which are the work of the Sun Engraving Co. The colour blocks, engraved direct from the fabrics, reproduce with exact fidelity the colour, texture and design of the various silks; these, and the admirable black-and-white illustrations, are a convincing testimony to the brilliant craftsmanship of the engravers.

I heard with much regret last month of the death of Mr. Charles Taylor, the well known bookseller and publisher. Mr Taylor served some years with Messrs. NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS

The first volume of the RETROSPECTIONS OF DOROTHEA HERBERT: 1770-1789 (7s 6d, Gerald Howe) was welcomed by a chorus of praise. Vivacious and entertaining it covered the writer's childhood years. This second volume is chiefly occupied with her love affair with John Roe, which ends unhappily, John Roe marrying another girl The scene is Southern Ireland, where Dorothea's father, the Rev Nicholas Herbert, resided at Carrick-on-Suir, and was also rector of the parish of Knockgrafton Her mother was a daughter of the first Lord Desart, and connections and neighbours, the Cuffes, Eyres, Blundens and others, figure largely in the narrative. Dorothea is an attractive person and she writes with naturalness and a naive frankness. It is interesting to trace the mark of her century upon her style. She describes John Roe as 'all that Female Heart could wish in its Fondest Excess," and she talks of "dispatching our kind Enquiries round to the Vicinage." Such dated phrases can be paralleled by others as modern as "After much humming and hawing she inquired whether I was not going to be married to John Roe." The book is lively and entertaining. "I flatter myself,' says Dorothea naively, on her last page, that these Retrospections" are not uninteresting."

THE EMPTY TOMB.

There must be very many to-day who doubt, if they do not deny, the fact of the Resurrection. Belief in it has been undermined by science, which tends to dismiss as miraculous, and so incredible, any phenomena which transcend the limits of its intellectual perception. Perhaps a deeper reason, however, and certainly a more justifiable one for modern scepticism, is the suspicion that the profound importance attached to the authenticity of the Resurrection by orthodox Church people and their leaders has often reflected that tenacious egotism which, as a possessive impulse, has wrought such evil in human life. For if experience teaches us anything, it is that in our most creative moments we surpass the personal, and a doctrine which has been so often cited to justify belief in personal survival of a most pronounced and material order, has been questioned because it contradicts spiritual experience even more than the apparent laws of nature. The Resurrection of Jesus, however, as it is recorded in the gospels and the triumphant conception derived from it by St. Paul, of the transmutation of the physical body into a spiritual body, are mysteries that remain to provoke doubt or carry conviction on their own intrinsic merits, which no false or fearful egotism can destroy.

We may believe in the Resurrection of Jesus by faith, upon the evidence of inward experience which attests His presence. And those who enjoy this experience are unlikely to feel the need of examining with critical thoroughness the facts of the gospel story. For every one however so placed, there are at least a hundred to-day who, like Thomas, cannot believe a mystery of which they doubt the foundation in fact. Or if they believe it, they do so with reservations and with an uneasy sense of conflict between the mystical side of them which would affirm the spiritual truth, and the rationalist side which would stress the material difficulties. To these (and I number myself as one of them), I cannot commend too highly Mr. Morison's book.* I cannot say after one reading that he has completely convinced me. For paradoxically his relentless powers of imaginative reconstruction put at first the critical mind on guard. But he has at least compelled me to recognise that the difficulty of explaining away the facts of the Resurrection is at least as great as that of accepting them.

The way in which his book has come to be written is interesting, and explains to some extent the weighty impression which it makes. It was as a young man some thirty years ago, he tells us, that he first began seriously to study the life of Jesus with a deep and reverent regard for His person, but with a very definite feeling that His history rested upon insecure foundations, and that, in Huxley's words, "miracles do not happen." And to clear his mind he conceived the idea of writing a short monograph on what seemed to him the supremely important and critical phase in the life of Jesus—the last seven days—stripping it of its overgrowth of primitive beliefs and dogmatic supposition, in order to "see this supremely great Person as He really was."

That book however was never written or, as he puts it, "refused to be written." And when ten years later the opportunity came to investigate the material more thoroughly and sift some of the evidence at first-hand, the result was a revolution in his thought. To quote his own words: "Slowly but very definitely the conviction grew that the drama of those unforgettable weeks of human history was stranger and deeper than it seemed. It was the strangeness of many notable things in the story which first arrested and held my interest. It was only later that the irresistible logic of their meaning came into view."

* "Who Moved the Stone?" By Frank Morison. 6s. (Faber & Faber.)

This book therefore represents something deeper than a critical examination of documents and a weighing of the opinions of other critics in the same field. Mr. Morison has indeed weighed his material critically, and he never ceases to do so. But he has done something more significant. He has made the astounding drama which he is studying part of his own life, entering into each of the characters by an act of imagination in which negative judgment is transformed into positive insight. The whole of his reconstruction of what happened between the arrest of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane on Thursday night, and the discovery of the empty tomb early on Sunday morning, is knit together by a creative as distinct from a merely critical logic. Equally in weighing the veracity of the earliest documents and in fitting together the events which they seem at first to disclose with so much ambiguity, he applies the test of a creative insight, which visualises the situation at every point through the eyes of those who were participating in it, and judges it in reference to what we know of human nature. Such questions as "What would be the psychological state and position of the disciples? How would they behave? What urgent considerations would press for solution?" are typical. And he applies them with no less cogency to the actions or the inactions of the High Priestly party. I have not space to quote examples of his psychological penetration. But to me at least he is the first to explain convincingly the part which Judas played both in its relation to Jesus and the Jewish leaders, the character and the conduct of Pilate, and the incident of Claudia's dream. But it is in his reconstruction of what happened when the women came early to the tomb and fled from it, trembling and astonished, and in his explanation of the moved stone and the young man sitting within in a white garment, that his powers of imaginative logic are applied with most remarkable effect to the evidence of the gospels.

Admittedly there are times when he tends to claim certainty for what seems to me no more than conjectural probability, but there is no weak link in his chain of induction. He has approached his material too without any religious preconception, but while he is always far too absorbed in its human significance to show a trace of religiosity, he communicates also some of its spiritual overtones and undertones. His interpretation of the greatest of all historical mysteries may not convince those to whom the laws of nature, as science defines them, are incontrovertible. But even they will have to admit that the story as Mr. Morison has told it is no sanctified legend, that it is full of facts which ring true to human experience, and that no mystery story is so deeply poignant or so charged with wonder and excitement.

THAT NEW WORLD.*

"The Don Quixote of the Seas" the author calls his hero, and throughout this most interesting book justifies the sobriquêt by comparing incidents in the life of each; indeed he goes so far as to hint that Cervantes had some such figure as Columbus in mind when he created the immortal Knight of La Mancha.

But it is not this comparison that forms the main interest of Herr Wasserman's study; it is his revelation of Columbus the man as a weak, opinionated dreamer, incapable of realising the truth of his discovery, hopelessly incapable of administering the lands over which, at his own demand, he held sway. To the end of his life he maintained that America was no new continent, but an outlying part of India, and spent much fruitless effort in trying to locate Japan along its eastern coast. Nothing would move him from the belief that his crew (composed, by the way, entirely of liberated convicts) could walk westward dry-foot from the West Indies to Spain. In the course of his cruising, he found an island with a mountain in the middle, probably one of the Antilles; there, he claimed, was the genuine, veritable, and original Garden of Eden, and the authentic Paradise—and no argument could shift him. In the New World (the phrase, according to Herr Wasserman, is of Columbus's own coining) his unpractical conduct on the one hand and his far too practical lust for gold with which to back up his assertion of discovery on the other, quickly alienated the simple natives and led inevitably to the Spanish horrors of cruelty and debauchery which characterised the succeeding centuries.

Still, had it not been for his inner light, which outshone every kind of disillusionment—ridicule, neglect, poverty, contempt and deception—America might not have been discovered for many a long year, and the course of world history would have been fundamentally different. Wrong in so many ways, in his unshakable belief he was triumphantly right; he convicted the wise and prudent of blindness in their wisdom and craven superstition in their prudence. For all his weakness in affairs, all his faults of character, he was essentially great, with the greatness of the visionary; and feminists will not be slow in noting that his one disciple, his one support in his tremendous conviction, was a woman, Isabella of Spain. Had it not been for her, Columbus might well have done nothing, and remained in the eyes of the world a fantastic lunatic.

Herr Wasserman brings the novelist's skill to bear on his story; Columbus lives, almost day by day, in his pages. It is perhaps ungracious to suggest that our faith in the author would have been enhanced by a note of his sources, and our gratitude to the publishers had they thought fit to provide us with an index.

Editor of British Weekly

THE SOUL OF RUSSIA.*

For thirty years Dr. John Hutton has been a student of Russian literature, and has lectured upon it to hundreds of audiences. In the little book before us he has elaborated the point of view with which readers who have heard his lectures will already be familiar. The book, though it reflects on every page a wide and thorough knowledge of its subject, and while its quotations and references are always appositely selected, does not pretend to be an actual introduction to the story of Russian fiction—which for Dr. Hutton is Russian literature. It is with Russia herself that the writer is concerned, and he turns to her fiction because it is mainly there that the soul of her people has, through its writers of genius, been able to find expression. The reason, says Dr. Hutton, for the fact that fiction is the outstanding medium of the Russian soul is obvious:

> "Thwarted by the political restraints under which she grew up, the first instinct which she shared with all peoples of the earth—to speak in the language of poetry and metaphor—was never interrupted in her case or diverted. In a word, forbidden by the Censor to take her freedom in the region of ideas, forbidden to make her public protests and amendments, driven in upon herself, she could only relieve herself in music, in dancing—and in fiction. She had to contrive some way by which she could speak, so that the rulers 'hearing might hear and not understand, and seeing might see and not perceive.' That medium she found in fiction, which became in her most subtle hand a terrible engine of protest and propaganda."

It was the fiction of Russia, adds Dr. Hutton, that undermined Russia; "the Russia of the old regime was overthrown by sheer Art. That great event, the reverberations of which have by no means exhausted themselves, was due first and last to the gnawing effect, upon the most recalcitrant material, of edged words passionately driven home."

It must not be supposed, from these words, that Dr. Hutton is any lover of the new political order. But the prime value of his book is that it is written not merely with knowledge but with understanding: He sees things in true perspective and gives us a keen sense of the difficulties, not merely political, but geographical and climatic, against which Russia has had to contend. If he hates her present official despotism no less than the one which it has supplanted, he sees it as a necessary stage of development, and supplies good reasons at once for its present existence and for the belief that it cannot indefinitely continue. Dr. Hutton's analysis of the historical and temperamental causes of the Russian obsession with distributism, and his comparison of the reactions of Marxism upon the German and the Russian mind, are full of subtle insight and deserve the closest possible attention by all who feel, with him, that a right comprehension of Russia by the rest of Europe is indispensable to the future peace and well-being not only of Russia herself, but of the whole world.

The virtues and vices of the Russian temperament are at present strangely intertwined; but its very vices spring from virtue misapplied or still unliberated. There is an unconquerable inwardness about the Russian soul which is in sharp opposition to Western objective values, and which we must come to understand on its own terms—or neglect at our extreme peril. The Russians, Dr. Hutton shows by illustrations from their fiction, may often be sensual; but they are never satisfied by sensuality. They may often be lazy; but their laziness, reflecting the spiritual activity of a people driven back upon themselves by the inhospitality of outward conditions, is a very different thing from our laziness. They may often be sad; but in their very melancholy there is truer joy than is to be found in mere pleasure or gaiety.

It is only a superficial judgment which cannot see the humour at the heart of Russian fiction—which finds it "depressing." A pessimist has been described as one who has lived with an optimist; and indeed there is nothing less cheering to the depths of a man's nature than a perpetual surface cheerfulness. The Russian spirit has the final laugh because, deprived of everything else, it still has its dream; and that dream may yet prove more substantial than the so-called "realities" of our Western world.

To judge Russia by our own standards is inevitably to misjudge her. To unravel the enigma and the paradox which she presents to us requires an effort of subtle and imaginative sympathy. Dr. Hutton is to be thanked for a very interesting and very gallant attempt.

THE TEACHING OF ENGLISH.*

It was Dr. Robert Bridges who suggested to Mr. Palmer that he should write this little book, and Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch has written an introductory note warmly commending the book to teachers because "it grips and holds the root of the matter." Unfortunately for the profession, Mr. Palmer is no longer a schoolmaster; but he has had over twelve years of experience in English schools, nearly two years in French schools, and seven years of educational work in Germany. When it is added that the author is an extremely " live " personality and has excellent judgment of literature, and also that he has written a play and five volumes of poetry, his right to speak to teachers with authority is surely self-evident.

" The Teaching of English " is a short book written in an easy, colloquial style, and is full of good things. For example :

" The aims of Education should be turned starwards. And in detail they are to ensure accuracy, and yet not pedantry in accuracy ; to promote skill and readiness in small things to promote capacity for skill and readiness in large things ; to develop efficiency and yet not petrification in efficiency ; to instil knowledge and promote desire for still further knowledge ; to train the understanding and develop common sense and reasonableness ; to develop the instinct for Beauty in its many aspects and phases ; to cultivate the Imagination and yet not at the expense of the common healthy impulses of life ; to promote right taste ; to teach chivalry and good manners ; to teach the heart to know itself, the soul to sympathise with its fellows ; to make plain the importance of Truth and the differences between Truth and a lie. . . . Also to uprear the flag of Honour on the obelisk of Courage, and inculcate Religion and the love of God."

One can imagine the shade of Ruskin applauding that passage, but a modern educationist might be a trifle alarmed by such a pronouncement. " Is the child nothing more than clay in the hands of the potter ? " he would exclaim. " Are we to mould him to our heart's desire ? " Frankly, if Mr. Palmer were a crank, a child would have to fight like a devil to save his soul alive. But there is no need for panic. " Never should a teacher violently impose his personal point of view upon the child," declares the author.

The Board of Education suggests the study of Addison for children of thirteen, and certain inspectors have imposed Addison on children of ten and eleven. Mr. Palmer disagrees :

"In spite of his paraded innocence, Addison is too genteel and worldly wise, too artificial, too much a creature of the coffee-rooms, parks and fashionable streets to become popular with small boys, who are primitive in their outlook, passionate in their initiative. Addison was the cultured moral writer of an extremely artificial age, and he is no more to be recommended to young children in large doses than is Pope or Dryden to any form below the top one."

Mr. Palmer suggests hundreds of books, including many by living writers, and his treatment of poetry is admirable. He believes that many fine passages should be learnt by heart. Young children are usually the worst sufferers in school : they are either given poetry which is beyond them (Milton's " Lycidas " for example), or rubbish ! They need something primitive and dramatic, of course, but " it must not be one which they are expected to outgrow. It must be rudimentally good." Mr. Palmer suggests dozens of poems that are suitable from the age of ten onwards.

The common weakness in English teaching is the tendency to give a collection of unrelated exercises—an essay first, then a punctuation exercise, then dictionary practice, then a bit of grammar, followed by a talk on drama or the writing of an original lyric. In science, mathematics, history and foreign languages the teacher cannot help himself ; the subjects must move forward in logical steps. But in English, drawing and painting it is always possible to " carry on," like a political opportunist, without any perceptible unifying scheme. When Mr. Palmer writes his next book on the teaching of English perhaps he will offer some suggestions ?

A QUARTET.*

Still another variation of the imperishable romance surrounding the Rising of 1715 comes from Mr. Fletcher's pen.[1] This time however it is only the bare fringe or even the shadow of royalty that is glimpsed, the Prince never actually coming into focus. Into the space of a few weeks are packed the exciting adventures of a maternal ancestor, attainted of high treason for his share in the Rising. Fleeing from his ancient castle in Scotland, the young Lord Stirthes arrived on the Yorkshire moors disguised as a cattle drover, and from that point we follow his narrow escapes, discoveries and friendships until a full pardon is obtained for him by his uncle, the Earl of Carlisle, and the fulfilment of a delightful romance is made possible. The story is engagingly told, but one reader at any rate has been equally inveigled with the vivid glimpses of moorland life, its timeless institutions, customs and habits. With almost uncanny reality Boroughbridge comes to life on the day of Barnaby Fair, a vastly different Boroughbridge from that of to-day, busy thoroughfare to the north though it still is. We peep at " various booths whereat all manner of commodities, from gay neckerchiefs to ploughboys' whip-lashes, were being sold, and at the stages and platforms whereon mountebanks were cutting their capers and quack doctors extolling their nostrums." In those days too it was an active port ; small vessels from York and Hull would bring merchandise for Ripon and the Western Dales. Delightful descriptions of the moors and wolds are deftly interwoven and bring a reminder of the gipsies- " streams which break out of the surface in the chalk valleys at intermittent periods." Nowhere else in England is this phenomenon seen, and here only in very wet seasons, with the exception of one permanent one flowing between Wold Newton and by North Burton and Rudston, eventually running into the sea near Bridlington. Mr. Fletcher has been no niggard in filling in his colourful background, which stretches back to the days of the mound, the barrow and the camp-dwelling of the semi-barbarous forerunners of Saxon and Norseman and Dane. Historical knowledge has guided a vividly descriptive pen to good purpose.

It is with rather a sense of having missed something intimate and fine that we make the acquaintance of the five little people who star in Miss Duffy's second book.[2] It was not our good fortune to read " Both Sides of the Railings " or we should doubtless have started on the friendliest terms, not only with them, but with their wonderful Rainbow-Lady, who just as this book opens is being married to her Story-book Man. Out of some of the most abundant and commonplace material to be found — the youngsters who throng the public parks and back streets — Miss Dufty has woven one of the choicest stories, one which echoes with laughter and pulls no less surely at one's very heartstrings. With rare insight and delicate sympathy she reveals the warm hearts, the staunch loyalty as well as the cheery optimism that lay beneath those shabby garments. To Stella, the forlorn little dreamer and embryo artist, came the good fortune of acquiring a hitherto unknown father. We could say much of that father, brimming over with love for his little girl, with boisterous good spirits, and fortunately with plenty of money, but we will leave it for those interested to find out what he did for Stella and "her Pollie's and Addy's and things." Once again Miss Dufty has taken a piece of the most commonplace material and made of it a thing of real beauty.

In the two remaining books an ultra-modern note is struck which will be rather bewildering to those who have not kept pace with the march of progress in the youthful attitude. In both the high colouring is intentional for the working out of the ruling idea. Mrs. Hill,[3] with the best of intentions, has rather heavily laboured her point and at the same time strained our credence. It is difficult to reconcile the father's fond idea of his family with the facts, and to believe that he could be so blind; his actions too, when he realises the truth, are somewhat over-violent. Good intentions are by no means sufficient, and we are afraid the book loses power of persuasion through its lack of balance. In "Artificial Silk"[4] the same voice of modern youth is clamouring, full of impatience, doubt and questioning, but it is expressed with a vivacity and verve that has a sincere ring. Silk designers and manufacturers have their share in the title, but it chiefly refers to the fact that all are measured according to the standard of real or artificial—the finer or less fine qualities. Miss Orr looks well beneath the surface, and adroitly depicts the real in unmistakable contrast to the artificial. There is good writing, and a spirited enthusiasm that never flags.

RAMPANTLY ADORING.*

Alexander lisped in numbers; but Miss Edith Sitwell has given him the whole Pentateuch—if not, there is no telling how far Miss Sitwell would go. The jacket of her new book shows her fresh come from a dance in Botticelli's "Primavera" to lean an arm on the pedestal of the master's bust in an attitude, and with a sideways glance, of adoration. She preserves the attitude throughout the book. Is it only an attitude? Surely not! Although the enthusiasm is extreme for so precise a lady, there is no mistaking those broken accents, the almost incoherent rush of syllables and images, the cæsura which is a sob.

In reviewing this her first full-length prose work, I find it interesting to recall the first occasion when I met her in the verse. Everybody remembers "Wheels." At least I do. They rolled right over me, and left me comparatively flat. The first volume, and even the second, met with a great deal of silly criticism. I criticised "Wheels," and perhaps my judgment was silly, but I still hold to it: it was this: that in the chaos there were patches of exquisite order; and that, though some of the imagery far overshot its mark, there were enough great images in the books to provide the stock-in-trade for a dozen working poets. And I found that the finest—no, the biggest—images were in the verses of Miss Edith Sitwell.

Miss Sitwell, the poet, has changed much since then. She has attained a certain prim yet sprightly perfection. True she tends to express the emotions excited by one of the senses in terms of another of them; but that is formula: there is no wildness in it. And I marvel that she is able to express so much and so finely—yes, fine is now the word—within such narrow limits, like Shelley's skylark in a silver cage.

* "Alexander Pope." By Edith Sitwell. 15s. (Faber & Faber.)

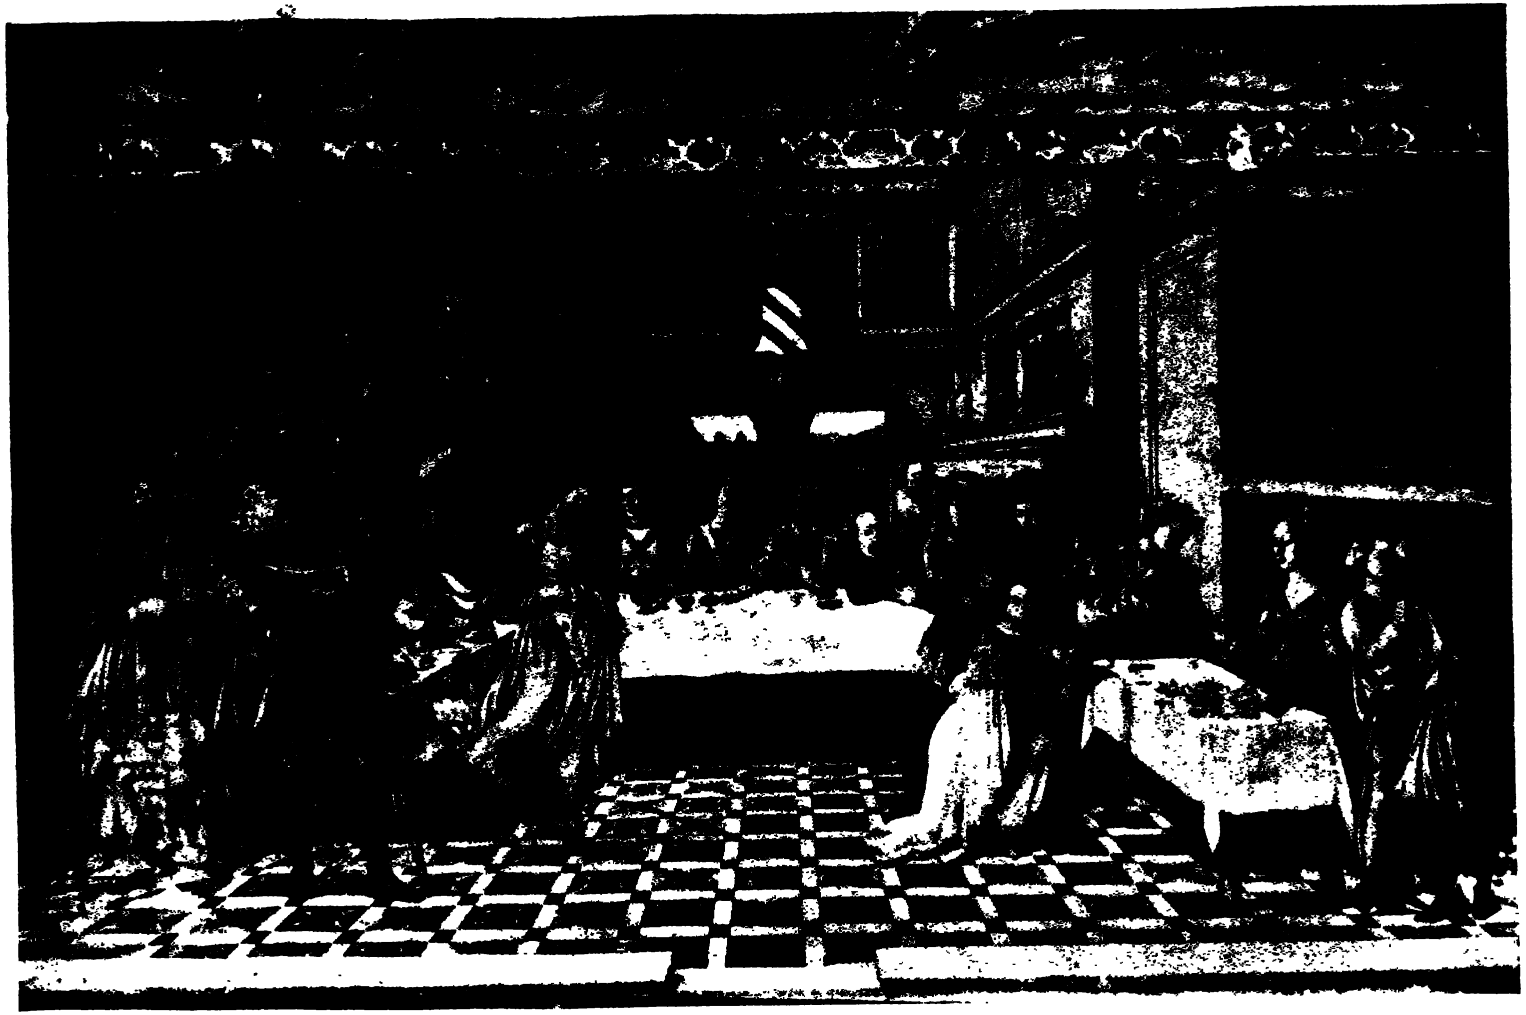
Well, in this her first full-length prose work Miss Sitwell flies out of her cage and back to the manner of "Wheels." The book is chaos lit with lightning flashes. Her enthusiasm for Mr. Pope knows no limits, nor her scorn, her contempt for his critics. The scorn does not surprise me, since I seem to remember that in her battles with contemporary reviewers Miss Sitwell has shown herself an adept at invective, but here the invective pours out white hot, not only against Pope's detractors, but against all the moderns, including persons who write about beer, or indeed about anything. The enthusiasm surprises me very much indeed: it is so girlish. And it is so likeable.

Miss Sitwell is out to prove two things: first, that Pope is one of our greatest poets; second, that he was one of the most lovable of men. She proves the second; I think she fails to prove the first. I do not mean that I dispute Pope's claim to greatness, but that his champion's defence is a weak one.

The bulk of the book however is the story of Pope's life. I would that it were, in two senses, plainer. Some of the lyric flights are magnificent, but more of them are—well, girlish. And Miss Sitwell is so deeply in love with Alexander that she does not see him as clearly as she sees Swift, Gay, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Atterbury and Bolingbroke. Swift she sees more clearly than any, and paints his tragedy with inimitable touches unto the terrible last years when he "was like the eyeless stone statue of a giant in a tropical forest."

Lady Mary she sees because she hates her so. I like this spurt of venom: "a dilapidated macaw, with a hard, piercing laugh, mirthless and joyless, with a few unimaginative phrases, with a parrot's powers of observation, and a parrot's hard and poisonous bite."

As to Pope himself, Miss Sitwell puts the evidence before us—impartially, in spite of her enthusiasm—and the evidence convinces us. As a matter of fact, I know at least one writer rather like him. And I can well understand the vain, lovable, vindictive, generous little man to whom lying came natural. The dastardly attacks on him by Dennis and Lady Mary made him bitter, perhaps, though I must believe that he had always had a splendid strength of hatred; but no doubt the lying came natural. He was one of those romancers who live almost all their days in an unreal world—William James's pragmatic world, wherein things are what you want them to be. He was a boy—a boy scout, and a Red Indian, and a romantic lover (God help him!), and he rewrote—and even readdressed—his letters to his friends before he published them. Of course he was vain. God made him a cripple that he might write. Should he not exult in his one great gift? I am wrong, though. As Miss Sitwell shows us, he had another great gift: courage, and of that he does not seem to have been aware.



The story fails for me in three particulars. (1) It gives me no clear idea of what Pope was like—yes, notwithstanding the above general description which I recognise so well. (2) It states that he loved his mother dearly; yet Mrs. Pope remains a thin shadow: we are not shown her living beside and fussing round her beloved son. (3) And, worst of all, the tragedy of Martha Blount and Pope fails to occur. We read of their early meetings, and get almost near to her; we read of Pope's misunderstanding with her sister Teresa; there is a long hiatus, and then we learn in an aside that Martha was his close and tender friend throughout his life. That is a great pity, for the clean and passionate friendship of Pope for Martha Blount is, as our author knows well enough, the heart of the matter.

So far from it are you that when Pope rededicates to Lady Mary lines at first addressed to Martha you wonder if his first and only love were anything more than a tragic phantom in his unreal world. It needs this letter of Pope's to prove the contrary: "My poor father died last night. Believe me, if I do not forget you this moment I never shall." Whereto Martha replies: "Sir, my sister and I shall be home all day. If any company comes that you do not like, I'll go up to my room with you. I hope we shall see you." Oh, yes, here is reality, that is true love. But Miss Sitwell, perhaps because she is too eager to prove things, obscures the tale.

And come now, since we are talking of proofs, I seem to be on Miss Sitwell's side in her argument that the subject of a poem matters little. But I am not. Her subject was either the life and tragedy of Alexander Pope, or a polemic against his detractors. Her fault lies in her divided aim.

As for verse, the subject matters supremely. Poetry is the garment of a thought which rises to ecstasy. But Miss Sitwell would have us believe that she goes to church for the sake of the vestments. Of course she doesn't. And Pope proves her case against her. As a poet Pope had only one really strong emotion—hatred. He liked moralising, had a keen relish for it, and so he wrote some spirited didactic poems. His occasional verses, his essays in description—nearly all of the finest texture, as Miss Sitwell proves, are nevertheless namby-pamby stuff. But when he hates he takes fire. His mastery of technique—and of that no doubt he was a master—elsewhere wasted on virtuoso-exercises for the pianoforte, gives him full power to scorch and scalp and slay. You had thought that in his hands the heroic couplet was a gentle ambling creature: you were wrong; it is capable of any pace, of any gesture. There is passion in the portrait of Lord Hervey in the "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot," but it is only in the "Dunciad," our greatest satire, that the landscape widens and darkens, and the thunder and lightning come.

Miss Sitwell may think that the "Rape of the Lock" is one up to her. If so, I disagree. In dealing with any emotion but hatred Pope was trivial except in this poem, where the emotion is quite unreal and the subject trivial, and there he achieved a dainty perfection.

Miss Sitwell's highfalutin is sometimes painful and often funny, but when she does come off! Ah, then! One of the few occasions upon which she gives us the very perfume—and the whiff—as well as the colour of Pope's century is in the beginning of Chapter XI (pages 138 and 139). It is too long to quote, but I commend it to the attention of the judicious. Here are colour and movement indeed; this breathes and glows.

An interesting book. When Miss Sitwell writes her Jonathan Swift," may I be there to read.

ART IN ITALY AND ENGLAND.

Though the great exhibition at the Academy is over, the interest in Italian art continues, and each month new books on the subject supply more information to those in search of greater knowledge. Many people who now for the first time realise the extent and magnitude of Italian mediæval painting have expressed a mild wonderment why in these centuries there should have been so much painting in Italy and so little in England. We shall see later that there was painting in England even in these early times, but meanwhile the explanation of Italy's initiative in this matter, as well as manifold proofs of the splendour of her achievement, may be found in a new volume by Professor Tancred Borenius on "Florentine Frescoes."[1]

The revival of painting in Italy was largely due to the economic need of the churches for something that would combine decoration with religious instruction. In the south, where sunshine is plentiful, the architectural ideal is to build so that an interior provides coolness and shade. In northern countries the architectural ideal is the exact opposite, the desirable attributes of an interior being light and warmth. Consequently the Italian churches presented large areas of blank wall spaces which were most easily and quite suitably decorated by wall paintings. In northern countries those blank walls had to be pierced more and more with windows to give light to the interior. Consequently, while painting was in Italy the major element in church decoration, in northern lands it was only a subsidiary ornamentation. The true English equivalents of the frescoes by Giotto, Masaccio, Fra Angelico and their successors—superbly reproduced in colours in Dr. Borenius's book—are the stained glass windows in our cathedrals and old churches.

[1] "Florentine Frescoes." By Tancred Borenius. £7 7s. (Jack.)—[2] "St. Christopher in English Mediæval Wall-Painting" By H. C. Whaite. 10s. 6d. (Ernest Benn.)

While we are ever grateful to Vasari for handing down to posterity details of the lives of so many famous artists, we have now learnt how terribly unreliable he was as an authority. Himself a Florentine, he was a violent partisan, and his bias causes him to give an entirely false account of the beginnings of the Florentine school. What had previously been done in other cities he practically ignores, and he presents his fellow citizen Cimabue not merely as the "Father," but practically as the recreator of Italian painting. Modern research however has proved incontestably that:

> "An unbroken line of descent from Classical and early Christian art first takes us down to the great work of the Roman School of the eighth century—the series of frescoes in the Church of Santa Maria Antiqua in the Forum."

There follows the period of Carlovingian art, of which the outstanding examples are the frescoes in the Lower Church of San Clemente, dating from about the middle of the ninth century—and thence on the progress of painting in Rome can be traced clearly till there arises in the thirteenth century the great figure of Pietro Cavallini. Modern research has established the fact that Cimabue was working at Rome in 1272, and must have been influenced by the painting he saw there; that at this time—when Giotto was little more than an infant—Cavallini was a Roman artist of experience and established reputation; and finally that Cavallini subsequently painted some frescoes at the Church of St. Francis in Assisi, whither the young Giotto came, probably as an apprentice of Cimabue, to learn his trade of wall painting. True, Vasari does just mention Cavallini, but he describes him as a "pupil of Giotto"! This is putting the cart before the horse with a vengeance.

Imagine a too enthusiastic Oxonian writing a history of English poetry, praising Cary as the translator of Dante and author of the "Elegy on a Country Churchyard," and dismissing Gray in a few lines as a mere imitator of Cary—then you get a notion of the veracity and dependableness of Vasari.

Dr. Borenius straightens these matters out, goes deeply yet clearly and concisely into the relations between Cavallini, Cimabue and Giotto, and with impartial justice allots to each the credit which is fairly due.

How then does it come about, if Rome had an unbroken succession of decorative artists from classical times, that the revival of painting in Italy is always associated with Florence? To this there are two explanations, one material, the other historical. In the earlier centuries, following a fashion set by Constantinople, it was more usual for these church decorations to be executed in mosaics instead of in fresco. Hence though there were paintings executed in Rome during these centuries, we are apt to think of this early Roman art in terms of mosaics. Secondly, as Dr. Borenius tells us:

> "The Roman school of painting . . . was brought to an abrupt end as a result of the calamities which overtook Rome at the beginning of the fourteenth century, when the Pope was dragged to Avignon, and the eternal city was left a prey to internal discord and misery. . . . The centre of gravity of Italian art shifts into Tuscany, where Florence becomes the leading city."

For the general reader the term fresco demands a word of explanation which Dr. Borenius also gives:

> "Fresco—or more fully buon fresco—denotes the technique whereby wall paintings are mainly carried out in pigments, mixed with water, on the plaster (of sand and lime), while still wet ("fresco"). It was the technique preponderantly used in Italy all through the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, though . . . occasional more or less experimental and exceptional departures were made from it, and the practice of retouching the fresco when set (a secco) is of long standing—ultramarine, for example, was always applied a secco with an egg vehicle. English mediæval wall paintings, on the other hand, though often loosely termed frescoes, were executed in a radically different technique, on the plaster after it had set, the pigments never penetrating very deeply into the plaster."

This note reminds us that, in addition to many valuable contributions to art criticism from his own pen, Dr. Tancred Borenius, as Durning-Lawrence Professor of the History of Art in London University, has been the means of encouraging others to art research. A most promising pupil of his, Mr. H. C. Whaite, has devoted much time to making faithful copies of extant mural paintings of St. Christopher in English churches and admirable reproductions of these, with Mr. Whaite's scholarly commentary, are given in the first of what is to be a much-needed series of monographs on various aspects of English mediæval art.[2] The method of these English painters, as described above, is one reason why so many of these fifteenth century and earlier English wall paintings have vanished or are vanishing; and the wholesale destruction of art works during the latter part of the reign of Henry VIII further accounts for their comparative rarity. Yet, as Mr. Whaite's plates prove, they are worth preserving, several of them having genuine æsthetic beauty as well as undeniable archæological interest.

It is good to know that efforts, however tardy, are now being made to preserve these relics of our own native mediæval painting, for these have their importance in our own national life and history even if they cannot rank for excellence with those masterpieces of Florentine frescoes, from Giotto to Andrea del Sarto, which Dr. Borenius discusses in his erudite and fascinating volume. With its wealth of illustrations in colour and monochrome, this sumptuous work is certainly the best and most comprehensive book on the subject that has yet appeared.

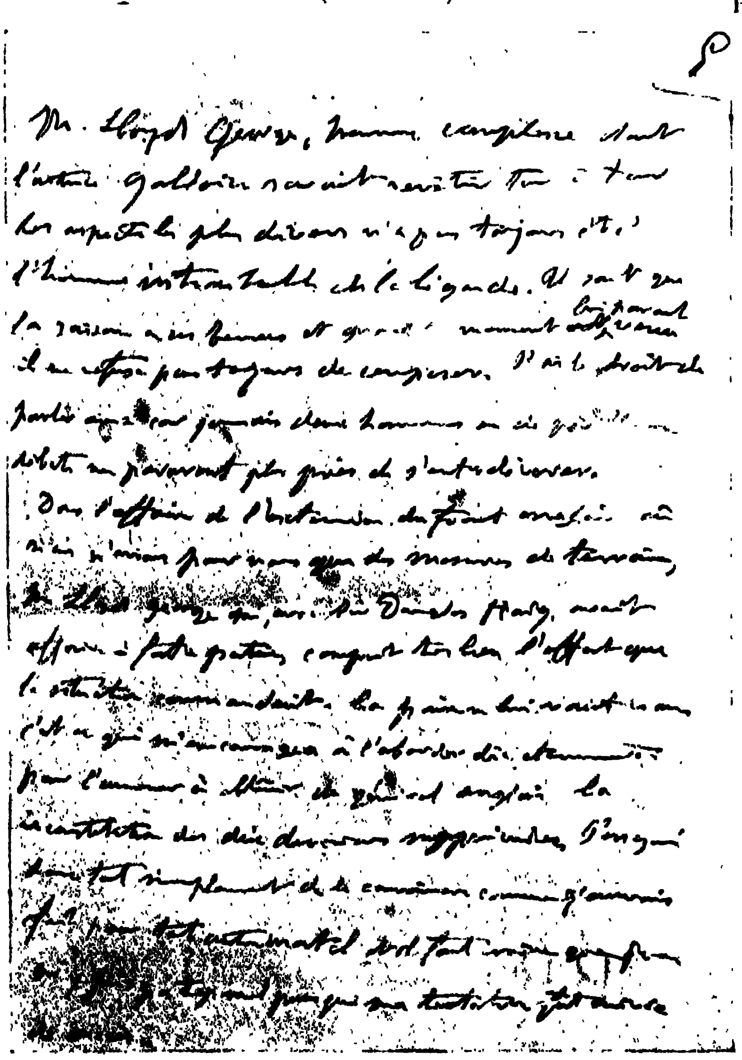
THE GOTHICK NORTH.*



One hesitates to define the contents of the third and concluding volume of "The Gothick North," lest by so doing there should be spoiled by suggestion the impression of its delightful desultoriness. It would be difficult to say by what apparently haphazard—in reality cunningly ordered—ways we reach its cumulative picture of the monastic life. We approach it through a double encounter with beggars on a Spanish road: "ascetics and beggars there have always been, and always will be, and in their extremes of achievement these two strange careers come nearer to each other than might be imagined"; saying which, Mr. Sitwell adds a half-promise to write a history and a handbook to beggars one day, "for there is no doubt that, the lunatic asylum always excepted, we can study early man to better advantage among beggars and monks than anywhere else."

Then he plunges into a description of the Refectory and the Common Room as seen in the paintings (the former here reproduced) of Alessandro Magnasco, and by and by, back a century or two, to the chilly cell of the illuminator—for though some of its trophies may be the work of lay artists, their handiwork was the complete and final development out of the cloister. Such are the miniatures in a (Huth) Book of Hours in the British Museum—its little roundels of the months in the Calendar, and its flower paintings in the borders; the poems of Christine de Pisan, a Harleian MS., with miniatures descriptive of the dying feudal age; and the Prayer Book of Charles the Bold of Burgundy, in the Imperial Library in Vienna, with its wonderful painting of Maximilian and Maria of Burgundy kneeling at prayer in a great cathedral. This last, and examples from the other MSS., are illustrated. There follows an excursion among the miniatures of Persia, Bihzad's in particular, from which we pass to Eastern temples, and back again to building in the West, and in especial the Catalonian monasteries, like Poblet and Santas Creus, and those of Alcobaça, Batalha and Thomar in the centre of Portugal.

By these devious yet considered discursions is the subject illuminated, our minds meanwhile kept alert by the writer's freaks of fancy and provocative reflections. It is the same in "The Fair-Haired Victory," the volume's other essay, in which it is traced how definitely and for ever established became the predilection of the Italians for the fair Northern type. Benozzo Gozzoli, Signorelli, Botticelli, Pisanello, Piero della Francesco, the masters of the High Renaissance, the Venetians especially, all are invoked to prove how the Italians who had made a spiritual conquest over the great kingdoms lying to the north of the mountains acknowledged the greater resources of their enemy and paid this tribute to the strength they had subdued. This is Mr. Sitwell's fair-haired victory.

TWO GREAT ENGLISHWOMEN.*

To appreciate Miss Thomson's "survey," whereon a large amount of loving toil has been expended, the reader must already have considerable familiarity with Jane Austen's work, or must read each novel before seeking Miss Thomson's aid in understanding it. The value of that aid is affected by her curious habit of judging the characters as much by their moral values as by their excellence as works of art. Moreover she tends towards the common error of confusing the personal views of novelists with those of their creations. When, in "Northanger Abbey," its author defends novelists from their detractors, she makes it clear, by using the first person singular, that her own opinion is expressed. But when Miss Thomson wonders why she selected "Lovers' Vows" for "so severe a condemnation" in "Mansfield Park," she may be reminded that this play exactly suited the purpose of the novelist in the development of her plot. Many plays more "morally enervating"—to borrow Miss Thomson's opinion of Sterne's works—would have been far less convenient.

* "Jane Austen: A Survey." By C. Linklater Thomson, F.R.Hist.S. 10s. 6d. (Horace Marshall.)—"Mrs. Gaskell: A Brief Biography." By George A. Payne. 3s. 6d. (Manchester: Sherratt & Hughes.)

Perhaps the most useful pages in this "survey" give, with some long illustrative extracts, various sources of Jane Austen's occasional reflections, usually satirical, of the works of other novelists, particularly Richardson, Miss Burney and Mrs. Radcliffe.

On some points of criticism Miss Thomson does not appear quite to "know her own mind." For instance, in dealing with the diverting burlesque, "Love and Friendship," written in its author's fifteenth year, she says: "Apart from the fact that novels written in the form of letters were then fashionable, the convention was one that was especially suited to Miss Austen's genius," and she gives reasons. Yet, later on, she tells us that though at first the novelist "composed her stories in the form of letters, she soon abandoned that cumbrous method."

Water colour drawing of Mrs. Gaskell by Miss Meta.
Original in Publi Library, Knutsford.

Of "Pride and Prejudice," Miss Thomson tells us that Mr. Bennet's "superior attitude annoys even the reader, as in the first two chapters," but on another page she says that this novel "opens with the conversation of the Bennet family about the arrival of Mr. Bingley, a beginning so brilliant that one wonders she did not employ the method more frequently." Is not the "brilliance" of the opening mainly due to that "superior attitude" of Mr. Bennet which "annoys even the reader"?

Miss Thomson is indeed a "difficult" critic. She asserts that in "Persuasion" we too often become acquainted with the characters "by the descriptions of the author," whereas, in the chapter on "Workmanship" she questions whether Jane Austen "does not use the method of dialogue too frequently."

We are here told that "one of the objects of the writer in describing Pemberley is to impress on the reader the disinterestedness of the heroine in refusing so much magnificence." This is in strong opposition to Sir Walter Scott's idea, which Elizabeth herself, in conversation with her sister, may be said to have originally anticipated, though in a jesting spirit. The real weakness of Miss Thomson's remark lies in the fact that Elizabeth had refused Darcy before she had seen his home!

Of Mr. Rushworth, in "Mansfield Park," Miss Thomson tells us that his "ponderosity is indicated by the fact that we never hear his Christian name." According to Mr. Rushworth's mother, he was christened "James."

Admiration for "the pure fiction" of Mrs. Gaskell, and a conviction of its "beneficent influence upon all who read it," have impelled Mr. Payne, who had already published a sketch of her relations with Knutsford, to prepare a modest record of her life and work. It contains little or nothing very attractive for her present devotees, but it may have the reward of bringing an increase to their ranks. The pleasant incident of Charlotte Brontë's postponement of "Villette," in 1853, till Mrs. Gaskell's "Ruth" had a chance to obtain a welcome, is not forgotten, nor is the unpleasant dispute over the account of Branwell Brontë, four years later, in Mrs. Gaskell's life of Charlotte, though the cause of complaint is not particularised. Of Mr. Gaskell some readers may hear with mild distress that he was "always most immaculately groomed." Three portraits of Mrs. Gaskell, and one of her Aunt Hannah, add to the interest of this little book.

W. H. HELM.

SOME FIRBANK STORIES.*

Mr. Ronald Firbank's stories, having been issued in an expensive collected edition, are now appearing one by one for the delectation presumably of a wider public. Yet it may be doubted whether they will ever appeal or deserve to appeal to more than a small audience, composed of those who are interested in an original literary technique. As a pioneer in a new method by which the logical continuity and circumlocutions of narrative were avoided, and as an executant, often brilliant, in the art of dialogue, Firbank is indeed worth study. But the more he is studied the more apparent becomes the vacuity behind his surface pyrotechnics. Like the Lady Parvola of the first of these stories, we are driven to admit "I go about as other fools, in quest of pleasure, and I usually find tedium." This is true equally of our own experience in reading these stories, and of the characters, if they may be dignified by such a word, whose incessant tittering fills Firbank's exotic pages, or whose flickering inanities play like summer lightning through a soft neurotic haze. Devotees applaud indeed his humour. Yet it is hard to find humour in such silliness or such poor taste as is revealed in sentences like these:

"'I miss Père Ernest,' Mrs. Hurstpierpont sighed, leisurely sipping her tea.
"'Yes, dear, but he had too many ultramontane habits. . . . There was really no joy in pouring out one's sins while he sat assiduously picking his nose.'"

Or:

"Between the windows were canopied recesses, denuded of their statues by the Queen's desire, 'in order that they might appear suggestive.'"

Or:

"Looking back, I remember the average curate at home as something between a eunuch and a snigger."

The snigger either of a veiled indecency or of vapid mockery at religion is constantly repeated throughout these books. And if occasionally his humour is touched with insight, as when he writes of the Countess of Tolga that "She looks at other women as though she would inhale them," it more often descends to mere puerility. Of such King William's conundrums are a superior example:

"'What is the acme of nastiness?' he paused of the English Ambassador to inquire.
"Lady Something turned paler than the white candytuft that is found on ruins. 'Oh, la, sir,' she stammered, 'how should I know!'
"The king looked the shrinking matron slowly up and down. 'The supreme disgust——'
"'Oh, la, sir!' Lady Something stammered again.
"But the king took pity on her evident confusion. 'Tepid potatoes,' he answered, 'on a stone-cold plate.'
"The Ambassadress beamed."

So doubtless did Firbank, as he wrote it. But literature is something more than a parlour-game. And this passage illustrates well the combination of technical adroitness with adolescent silliness, which is the characteristic of most of his work. He reacted from the "routine, vulgarity and boredom of life" to puerility or to exoticism or to a blend of the two. And if technically he discovered a method by which the story could be freed from the heavy chain of logical continuity, he sacrified in the process the inner continuity of a developing organism. There is no necessary relation between either the incidents or the characters of his stories, because neither have their roots in human or earthly reality. Sometimes he can paint a scene, as for example that at the Archduchess's death-bed, in " The Flower Beneath the Foot," which is complete in itself, although quite artificial. But his unifying capacity never goes beyond this. And the fundamental reason is that his world has no creative significance. " I see life to-day," says one of his puppets, " in the colour of mould." And much of his humour is like the phosphorescence of decaying things. " It amuses one," said another puppet, " to watch their dying flutters." But the twitching of people who have never really come to life is neither amusing nor pitiful. It is too trivial for the most part to be anything but tedious. Doubtless we will be accused of breaking a butterfly on the wheel of criticism. And Firbank ran out of the house of life, as Nivi-Esther in " Valmouth " ran " out of the house (old, grey, grim, satanic Hare) into the garden, where, with her bride's bouquet of malmaisons and vanessa-violets, she was waywardly in pursuit of a butterfly." But even to pursue a butterfly successfully one needs to be something more than a butterfly oneself.

OUT OF THE EAST.*

Mr. Somerset Maugham did not have to teach himself to be a dramatist—he was born one. But early and easy success in that field was not enough for him ; he wanted to be recognised as a writer, and to that end laboured very hard in his youth, intensively studying such objective phenomena as were to be worked into his writings, striving to perfect himself in the niceties and even preciosities of style. Eventually he realised that his best course was just to let his pen run on, simply and straightforwardly inditing what seemed the sense of the matter in hand. It was in his case a good policy to pursue, for his readers will be intrigued to discover how in that process, candidly outlined in the confessions and asides which so charmingly humanise and enliven the diary of his Eastern travels now before them, Mr. Maugham has developed into a prose artist of the first water.

Adam's Peak.

From " The Jungle Tide." By John Still (Blackwood).

Through Burma, the Shan states, Siam and Indo-China, on foot and mule-back and pony-back, by forest, mountain and stream, Mr. Maugham took his leisurely, unbusinesslike and entirely unmotivated way, writing his book in halts by the wayside, and finding its odd title in Hazlitt, who had ousted Charles Lamb as his spiritual confidant upon the march. Not his first adventure of the kind, by a long way, yet for all his inveterate restlessness Mr. Maugham votes himself a bad traveller, for he has not " the gift of surprise," and remains uninterested in the differences observable between what he knows at home and what he sees abroad, nor finding matter for astonishment in the fact that men may eat with chopsticks instead of forks or write with a brush instead of a pen.

This blend of portraiture, of drama, of sensitive and piquant comment on things seen and felt, suits Mr. Maugham. The wit of his comedies may dazzle, the power behind the best of his short stories heretofore published impress, but most of us have felt a little repelled by his cynicism. Here however the cynicism has been purged away ; compassion and understanding illuminate his presentation even of the most derelict and degraded types of humanity. He laughs sometimes, and bids us laugh, at other people, but not seldom at Mr. Maugham.

Mr. Still gives us something different. Yet this too is an " Eöthen," a breath of the authentic East. Mr. Still's travels have been circumscribed—it is of Ceylon only that he writes. Not the Ceylon of the globe-trotter, even of the average European resident in that delectable Eden, but Ceylon of the game-path and the water-hole, of buried cities still inaccessible by the motor-bus ; of hunting grounds the Veddahs have forgotten, and rock dwellings whose last hermit died (presumably of malaria) five hundred years ago, with his face to a wall arabesqued with inscriptions no man could read even in his day ; of that valley long sought but still unmapped where the elephants go when they die.

Mr. Still has known this fascinating island for thirty years, not as the present generation of motoring, tennis-playing, club-haunting Englishmen know it, but as archæologist, hunter and naturalist, and pioneer tea-planter. He has the spirit of the true nature-lover, admitting candidly that although as a youth it gave him, after the normal fashion of adolescence, pleasure to carry a gun in his jungle explorations and use it for other purposes than the excusable ones of self-defence and bodily sustenance, he now prefers either a camera or the still simpler adjuncts of good eyesight and a retentive memory.

Of the jungle lore, on which he is a profound authority, he weaves a fascinating narrative, abounding in all sorts of ingenious suggestions by which new vistas in the development of both man and nature in the tropics are opened up. Animals he sees, and supports his argument by very convincing evidence, as the road-makers of this planet, and suggests the introduction of elephants to lighten the task of pioneers in the impenetrable forest regions of New Guinea. He has a scheme for the formation of a vast sanctuary, not only for game but for the fast vanishing pre-Buddhistic ritual and custom of the villagers and wood folk, in conjunction with the hydro-electric undertakings now in progress upon the flanks of Adam's Peak, the most sacred mountain in Asia. He prophesies too an ultimate overflowing of the " Jungle Tide " over existing planting areas in the days to come, thus repeating the inexorable processes of nature observable in the Northern Province, all but abandoned now, but once the haunt of teeming populations. Altogether an arresting, even an absorbing book.

AN EXERCISE IN STYLE.*

Mr. Thornton Wilder's new novel, "The Woman of Andros," is in some respects a disappointment. It certainly has nothing of the spiritual individuality which made "The Bridge of San Luis Rey" so remarkable a book. It is filled nevertheless with many graciously psychological aphorisms, but these lack any real pregnancy of illumination, and, if it were not for the felicity of their phrasing, they would in many places be more platitudinal than effective; as it is, the magic of Mr. Wilder's style gives them all the appearance of profundity. In this respect Mr. Wilder is nearer to Pater than to Bacon.

The story, if story it can be called, is simple. It is derived, in part, from Terence's "Andria." Chrysis, a young courtesan from Alexandria, in retirement from her profession, has settled on the Greek island of Byrnos, and becomes the only centre of intellectual life among the conventional and faintly disgusted islanders. But she gathers about her, as did most of the educated hetairæ of Greece, a symposium of young men, among whom is Pamphilus, the son of the leading trader on Byrnos. Chrysis dies and Pamphilus falls in love with the dead woman's younger and secluded sister. The family of Pamphilus are persuaded by the old trader into the very un-Greek action of accepting such a girl as a legal wife, but almost at once she dies in giving birth to a dead child. That is all, but the real interest lies rather in the analysis of the characters than in any outside events in which they may engage, and undoubtedly these various cameos of psychological insight have a remarkable subtlety. But Mr. Wilder's method is so entirely undramatic that for the most part his characterisation, illuminative as it continually is, seems to waste its subtlety on the desert air. He describes his people, but does not present them. When the author speaks all goes fittingly; when he makes his characters speak—which is not often his limitations as a novelist are at once apparent. He can make most just and most penetrative comments upon his dramatis personæ, he can even set them most accurately in movement, but he cannot endow them with any outer validity of voice and gesture. The result is that his book remains a study in style rather than a direct presentation of human beings.

Yet even as a study in style it is a little too much under the influence of Pater to be entirely individual. Cadence by cadence "The Woman of Andros" is curiously like the chapter entitled "White-Nights" in "Marius the Epicurean." But it contains two sentences such as Pater would never have allowed to disfigure any page of his own. On two pages Mr. Wilder admits into his otherwise classical English the hideous and unpardonable Americanism "way back."

A TRUE STORY.†

Analysis as a science has had of late a depressing influence upon both fiction and biography. From being the servant of the artist's creative impulse, it has too often become his master and a very arbitrary master at that, not only disintegrating the life which it should be his purpose to integrate, but fixing it in a strait-jacket of professional formulas.

Psychology however may prove a valuable corrective to subjective impressionism, and a subtle instrument of imaginative insight. And Mr. Hudson exemplifies the fact. His "True Story" is primarily the study of a man whom innate sensibility and damaging circumstances reduce almost to impotence. It is a subject over which the psychoanalyst might well lick his lips, particularly as the loss of assurance from which Richard Kurt increasingly suffers, and his inability to find any purpose in his life, have their roots in a sort of Œdipus complex. But Mr. Hudson never reduces his hero's boyhood to the terms of a complex. Rather he enters into it imaginatively and becomes the boy whom he is studying so intimately that he speaks his language. And so we live through, instead of merely making a mental note of the early warping of Richard's emotional nature by an unsatisfied love for his mother and the judicial severities of his father. And the same is true of the second fatality to which he succumbs—a hasty marriage with a cold, self-interested and calculating woman, who exploits first his youthful passion, and then his sense of honour and responsibility to tie him to herself. From this marriage he never recovers until on the last page he literally buys his freedom and a possible resurrection from the death in life to which it has brought him. Mr. Hudson traces with a patient and sensitive thoroughness his hero's fluctuating but ineffectual efforts to build up a new and worthier personality in spite of his wife, whose heartlessness has set a blight of sterility upon his life, and the society of continental pleasure-seekers and dilettantes which aggravates his drifting tendency.

Particularly convincing is his treatment of Richard's relations with his father, although at times, in his determination to define such relations as precisely as possible, he is inclined to explain them rather too elaborately. But the whole book has a solidity and depth seldom found in modern fiction, and the fact that it is reconstructed from four volumes which have previously appeared under different titles, far from suggesting that Mr. Hudson's inventive powers are limited, testifies to his conscientiousness as an artist and student of human nature.

HUGH I'A. FAUSSET.

Round the question of materialism a battle has raged for hundreds of years and is still raging. Battle-fields, battle-cries, banners, weapons have varied, but the casus belli has ever been radically and fundamentally the same. The centuries are strewn with great names, and fierce and formidable words. Great names—Democritus, Lucretius, Aristotle, St. Thomas Aquinas, Descartes, Berkeley, Hegel, Fichte, Kant, Darwin, Weissman, Huxley, Haeckel, Newton, Einstein. Fierce words—nominalism, realism, materialism, idealism, epiphenomenalism, sensationism, neo-realism, vitalism, orthogenesis, entelechy, relativity, teleology, psycho-physical parallelism, emergent evolution. Theologians, philosophers, physicists, psychologists, anatomists, biologists have each played a part in the battle. For wherever the battle-field, whatever the battle-cries, banners and weapons, there has always been at stake, in some form or other, man's conception of himself, of life and of deity, and on that conception every advance—scientific knowledge, every change in theological and philosophic doctrine has had its repercussion. To and fro has surged and swayed the tide of battle. Now a materialistic view of the universe has dominated, and now an idealistic, varying to a great extent with the spirit and with the particular intellectual activities of the age.

In the last decades of last century, atomic chemistry, Darwinian biology, Newtonian physics, material prosperity and mechanised industry all made for a materialistic, mechanical view of both the inorganic and organic world; living organisms and vital functions were believed to be physico-chemical phenomena, and even thought was believed to be a product of the chemistry of the brain cells.

To-day the atom has been reduced to electric charges vanishing in ethereal radiations; to-day Darwinism is moribund and Newtonian physics are partly superseded by Einsteinism; to-day material prosperity and mechanised industry have been found wanting, and there is a big reaction among thinking men towards a more theistic view of the world.

Prominent among the advanced thinkers is Professor W. McDougall, and in his new book he not only gives a most fascinating survey of the situation as it is to-day,

* "The Woman of Andros." By Thornton Wilder. 6s. (Longmans.)

† "A True Story." By Stephen Hudson. 8s. 6d. (Constable.)

* "Modern Materialism" By Professor W. McDougall. (Methuen.)

but by his own arguments casts much new light on the problems at issue. At the moment the chief battle-field is biology, and the fiercest fighting is taking place round the problems of life and evolution, and especially round the theory of "emergent evolution," and round the theory of emergent evolution much of Professor McDougall's argument revolves.

We cannot here adequately discuss the author's position with respect to the many moot questions he tackles, for both the questions and his reasoning are extremely subtle and difficult; but briefly he maintains that the mind is not a product of the material organisation of the brain, but that it has independent existence and causal efficacy. He does not believe that mind emerged from living matter at some stage of organic evolution. He does not believe in an emergent evolution of cognition and conation via anœtic passive sentience, or through an associative conjunction of sense-qualities. Accepting evolution, he denies Darwinism, for he claims that teleological causation pervades the organic world, and that the teleological activity of mind has been a guiding influence and an essential factor in organic evolution. His reasoning is as strong as it is courageous, and his conclusions will be welcomed by all unprejudiced thinkers; but to an idealist his dualistic conception of mind and body must seem unsound, and we would fain protest against his extraordinary notion that the production of unconsciousness by compression of the carotid artery in any way invalidates idealism. Just as well try to prove the objectivity of matter by kicking a stone.

Quite apart from Professor McDougall's strong and courageous arguments in support of his own particular views, the book is intellectually fascinating, and gives a remarkably full and fair summary of the various divarications and varieties of modern materialism.

RONALD CAMPBELL MACFIE.

LATTER-DAY ENGLAND.

It is a sign of the times that the man with private means, who used to provide material for so much of our fiction before the War, is now very conspicuously out of date. Most of the people in novels these days—women included—justify their existence by doing some sort of work, which is a true enough reflection of modern life. Post-War England is an England of industry, and the social class that can idle away its time in love intrigue and epigrams has become curiously unsatisfying. Even our novels of rural life deal rarely with the gentry—perhaps because the gentry themselves are a little obsolete. Or are we outgrowing a certain snobbishness and discovering there is a greater depth of romance among the common people than among those who fritter away their days and nights in empty activities? Mr. H. W. Freeman's new novel [1] contains more realism than romance; like "Joseph and His Brethren," it is a novel of the earth, with the earth's loveliness and the earth's crudities gathered together impartially. He does not try to escape to any loftier plane; his imagination walks through the fields and woods of Suffolk, conscious of the ugliness of human passion and the beauty of a flower; but it never acquires wings. His story is of a draper who flees from the dullness of a small country town to the peace of an old-world village. Here the yeoman blood in him finds expression working on the land; he mingles with the village natives; he flushes with romance the drab life of a woman tied to a brute of a husband, and finds romance himself in the unreticent passion of a young country girl. The characters are drawn with a detachment that makes for vividness; humour and tragedy blend, as in life; nothing is omitted, not even the unsavoury. The result is a faithful, unforgettable picture of rural England in the strong outline of a woodcut.

In "Dear England" [2] and "The Return of John Storey" we get another side of English life—the industrial side. Peter Halliday, in "Dear England," was born to fortune, only son of Sir James Halliday, Chairman of Halliday & Pease, Ltd., and at thirty was happily married, on the board of directors, comfortably rich and enjoying every confidence in his country and countrymen. Then something happened and his suspicions were aroused that England was not "a glorious, dear, magnificent country, nurtured on fair play and high aspirations." A strange new patriotism disturbs his content. "What use are we, living as we do?" he asks his wife. "We both reckon to love old England, don't we? But what are we doing for her, Margot?" Margot however cannot understand his point of view, and the awakened Peter has much to endure before he can fight his way through to some sort of faith in England and himself.

John Storey[3] is also fired by devotion to his native land, from which he has been absent for twenty-eight years, and is antagonistic to present-day Capitalism. He cannot bear to see the place which gave him birth under the heel of an upstart owner, and sets out to save the mine from the greed of Sir Thomas Grey. A forceful story with a charming love interest running through, the ending as dramatic as it is unexpected.

In "The Mink Coat" [4] we have again a working-class family, neither in the country nor the provinces this time but in London. Albert Raynor is a furrier, a quiet, unenterprising little man, the only Englishman among a collection of Jewish workers. It is however with his home life we are concerned, and we see his children growing up in an atmosphere of sordid respectability, breaking away from it, seeking their own destinies. Their histories are traced by Miss Edith Brill with sympathetic insight and deft touches of characterisation, resulting in a quiet novel, competently done, subtly realistic.

Both Mrs. Hamilton and Miss Morgan Gibbon take for theme the after-effects of a dramatic climax; in each case the story begins when the actual drama is over, and we are brought up against the tragedy of redemption. Most famous crimes have their echo in fiction, and we do not have to possess very long memories to guess the source of Mrs. Hamilton's arresting plot.[5] Hers—the only one of this group—is a War-time novel, the theme murder. Harold Claviger has murdered his best friend, believing him to be his wife's lover, and is on trial at the Old Bailey. Through the mental anguish of Jean Claviger, we visualise all the incidents leading up to Stephen Henshaw's death, and incidentally get a masterly study of war-time psychology.

The psychology in Miss Morgan Gibbon's book [6] is less grim and less profound, and is enlivened by delightful comedy and some of the best humorous character drawing she has done. In "The Albatross," Tony Dircks returns home after serving two years' imprisonment for embezzlement, and is determined to remain in his home town, among his relatives and friends, and work out his salvation. Fundamentally honest, in spite of his one lapse, he came to realise at length "the real escape of life was from sin, not from punishment." If the story ends in tragedy, it also ends in achievement, and is one of the finest Miss Morgan Gibbon has yet given us.

ELIA AND THOMAS HOOD.*

This is one of the too rare books that do the heart good. The title page bears the names of three lovable men; and it is welcome for what it represents as well as for what it is. When, at the end of last October, Walter Jerrold passed through the Ultimate Doorway—possibly to be greeted by the kindred spirits of Thomas Hood and the ever-beloved "Elia," thereby making the Uncertain Future, called Heaven, infinitely more tolerable for himself and for others like him—we who knew him, and in our inexpressive ways loved him, were conscious that henceforth this world must be permanently so much the emptier and colder for his having gone. It is therefore a happy circumstance that he has left behind him this legacy of an attractive and characteristic volume. In its pages are revealing truths of Thomas Hood, a rare heart of great spiritual courage; of Charles Lamb in his comings and goings and inward seriousness and outward playfulness improving upon Puck; and incidentally of Walter Jerrold, a bookman of industry and wise discernment, who never was known to be unkind, ungenerous or selfish.

* "Thomas Hood and Charles Lamb: The Story of a Friendship. Being the Literary Reminiscences of Thomas Hood." Edited, with certain additions, by Walter Jerrold. 10s. 6d. (Ernest Benn.)

It was an excellent thought to revive these essays, reminiscences and forgotten verses of Thomas Hood, penned just over a hundred years ago. In a small way of course they were known to those who had the will and leisure to seek for them; but were altogether lost to the multitude. In a measure this book is pre-eminently Thomas Hood's, not only because it mainly consists of his written contributions to the Comic Annual and the London Magazine and what Walter Jerrold shrewdly and mischievously declares was "the chief fact that makes the reign of the Fourth George memorable"—but also for the reason that, directly or indirectly, his personality is here disclosed in a manner which makes him for the first time evident to the majority. Hitherto Hood has been a shadowy jester, with his pathos and puns, and was ever to be confused in the general mind with his son, who, without his power of sympathy, carried on his comic practice into the seventies. And the man disclosed is of truest gold; in many respects very like Elia, though lacking the quaint and fresh originality, the elf-like contradictoriness and impish naughtiness, and indeed the intellectual greatness of Charles Lamb. The two were at any rate alike in their shyness, their inward flow of humour with its intolerable indulgence of puns—horribly inherited by Walter Jerrold, who was not his grandfather's grandson for nothing—and their rich and warm humanity; while the spiritual strength of both is disclosed in their brave endurance of the pain that came to them in life. Lamb, as we are reminded here, never permitted the shadow of the tragedy under which he lived to fall across the pages that he wrote for public perusal; and Hood, though doomed to ill-health from boyhood and suffering painfully throughout his last years, kept all evidence of his anguish from his readers until the end when, as he put it, "death stops my pen." It is a record and example worthy of remembrance.

The Elia encountered in these reminiscences is identical with him we already know and love. Hood, having been compelled to abandon the office-work to which he was first put and not exactly succeeding as an engraver, had become the assistant editor of the London Magazine, and one day was engaged with his chief when "in came a stranger—a figure remarkable at a glance, with a fine head on a small spare body, supported by two almost immaterial legs." Clad in black, the visitor looked like "a literary modern antique, a new-old author, a living Anachronism"—and that we may be sure is humorously true. "With a cheerful 'How d'ye,' and one of the blandest, sweetest smiles that ever brightened a manly countenance, Lamb held out two fingers to the editor." There follows a delightful study of the visitor, made by the "silentish young man" who closely observed while Elia was in talk. Amongst other characteristics he noted "the striking intellectual face, full of wiry lines, physiognomical quips and cranks, that gave it great character." It all is very revealing of the best-loved person in the world of books. It was however some little time before Hood again saw Lamb, who at last called when Hood was sitting sick and sad in his bedroom, racked with rheumatism. Once more the two fingers of greeting were extended, and so a familiar friendship was begun. They enjoyed mutual hospitalities, and we have a delightful pen-picture of Lamb at supper with the Hoods. Pressed to sing, Elia offered instead to pronounce a Latin eulogium, and according stammered forth a long stream of Latin words for about five minutes. They thought that, as the name of Mrs. Hood was often mentioned, he was praising her, but it transpired that the eulogium was a tribute to the lobster salad.

Well, here is a book for Elians, dedicated to their present-day patron saint, the very unecclesiastical Augustine, and for all other lovers of literary quality and spiritual courage who possibly, impossibly, have not yet fallen under the spell of the late and ever-living Mr. Lamb.

C. E. LAWRENCE.

"DIZZY."*

At the outset let tribute be paid to the publishers. In the autumn of 1910 appeared the first volume of this biography, and ten years later the sixth was issued. Mr. Monypenny was responsible for the first two volumes, and for the last four, Mr. Buckle, once editor of The Times. The publishers, with the assistance of Mr. Buckle, have now brought out the work in two volumes comprising over three thousand three hundred pages, at the price of one guinea, which will enable it to be obtained by many who could not afford the original issue. Even in these days when "omnibus books" are so to speak three a penny, this is a marvellous feat, on which Messrs. John Murray are to be wholeheartedly congratulated. More: it is a national service to give to the public an accessible Life of one of the greatest and most famous of British prime ministers.

This edition is to all intents and purposes a reprint of the original work. Nothing has been omitted except a number of illustrations; but Mr. Buckle "has carefully revised the work throughout, but solely with a view of correcting mistakes, making needed explanations and adding such new facts of importance—in themselves extremely few—as have come to light since the original publication."

The original issue of the biography was criticised for its bulk; but as Mr. Buckle quite rightly says, the comprehensiveness and authority of it have never been questioned. In fact, they will never be. It is and, if prophecy be permitted, will be for all time the "standard" Life of the great statesman of the Victorian era.

It is of undeniable interest to consider what in the nineteen years since the first volume appeared has happened to the reputation of Disraeli. Let Mr. Buckle, with whom the present writer ventures most humbly to agree, be quoted:

> "During the whole period," he says, "Disraeli's reputation, compared with that of his contemporaries, has steadily increased; and his creation, the modern Conservative party, though subjected to-day to a formidable competition unknown in his time, has just polled even in this moment of its depression, more votes among a fully-enfranchised democracy than any other single party."

But that is politics, with which here we are not concerned.

Still, let Mr. Buckle speak again:

> "The Conservative leader, Mr. Baldwin, a man about as different as possible from Disraeli in race, circumstances, upbringing and personality, never tires of proclaiming, between forty and fifty years after Disraeli's death, that his own political creed is based on that of the great man's teachings."

This again is politics, but it is Empire politics. Disraeli stood for "a real Throne," "Imperium et Libertas," "Sanitas Sanitatum." For this last, to take an example, he was at the time much laughed at, for it was generally thought that sanitation was a matter beneath the consideration of a serious statesman—and to-day there is a Ministry of Health.

It is not, however, as Mr. Buckle is careful to give a reminder, merely among partisans and politicians that Disraeli's fame has grown. Not only does Disraeli the man and Disraeli the author exercise a wide fascination; but his personality has impressed itself upon this generation. When, nearly fifty years after the author's death, so distinguished a man of letters as Mr. Michael Sadleir thinks it worth while to "introduce" a youthful trifle written by the great man, "The Dunciad of To-day," published in the long-forgotten Star Chamber of 1826, the question of his enduring fame is set beyond doubt.

Books on Disraeli are always appearing. One writer criticises the novels; another treats of the political side; more than one deals with the biography of his subject, and endeavours to elucidate his personality. This is but natural, for there can be no question that Disraeli was the outstanding figure in politics during the reign of Queen Victoria. There were in fact none to compare with him. There were other great political reputations, such as Peel, Palmerston and Gladstone; but the one dominating and surviving personality is indubitably Disraeli.

"You have chosen the only career in which a man is never old," he said in his last days to a young man starting on his political career; "a statesman can feel and inspire interest longer than any other man."

And there, in these words, is given the master-key to his character—to inspire interest.

SEED OF THE MOON.*

Few contemporary English poets have any noticeable popularity in America, and fewer contemporary American poets have any in this country; so if Mr. Cale Young Rice feels that our public is a little neglectful of him, he may find solace in the reflection that he is sharing the common lot. In America he has his own following, and the lot that falls to him there is far from being a common one. Not long ago one of his poetic plays, "A Night in Avignon," was produced with great success as an opera; and last autumn his sixteenth century romantic drama, "Yolanda of Cyprus," arranged as an opera by himself and set to music by Mr. Clarence E. Loomis, met with an enthusiastic reception on its first production in Chicago, and is still touring successfully through the chief cities of America.

In his new book, "Seed of the Moon," Mr. Cale Young Rice includes two long narrative poems, "Life Goes On" and "Lorna Quade," written in that irregular metre he used with such effectiveness, in an earlier volume, for the tragic story of "Apaukee, the Half-Breed." These rhythms, he remarks in a foreword to the new book, "seem fresher and better suited to the temper of American life than does penameter blank verse—formal or informal." They leave him greater freedom in unfolding the matter-of-fact details of his tale, and are susceptible of rising to its higher moods and flowering into beauty of phrase, or being wrought into a forceful and poignant utterance of its dramatic moments. Mr. Rice breaks away from the poetic tradition that will not allow a spade simply to be called a spade; and in telling his stories of everyday life and present-day people he uses with a subtle art the everyday language of ordinary speech. These two narrative poems are perhaps the most striking things in the book, but the very qualities that give them power, their stark realism and direct simplicity of style, make it impossible to represent them adequately in a synopsis or by quotations. They must be read in their entirety that the reader may feel the cumulative effect of their method and manner in shaping the whole story.

In the new lyrics here, as in all his later work, Mr. Rice tends to rely less and less on rhyme and conventional metrical forms, but he never lapses into the eccentricities and pantomime verbiage that seem to satisfy some of our eminent vers libristes. He does not sit down to practise oddities of verse construction under the impression that he is writing a poem; you would say that he starts with an idea, and allows that idea to flow into whatever form of words and metre most easily and adequately give it expression. Always too there run through his verse a sensitive feeling for the beauty of the visible world and a wistful, baffled awareness of the life unseen that everywhere environs it, as in the terse and suggestive "Cries in the Night":

> "I walked in the pines. A coyote
> On the brink of the cañon pointed a nose
> At infinity filled with planets
> And washed by floods of the moon.
> He bayed his awe of the vastness,
> His harsh, uneasy fear of the strangeness
> Of night stretching unknowably
> Out and beyond him forever.

* "Seed of the Moon." By Cale Young Rice. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

He shrank away to his hunting
Or mating. And I, on the brink then,
Faced, as he, the universe,
And knew that his cry was my cry."

It is an undertone in " Horizons "—

" A man whose ships never come home Looks ever to sea "—

it is in the atmosphere of the twelve brooding " Songs for a Winter Fire," in the wind that blows through them, the dawn, the night, or the twilight, when the day, that did not a moment since seem old, is " creeping westward grey and grim,

" Like age's very self it turned to go,
Clutching the dusk about it as a cloak."

There are touches of satire and irony, a passing sense of the vanity of things in some of the poems, but their prevailing philosophy finds still " a budding morrow at midnight," and in the lonely loveliness of an evening star has glimpses of

" Why earth is not enough for men."

Mr. Cale Young Rice is a poet who should make many friends in this country as well as in his own.

ARTHUR RUTLAND.

The position of Surtees in the literary firmament is always bright but remote, and, to vary the metaphor, a taste for him is caviare to the general. Like caviare, too, he is expensive to buy; his first editions may be worth £24, or £45, or £145. There are no cheap reprints; collected or uniform editions are valuable, and the most recent of these, in ten volumes, costs £17 odd. This would astonish the late W. P. Frith, could he know of it, for in his Life of John Leech he wrote: " Amongst the many books illustrated by Leech are some sporting novels, written, I think, by a Mr. Surtees . . . as these works are ornamented by coloured steel engravings and innumerable woodcuts by Leech, it has been my duty to look into them: read them I cannot." Against this opinion may be placed that of the present Lord Lonsdale in a speech last year: " I remember being asked by the head master of Eton what was the best book in the world. I replied that my father said it was Shakspere, that my mother told me it was the Bible, but that I thought it was ' Jorrocks.' " Yet it is by no means necessary to be a sportsman in order to appreciate Surtees; he is also the delineator of the social manners and customs of his time, and as such his pictures of life in the period 1830–1860 place him with Dickens, Thackeray, Smedley, and Trollope. Mr. Frith lost a good deal of amusement by his inability to read Surtees, all the more surprising in that he himself had a keen sense of humour for the misfortunes and comic accidents of life—such contretemps as befall the sporting votaries of a Surtees novel: the mischances and horse-play pranks which have ever attended the great exemplars and victims of humour from Falstaff and Don Quixote through Pickwick to the creations of Mr. Charles Chaplin. And it must not be forgotten that Pickwick undoubtedly had his origin in Surtees's Mr. Jorrocks.

Robert Smith Surtees (1803–1864) was a country gentleman, a member of an ancient northern family, and the squire of Hamsterley Hall on the borders of Durham and Northumberland. At the outset of his life, as a younger son, he followed the profession of solicitor in London. But after he became the heir of Hamsterley he was enabled to follow his natural bent to write on the subjects he loved best—horses, hunting, and sport in general, combined with all the humour and jest these matters evolve in practice and experience. So it was, in 1831, there commenced to appear in The New Sporting Magazine a series of papers relating inimitably the sporting adventures, accidents, and obiter dicta of a Cockney grocer, John Jorrocks, of Great Coram Street, who had a prototype in an actual follower of the Surrey Hunt. These sketches developed into the famous work, " Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities." In 1835–1836, Dickens was asked by Chapman and Hall to write a series of sketches relating the humorous adventures of the members of a Nimrod Club, who were to get themselves into difficulties by reason of their ignorance of shooting and fishing, and so on. This was the origin of the Pickwick Club, and at first Dickens adhered to the proposed scheme, but, it is scarcely necessary to add, he later amplified the work and extended it on the lines of his own individual genius. Nevertheless, as I pointed out on a previous occasion,* there are several points of contact between Jorrocks and Pickwick, even to the extent of a legal action in which the one is defended by Mr. Serjeant Bumptious and the other by Mr. Serjeant Buzfuz.

So great was the success of Jorrocks that his creator reintroduced him in a full-length novel as a Master of Fox-Hounds. This was " Handley Cross, or the Spa Hunt" (1843),† reissued as " Handley Cross, or Mr. Jorrocks's Hunt " (1854) with the splendid illustrations of John Leech, who used as an unconscious model for Jorrocks the face and figure of a coachman named Nicholls, in the service of Lady Louisa Clinton, seen and sketched by the artist during service in Barkway Church. Surtees took the character of James Pigg from Josh Kirk, a pitman turned huntsman. Pomponius Ego was a skit on the author's friend, C. J. Apperley—" Nimrod," the celebrated writer on sport—and apropos of this, when Lockhart reviewed " Handley Cross," to the extent of nineteen-and-a-half pages of The Quarterly Review, in a laudatory way, he also admonished Surtees to " by all means curb his propensity to caricature." There has been much discussion as to the locality and scenes of " Handley Cross." The Spa is undoubtedly a picture of Leamington, but the hunting country described seems to be a combination of land known to the author, such as the Raby country in his native north, that round Warwick in the centre, and a great deal of the Ashford Vale, Kent, in the south. The money Surtees received from this book he expended in building a new bridge in the grounds of Hamsterley Hall, and this bridge is still called " The Handley Cross Bridge."

" Handley Cross " appropriately forms the first two volumes of this new edition, for it is the most characteristic of Surtees's novels; chronologically it overlaps " Hillingdon Hall, or the Cockney Squire," a story not included in this series, although it continues the adventures of Jorrocks. " Handley Cross " is a delightful picture of its period. How excellent is the glimpse of one of the early railway trains, with the trucks carrying unhorsed vehicles in which were seated the owners, its rattle disturbing the peace of the country-side and setting all the cattle a-caper. Mrs. Barnington can compare with Mrs. Proudie, and with Mrs. Major Ponto, of " The Book of Snobs," and her servants are of the kind presented by Thackeroy. Indeed, it might be demonstrated that Snob's visit at " Some Country Snobs " (written in 1846–1847) was directly inspired by the visit to the Muleygrubs depicted in three chapters of " Handley Cross," which had appeared some three years before. Thackeray admitted to Surtees that he had borrowed from Jorrocks in another matter, for in a letter of 1849 he says: " Mr. Jorrocks has long been a dear and intimate friend of mine. I stole from him years ago, having to describe a hunting scene with which I was quite unfamiliar, and I lived in Great Coram Street once, too." Curiously enough, it might be retorted that Surtees also borrowed from Thackeray, for the name of the Hawbucks, who come to call on the Pontos in " Some Country Snobs," was used by Surtees as the title of his next novel, " Hawbuck Grange," 1847, though it appears that name was selected by the publishers, the Longmans, who did not like the original title, " Stable Talk."

" Hawbuck Grange " in this new edition reproduces the excellent illustrations of Phiz. The story is not so generally popular as some of the author's other books. There is no feminine interest, but there is fine description of hunting runs, and the experiences of the hero, Thomas Scott, at the various country houses and inns he visits in the course of his pursuit of hounds and horn is in Surtees's best vein. The remaining work of the present instalment of Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode's beautifully produced edition is the ever welcome " Ask Mamma," which, with Leech's art at his very best, is a delicious panorama of the modes and fashions of 1858, for the career of fine Billy, son of the lady's maid who became a countess, is as much a social as a sporting progress.

TWO WOMEN OF FRANCE.*

So much that is contradictory has been written about the Empress Josephine that any fresh attempt to portray her is beset with difficulties. To hold the balance between the Josephine who bore her martyrdom with fortitude and forgiveness, and the Josephine who "would drink gold from the skull of her lover," is a delicate task.

Dr. McNair Wilson, in ' Josephine : The Portrait of a Woman," sketches the outline of his portrait with every intention of strict justice, but the details have become coloured by the personal view which he, like all students of the voluminous Josephine literature, has found himself obliged to take. While admitting that she must always remain an enigma, he has explained the bewildering inconsistencies of her character by his own estimation of it. He regards her as " a woman of intelligence far above the ordinary," and from that point of view, all her behaviour is, to him, directed by a deep capacity for intrigue. Even her graciousness, surely one of her greatest natural assets, becomes but a means to an end, while the floods of tears, to which not only she, but her son and daughter, seem to have been strongly addicted, are regarded as one of the most powerful weapons in her armoury. Yet would not a more skilful schemer have learnt to control the " hurricane of lamentations " and the outward manifestations of jealousy which she must have recognised as an inevitable irritation to a husband like Napoleon ? Her incredible extravagance and undiscriminating generosity would also appear the outcome of an incurable muddle-headedness, rather than of a more than ordinary intelligence.

Whether Dr. McNair's portrait is regarded as a faithful likeness or a strange travesty, it is at least a fascinating presentation. Through the whole story of her unhappy marriage to Alexandre de Beauharnais, her straitened and somewhat disreputable two years of widowhood, and her marriage to the earnest and uncouth little Corsican general, there runs the thread of her extraordinary lack of money sense. Extravagance, debt, and more extravagance, was the key-note of her career. Even the coffers of the Emperor of France, deep as they were, felt the strain of her delvings for treasure. Yet to the end she was loved by her children, and by the man whose star she had seen rise and fall. " Excellent Josephine ! " he exclaimed at her grave, " She at any rate would not have abandoned me." " That may be doubted," is the author's comment. Foolish Josephine ! she undoubtedly gave justification for such a doubt. " Foolish " is the last epithet which could be applied to the heroine of Miss Maud Cruttwell's biography " Madame de Maintenon." Here is the portrait of a woman made of sterner stuff than poor Josephine. If the reading of this detailed, documented record does not leave quite the impression which the author wishes to convey—that of " a saint whose sole ambitions were to convert her king and alleviate the misery caused by his wars " —there can be no possible doubt that she was neither the malevolent tyrant nor the hypocritical religieuse of some of her contemporary biographers. Her religion, though strongly tinctured with narrowness and bigotry, was the moving force of her whole life. Clinging to her faith through the vicissitudes of her early life with the poet Scarron, so deformed that he resembled " the letter Z " ; her unenviable position as the custodian of the children of Louis XIV and the stormy Montespan ; the chequered glory of the years by the side of the greatest monarch of Europe, she turned to it more and more fervently for consolation as age, infirmity and grief assailed her indomitable spirit. One could have wished that its influence might have softened the harshness which must have made her feared as well as loved. She made no allowances for those who dared to think otherwise than as she taught. Poor Madame de Glapion, innocently bringing reason to bear upon some of the problems which oppressed her in the seclusion of St. Cyr ! " Intelligence is not for you," wrote Madame de Maintenon angrily. " It is only vanity which makes you desire it."

The Empress Josephine.
From the painting by Prudhon.
From ' Josephine," by R. McNair Wilson (Eyre & Spottiswoode).

The foundation of St. Cyr, an institution unique alike in its aims and its accomplishment, is a monument to her tireless energy and genius for organisation. Perhaps the secret of the almost incredible activity which enabled a woman of over seventy to entertain a bored monarch, attend to affairs of state, deal with the intrigues of the most profligate Court of Europe, and arrange the smallest details of a huge establishment like St. Cyr, lay in the intense pleasure and recreation she derived from this cherished creation of her own brain. " I think God gave it me," she said, " not only for my salvation, but my repose, for it serves me not only to pray and collect my forces, but also to relax myself and make me forget other things." Here she spent the last years of her life, freed from the intolerable strain of court life, but saddened by the downfall of her favourite foster-child, the Duc du Maine. Here she died, prophetically fearful for the future of her beloved St. Cyr in the hands of the scandalous Regent.

This is an invaluable as well as a profoundly interesting document for every student of that brilliant, extravagant, decadent period of which Louis le Roi Soleil was himself the emblem.

ETHEL BROWNING.

NOTABLE PEOPLE.*

Madame Kelly's "peregrinations" occupy 232 pages, but though she has met many people of interest, fame and notoriety, and has something to say about them all, she does not succeed in telling us much that is new or significant; perhaps she suffers from being, as she describes herself, "one who makes no claim to renown." Yet she has travelled widely and with sympathy, and her style is bright, occasionally vivid, always chatty—she talks to you round the fireside rather than addresses you in a public meeting. For this reason her book ought to prove very acceptable on inhospitable rainy evenings.

Who is the author of "Recollections of Three Kaisers"? Did he write his diary in German or in English? Who expanded it into its present form? What liberties, if any, did the translator, or adapter, take with the original? Such complete anonymity shrouding the published work seems to me to arouse, not the reader's sense of mystery alone, but also and inevitably his scepticism, suggesting to him a possible relaxation of responsibility on the part of someone or other whom he ought to be able to trust. After all, the book itself contains less startling revelations than have been published elsewhere by men who have not been afraid to own a name. It is pleasantly discursive, entertaining, and discreetly indiscreet. But it would, I think, have carried greater weight among serious readers, if its translator or adapter had not been as incurably modest as its author.

As to the three remaining books, it is more difficult to settle their order of precedence—they are all so good. Sir Dunbar Plunket Barton compresses into one fat volume the gist of his three previous works on the same subject. The story he tells is amazing indeed—of a man who, starting as a runaway recruit, became Marshal of France, Prince of the French Empire, King of Norway and Sweden, and a founder of the Royal House of Sweden. Of the same race as d'Artagnan, he possessed all that swashbuckler's fire, energy, and canny prudence; but unlike d'Artagnan his star led him into the highest places—and he followed his star. The book, already of absorbing interest, is the more worth reading for being written by a man of special authority on his subject; and it is fully documented.

About a year ago, Mr. Forester won great praise by his naval novel, "Brown on Resolution." This he has followed up with a vivid popular account of one of England's greatest sailors, a portrait of the man rather than a history of his doings—though naturally his career, so full of adventure, is indispensable to the proper delineation of his portrait. But the career takes an almost secondary place in the book; Nelson himself becomes human—a man of indomitable determination, inexhaustible energy, and unshakeable sense of duty who, as he entered the battle of Trafalgar, took leave of one of his commanders with the words, "God bless you, Blackwood, I shall never speak to you again." Mr. Forester's work might have been more valuable to students had it included a page-by-page note of sources; but as a character sketch authoritatively and beautifully written there will be few books this spring to rival it.

The career of Charles Maudant, Earl of Peterborough (1658–1735), was full of adventures, turns of fortune and romance. He was soldier, sailor, politician—and, according to his friend, Dean Swift, "the ramblingest lying rogue on earth." The biography of such a man as this, living in a peculiarly intricate age, requires a writer of voluminous knowledge, insight, sympathy, and literary charm. General Ballard goes far towards combining these essentials. He has presented us with an extremely good piece of work—a book of unflagging interest, which carries its readers through a long and complicated life with clarity and ease. Its value, alike to the historian and to the book-lover, is further enhanced by its reproductions of contemporary prints and portraits.

LIFE IN CHINA.*

Man records his existence in the world in many forms. There was a time when the word "slavery" was merely a callous recognition of a brutal fact; later it was glossed over with platitudes about the dignity of labour and the brotherhood of man; now all that is best in human nature recoils from the contemplation of its horrors. We comfort ourselves with the thought that it is one of those unhappy things long since relegated to the limbo of the past, and we are rudely disillusioned by Lady Simon's statement that there are at least four million—probably six million—slaves still in bondage, victims of "the supreme offence against the human race," as Lady Simon says. Abyssinia accounts for over two millions. In Arabia there are about 700,000, probably 500,000 in Liberia—which was founded in 1847 as a national home for liberated slaves—and something like two millions in China. Slavery exists in Sierra Leone and in Burma, and in Central and South America is to be found that peculiar system of peonage which is called debt-bondage by its apologists.

Under the guidance of Lord Cecil the League of Nations passed its Slavery Convention in 1926. At the time it was estimated that there were three million slaves in the world. Abyssinia, Liberia and China are members of the League. In China slavery exists as child servitude—the Mui Tsai system. Mr. Coates's picture of the sufferings of some Mui Tsais, quoted by Lady Simon, is by no means a true picture of their condition generally. Great destitution prevails in China. There is no organised charity, and the Mui Tsais are invariably the offspring of necessitous parents. On the whole, they enjoy a much higher standard of living than they would find in their own homes. Geographical proximity makes it inevitable that Hong Kong should share some of China's social evils; but the Mui Tsais belonging to Chinese families in the British colony are protected by law against outrages of any sort. Orders have now been issued for the complete suppression of the evil there.

We have not yet succeeded in abolishing slavery in the Protectorate of Sierra Leone, nor do we seem to be within measurable distance of doing so. Indeed in 1927 a Court—sitting at Freetown!—ruled that a slave-owner in the Protectorate was entitled to recapture a runaway slave.

Lady Simon has set out on the fine endeavour to put an end to slavery all over the world. Hers was a great incentive: "I was compelled to write this book as a duty to my own conscience." She pays no particular heed to the difficulties that retard official action. Perhaps she is right. The magic of political discussion can transmute base metal into pure gold. Yet there must be quick action, for at the present rate of emancipation it will take about a thousand years to free all the slaves in the world. Lady Simon appeals to the League of Nations to secure an international agreement, which is the only way of bringing about corporate and effective action in this vital matter.

"Slavery" is not a noisy denunciation of an atrocious institution. It is a brave and stimulating book, written with the eloquence begotten of sincerity and complete honesty of purpose, yet not without skill in handling a mass of material. Lady Simon has made an important contribution to the study of a great and urgent problem.

China is a land of endless surprises. We have unfortunately little trustworthy evidence of the daily life of her inscrutable people. Where else in the world would a man be chairman of a society for preserving an ancient wall as an archæological relic and also chairman of another society for tearing it down to give place to a tramway? Browning might have helped us much if he had thought fit to write some "Parleyings with certain Chinese people." But his interests lay nearer home.

Lady Hosie's intimate knowledge of China and the Chinese entitles her to speak with authority. Intimacy and wise understanding lead to sympathy, the true sympathy that can castigate as well as condone, and Lady Hosie writes with an affection shorn of all false sentimentality. She has already made her contribution—a very delightful one—to a correct knowledge of the Chinese in "Two Gentlemen of China." That book dealt with the generation that is passing. The present volume deals with the Chinese of to-day. She discusses the people rather than their leaders. That is all to the good, for we know far too little about the simple, courteous, lovable people. Of the leaders, military and political, we have greater knowledge and it inspires neither confidence nor respect.

The central figure of the book is Mrs. Sung, a charming lady of the new China. But there is a background of diversified types—professors, doctors, nuns, soldiers, bandits, etc. Lady Hosie has arranged her material deftly into an entertaining and informative book, illustrated by twenty-five appropriate photographs, which can be confidently recommended to all who would acquire useful knowledge pleasantly. Naturally she dwells on the estimable qualities of the Chinese, but she gives us glimpses of the less engaging side of their character as well. Centuries of gruelling poverty have converted the masses to a fatalism that enables them to endure the direst tribulations with equanimity. The horrors of lawlessness and cruelty are accepted as part of the natural order of things—a fact that greatly puzzles the foreigner.

WHAT IS COMING IN RUSSIA?*

Nearly half a century ago Europe was startled by the publication of a series of articles in the Contemporary Review, signed "E. B. Lanin," revealing almost unspeakable corruption in Tsarist Russia. It gradually transpired that "E. B. Lanin" was an Irishman, by name of Dillon, ex-professor in Kharkov University, and editor of a great Russian paper. Later Dr. Dillon joined the staff of the Daily Telegraph, and from that time has ranked among the great figures of British journalism.

He is a true cosmopolitan. Born in Ireland of an Irish father and Russian mother, educated in Belfast, Paris and German universities, and winning his doctorate in Oriental languages in Petrograd and Louvain, he brought to his life's work rare gifts. I first met him, a quiet-spoken little man, immediately after the siege of Peking, where he had employed his leisure making a new translation of the Greek Testament. That was typical of him. His journey through Armenia in disguise, when Turkey had slammed the door of that land in the face of the world, is an epic of the Press.

Russia has always been Dr. Dillon's own special field. In the autumn of 1928 he revisited it to study the changes wrought by Bolshevism. Such a journey, almost as though a man had come back from the dead to a transformed world, could not fail to be of interest, and Dr. Dillon's description is gripping and moving.

Drawing by FRANK E. SLATER.

A. A MILNE.

He started at Leningrad, the one-time Petersburg, where he had lived so many years. "Standing now in front of the Kazan Cathedral, contrasting past with present, I felt that since Medea cut a tough old ram to pieces, boiled these in her cauldron, and then took out a frisky young lamb, no such an amazing metamorphosis was known even to legendary lore." The once crowded Nevsky Prospekt, the Regent Street of Petersburg, was now so deserted that a rifle could be fired down its centre without harming human being; its once almost continuous procession of splendid carriages and brilliant uniforms had disappeared; its rich and alluring shops had now turned to broken glass, nailed-up windows and doors and scaffolding used to screen ugly ruins; the once fine droshkies were decrepit and filthy. The old life had gone.

Had Dr. Dillon ended here, he would have said no more than scores of visitors before him. We are all familiar with tales of the ruin of Russia and the sufferings of its people. But Dr. Dillon uses this admitted destruction and suffering as the beginning of an investigation into what Bolshevism has actually done. "To me it seems to be the mightiest driving force for good or evil in the world to-day. It is certainly a stern reality, smelling perhaps of sulphur and brimstone, but with a mission on earth and a mission which will undoubtedly be fulfilled." Again he describes it as "one of the vast world cathartic agencies to which we sometimes give the name of fate, which appear at long intervals to consume the human tares, and clear the ground for a new order of men and things."

If he found death where there had once been life, he also found life where there was once death. "Under the regime of the Soviets, the Ukraine has risen from the dead." "The disenthralment and cultural uplift of the peasantry by the leaders of Bolshevism is one of the most marvellous feats on record."

Dr. Dillon gives much space to the problem of the peasant, for on the issue of the struggle now proceeding between him and the Government the future of the Communist State largely depends. "The peasants deliver no speeches. They merely act, leaving others to interpret their actions. Thus the authorities preach, exhort, menace and chastise, but the moozshik goes his way silently, mayhap unconverted and unrepenting, bearing with him the clue to the future of Sovietdom."

The second chief problem before Bolshevism Dr. Dillon finds in the sectarians, the Stundists, Molokani, Pashkovists, Adventists and the like, who refuse to be turned from their ways by the blandishments, threats or heavy pressure of zealous local authorities. "All the military force in the world is powerless against these obscure heroes." Dr. Dillon is convinced that the furious official campaign against religion has injured the Soviets, endangered the success of their policy and needlessly lowered their prestige. He ends his volume on an interrogative note. Knowing Russia so well, he refuses to forecast its future.

My second volume comes from another distinguished representative of Peterborough Court. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett was recently dispatched by the Daily Telegraph on a special mission of investigation into conditions in Russia. At the outset he described himself as impartial, going to Russia with an open mind. But Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett's whole training and viewpoint are in sharp opposition to the Bolshevists, and open-mindedness cannot come merely by desiring it.

Within obvious limits Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett has done his work very well. His pages are entertaining and eminently readable, and from them one can obtain a sharply defined picture of conditions as they appear within the Russian cities to-day. Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett did not apparently go much outside the great cities, and did not probe deeply below the surface. Many of his facts and conclusions were evidently gleaned from the diplomatic representatives of some of the European Powers then resident in Moscow.

The correspondent was received with much friendliness by the Soviet chiefs, and they have since made no secret of their view that he treated their hospitality somewhat cavalierly. Certainly he has criticised the manners and appetites of his hosts and fellow guests in a way that is not common. He is convinced that existing conditions cannot endure indefinitely. Sooner or later a palace revolution, within the ranks of the Communist party, will pave the way for a more moderate regime.

F. A. MACKENZIE.

THE TRADE OF POLITICS.*

It is not easy to place Mr. Oliver's book in its part of the subject-index of the library. In his first lines he tells us that: "Its subject is the endless adventure of governing men. Its object is to show how politicians of various sorts contrived to carry on governments, and to thwart, discredit and destroy governments, during the reign of George the First and a portion of the reign of George the Second." And when he goes on a little later to write: "I have not concerned myself except from necessity with battles, sieges and campaigns, with social and industrial progress, or with evolution of religion, art, science and literature," one begins to feel that all he has left is the rather sordid tale of how a few political adventurers—note it is his own term!—have squabbled for their spoils just as pirates (or rats) fight for their prey.

Mr. Theodore Dreiser, whose new book, "Gallery of Women," Messrs. Constable will publish this month.

Of course Mr. Oliver is not nearly as bad as he thus threatens; although he declares that his endeavour will be "to consider their craftsmanship rather than their morals," yet he obviously attaches great importance to the standards and ethics of public life and practice. Indeed later on he tells us that morals "can never be kept out of any discussion of human affairs." It is perhaps unfair to judge of his success; for the present volume is only the first of three. One can only say that so far it is not very clear at what end Mr. Oliver is aiming. He very frankly says that "this book is no more a biography than it is a history." When he also confesses that he has not discovered any fresh material by original research, the statement will not disappoint the sensible reader. For we have got to a point in the study of history when it is more important to rearrange and revalue the material already collected than to spend years in cataloguing and sorting out documents which are usually of somewhat trivial aid towards a judgment. So if Mr. Oliver has directed his energy to interpretation of documents already printed rather than to clearing up muniment-rooms, that will probably be all to the good.

Nevertheless one cannot see very clearly that he has served any very useful purpose. He has written of a period in English history when the older mediæval political system had gone through the transition stage of the Tudor and Stewart experiments, and was just emerging as the fairly distinct structure of the modern Parliament, with its Cabinet and all the manners and methods that were attaching themselves thereto. He might, in short, have written a scientific study of the early days of parliamentary government. But one can scarcely say that would be an accurate description of this book. Mr. J. M. Robertson has written a political study of Sir Robert Walpole and Lord Bolingbroke; and so seriously did he take his subject that he found it necessary—as an introduction—to write a long book on the development of political theory and practice since the days of Greece. It is one of the most scholarly and brilliant works of social science; and when he faced Walpole himself he gave us a very profound analysis.

Compared with Mr. Robertson's scientific work, Mr. Oliver's volume is rather like the amiable chatter of a rather glib conversationalist at a smart West End club. It is quite good conversation undoubtedly; but it reminds one a little too much of the rather vague talk of retired generals and their friends (certainly very nice and honourable fellows), who have been so busy with official duties that they have never had time to dig very deeply into the more abstract realms of thought. And like some of the retired military gentlemen, Mr. Oliver is lured away by the name Lenin into a long digression. The present reviewer confesses he skipped that digression; for having already been held up by a discussion as to whether Scot or Scotch, etc. etc,, was correct, he could no longer resist a desire to hear something about the immediate subject of this book. Now, with twenty pages of notes before him, he endeavours to sum up what he has discovered of new thought on Walpole and his political companions and enemies. Most of the "thought" may be "new" in West End clubs, but it will be scarcely very revealing to anyone who has given any time to historical literature. It is all rather superficial. For example, on the South Sea Bubble, a very great event in Walpole's career, it would be hard for the most intelligent reader to get any accurate impressions of the main issues; indeed Mr. Oliver writes: "The true inner history of these occurrences has never been laid bare." Has he never read the masterly account of the whole affair written by Professor W. R. Scott in his great work on English Companies?

This is just one hint of the amateurish quality of Mr. Oliver's book. As against the professional historian, who so often cannot see the wood for the trees, there is great need for the amateur. But the new historian must stick very rigidly to the facts, and not let himself be allured along side-roads of vague guessing and verbose imagination. Most of Mr. Oliver's many character sketches are probably as near the truth as mortal judgment can go; but it would be more helpful (as well as more courteous to his readers' intelligence) if he gave us more of the facts on which his sketches are based. After all, a few words by contemporaries like Hervey and Chesterfield are better than modern commentators. One turns page after page with scarcely a contemporary quotation—from a speech or a letter or a pamphlet; and paragraph after paragraph of rather fluid remarks, in which the solid substance is floated along rather evasively in a conversational stream that sometimes tends to drowsiness. So much of Mr. Oliver's wisdom, one would hope, is more obvious than he appears to imagine.

One is glad to note that Mr. Oliver is not a great believer in war as a way of becoming prosperous and happy. He says: "Commercial and financial interests have frequently been misled by it. It has been the favourite bait, thrown out to catch the vulgar by military cliques and by groups of factious politicians." During the recent Great War Mr. Oliver wrote a book, "Ordeal by Battle," which the Annual Register described as "written mainly for the purpose of advocating compulsory military service." Which is an example of how easily the soldiers and politicians trap the best of men.

STANDISH O'GRADY.*

This book is not, and probably is not meant to be, the memoir that Standish O'Grady deserves at the hands of his countrymen. It is slight. It is disjointed. It is good only in parts. From it one can gather an impression of the man and writer O'Grady was, together with some imperfect account of his adventures in other fields than letters; but few who remember the man, know his writings, came under his influence, were infected with his enthusiasms of various kinds and qualities, will rest satisfied with impressions. In a book of its size Lytton Strachey might have done O'Grady justice; failing one of his capacity, we must rest content with what we have, for the present, in these eighty-four pages by various hands, feeling thankful that O'Grady is not forgotten, that the Talbot Press are issuing cheap editions of his more famous writings, and that the tribute herein printed from the hand of A. E. is in itself memorable.

The memoir of twenty-five pages, by his second son, gives some of the salient facts of O'Grady's full and varied life. He came of an old Irish family of country squires and notables, one of whom became Lord Chief Baron; another was the Standish of "Jack Hinton," another was one of Nelson's captains, and O'Grady's own father entered the Church and is the original of that charming old scholar who appears in "Lost on Du Corrig" and "The Chain of Gold." As a boy Standish himself drank full of the wild grandeur and loneliness of Crookhaven and Dunmanus; more, and perhaps to more effect, among those hills and vales of South Ireland, he had early vision of those Veiled Forms that, as much maybe as any aspect of nature, influenced the development of his genius. He grew, we learn, to manhood with two main possessions—a deep religious feeling and a minute knowledge of the Bible; two possessions, by the way, that left a vivid mark on almost everything he wrote. Current evils to O'Grady always were devilish things to be denounced by him with a fervid eloquence akin to the style of Isaiah or Jeremiah. And he did not shrink from applying the ethics of the Sermon on the Mount to the plight of erring women and destitute children.

He loved Virgil too, and Homer gave him the models of those Irish heroes and Elizabethan chieftains that you shall find, large and magnificent and glowing with abundant life, in the Cuchulain Cycle, in "Finn and His Companions," and in that magnificent book, "The Flight of the Eagle," a story full of research and the most patient labour. If it was mere chance, as might appear, that turned O'Grady to study and re-creation of Ireland's legendary past—what inspiring chance was that! For it is only truth to say that Standish O'Grady made possible the famous Irish movement in drama and letters; inspired Yeats, Synge and George Russell, his most enthusiastic disciple; he too who nurtured the spirit of revival, so clamant now in the affairs of the Free State he worked for and lived to see accomplished.

Anyone who wishes to gauge O'Grady's influence in Ireland, not in a literary direction altogether, but in such matters as politics, industry, social reform, the fate of landlordism and aristocracy, should read A. E.'s fine tribute in this volume to a man whom enthusiastically, almost passionately, he acclaims as epic poet, incomparable historian, bestower of "the greatest spiritual gift any Irishman for centuries has given to Ireland," furthermore a fighter born than whom "no man in Ireland intervened in the affairs of his country with a superior nobility of aim."

Tributes and memoirs however are not enough, but only preliminaries to that acquaintance with the man, writer and publicist so manifest in O'Grady's books. These are now available in the cheap uniform edition, published by the Talbot Press; at least the best and most popular of them, including the great Cuchulain Cycle and the other heroic tales, the books your boys will love, and the rest. Later you may advance to O'Grady's studies in Elizabethan history, gaining thereby new light on tangled fields; to those passionate appeals to landlords and gentry and the no less stirring denunciations of their national worthlessness; may go on even to find in the columns of All Ireland, that whimsical and unique effort in one-man journalism, how lovable a man Standish O'Grady was, how courteous and dignified and humorous, yet possessed always of a real spirit of Christian humility and kindliness.

In England little is known of Colonel William Smith or his Lady, for they lived when "the half-built audience-room of the White House was used as a drying-room in which to hang up the clothes," when the great staircase was not finished and but six chambers were made comfortable. It was thus in 1800, when John Adams and his wife Abigail ruled at the White House after George Washington. The author of this volume has made the best possible use of many letters relating to the Adamses and their son-in-law, Colonel William Smith, and also of the journals left by Abby Smith and her daughter Caroline—discursive, intimate writings, which are fragrant with sweet memories and full of history. When John Adams was appointed Commissioner to France he took his wife and daughter there with him, and it was there and in England that the Colonel wooed his lady. In the beginning of June, 1786, John Adams writes: "I have given my daughter to Colonel Smith, a man of merit formed in the school of his country's afflictions." The Colonel had to live in that school to the end, for his uprightness and independence made him political enemies who kept him from advancement.

The wandering desire is developed in us mostly during youth, when there is generally no chance of gratifying it. Major A. Radclyffe Dugmore however just fell into it naturally, for as a small boy he lived with his people in an Irish castle which was centuries old; and changed that for a yacht seventy feet long, in which the family lived in the Mediterranean for nearly two years. Then the yacht was run over to America, and so began the wanderings in quest of wild life. Major Dugdale tells a fascinating story of his journeyings through America and Africa, of his successes and failures, one which nature lovers will welcome the more that he never shot the animals except with a camera. He had many thrills with elephants, lions and other big game, and some pleasant triumphs with birds. Major Dugdale's work is now so well known through pen, pencil and film that it seems superfluous to praise it.

Miss Eveline Godley has retold from the State Trials the account of the trial of Count Königsmarck in February, 1682. She prefaces it with a biography of this Swedish-German Count, which certainly flings an heroic halo about him. He did doughty deeds on the sea which seem to belong to the viking period—indeed "gossip, scandal and legend followed him like his shadow." His sending men to shoot Tom Thynne because he had married an heiress coveted by himself is very much the sort of thing a viking would do. He got his man killed and three men, one a most faithful vassal, hung, and went free himself, though he never married the lady. Five years later, when fighting against the Turks, Königsmarck was killed at the age of twenty-eight. His body was taken to the family mausoleum in their German estate at Stade. Thomas Thynne's body had been buried in the Abbey, where his ridiculous tombstone can be seen any day. For the faithful vassal, Königsmarck himself had provided; the body of Kratz was embalmed with great care, placed in "a rich coffin lined with lead, too magnificent for so daring and horrid a murderer, and by the king's permission transported to Holland." So says Evelyn.

Miss Godley's extracts from "State Trials" give a valuable glimpse into the method of trial in those days.

CLARE JERROLD.

THE PREJUDICES OF PURITANISM.†

Epictetus once declared that he was a soul dragging about a corpse. He was, in the broadest sense of the word, a Puritan. He drew a sharp distinction between the life of the instincts, which we share with the beasts of the field, and the life of reason, which is characteristically human. And he would place the reins of control wholly in the hands of reason. Although it is not possible nowadays to accept so simple a psychological creed, the attitude towards life which such a creed implies is always possible. There will always be people with so profound a mistrust of the natural instincts and impulses as a guide to human life, that they refuse them any say in its direction. There will always in fact be Puritans. And the title of Mr. Kingsmill's book is a misnomer, unless we use the word Puritan in a narrower sense.

This in fact Mr. Kingsmill does. He defines Puritanism rather vaguely as "an attempt to simplify the relation of man to the universe in accordance with the model of this relation exhibited in the Hebrew Scriptures." Beginning as far back as Tudor times, the movement, according to Mr. Kingsmill, came to an end about 1850. He contends that it would have died an easy and natural death about 1820 had it not been kept alive by artificial stimulants. These stimulants were supplied by the wealthy classes, who, threatened by the revolutionary spirit that had broken out so disastrously in France, "instinctively turned to Puritanism, an engine of repression exactly suited to their needs."

The main thesis of Mr. Kingsmill's book is the decline and fall of Puritanism during the second half of the nineteenth century. The enemy was mainly within the gates. The author's method is to deal in detail with the lives of four men who were largely responsible for the break-up of the system—Dean Farrar, Samuel Butler, Frank Harris, and W. T. Stead. Dean Farrar and Mr. Stead were Puritans to the end (for the author regards Evangelicalism as the guise taken in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries by the Puritans of the seventeenth century), and even Samuel Butler was a Puritan under his skin, as the Darwinians discovered when they scratched him. As for Mr. Frank Harris, I fear that his sole claim to be regarded as in any sense a Puritan would rest on the fact that his father was one and that he was brought up in the North of Ireland.

Leaving out Mr. Stead for the moment, we find each of Mr. Kingsmill's heroes knocking down different pieces of the Puritan structure. Farrar destroyed the belief in hell, and challenged the doctrine of the total depravity of children. The older Puritans never wasted any sentiment on children. Children were conceived in sin and all their ways were wicked. In the Victorian era however a flood of emotionalism poured over the young. Many a tear was shed over the May Queen of Tennyson, and many more over the sickly children of Dickens's imagination—Little Nell and Paul Dombey. So when Farrar wrote "Eric, or Little by Little," he was not consciously attacking a theological doctrine, as he was in his sermons on "Eternal Hope," but almost unconsciously expressing the spirit of the age.

Samuel Butler's contribution was of a different kind. His attack was on the Puritan theory of the family. That theory is expressed by the author as follows:

> "Fallible human beings, merely through becoming parents (not a highly specialised achievement), took on a sacrosanct character, appearing to their children as faultless beings who were delaying their return to Heaven solely from a great-hearted resolve to redeem their thankless and depraved offspring, if redemption were any way possible, from the well-earned pains of hell."

"The Way of All Flesh" is a bitter comment on this theory. But Butler went further than that. He was not content with questioning Christian theology, he questioned Christian morality as well. The full significance of the satire in "Erewhon" was not grasped till some years after the book was published.

Frank Harris's point of attack was Victorian reticence. There never was a time in the history of English literature when the mention of certain aspects of human life was so rigidly tabooed as in the days of Victoria. To-day there is a violent reaction. From the age of the Puritans we have arrived at the age of the Impuritans, as a recent writer

* "Colonel William Smith and Lady." By Katharine Metcalf Roof. 24s. (Constable.)—"The Autobiography of a Wanderer." By Major A. Radclyffe Dugmore. 18s. (Hurst & Blackett.)—"The Trial of Count Königsmarck." Edited by the Hon. Eveline Godley. 7s. 6d. (Peter Davies.)

has called them. One of the earliest of the Impuritans was Mr. Frank Harris, at one time editor of the Evening News, at another time editor of the Saturday Review, and more recently the author of an autobiography which is unobtainable in this country.

Mr. Kingsmill finally deals with Mr. Stead, towards whom he appears much less sympathetic than towards his other characters. Stead did nothing towards breaking down the tyranny of Puritanism. In fact he was himself a Puritan of the most rigid type, attempting methods of reform which had become out of date. The author credits Mr. Stead with good intentions in publishing the "Maiden Tribute" articles, but seems to regard the whole thing as much ado about nothing. Nor does he take very seriously Stead's interest in spiritualism. In fact he regards Mr. Stead as a Puritan born too late.

It is quite clear that the author is influenced by the psychological teachings which emanate from Vienna, and has consequently no great love for Puritanism. That mental state which the Puritans call "a conviction of sin"—a desirable state leading to salvation—is referred to by him as "a sense of guilt"—an undesirable state leading to neurosis. Yet he does not produce an impression of unfairness. He exhibits certain modern views, more often by subtle implication than by overt assertion. And he has a caustic humour which is very diverting. In fact the book is eminently readable and throws abundant light on the trend of thought in England towards the close of the last century. What Mr. Kingsmill has really shown us is how certain of the prejudices of Puritanism have passed away. But there are principles inherent in Puritanism which will never pass away. The dross will go, but the gold will remain.

MYSTERIES.

It is an indispensable condition of a good story of the occult that the reader should believe in it. Many of the authors who have dabbled in this attractive form of literature have been so absorbed in the supernormal incident which induced them to write that they have not given enough thought to the normal happenings which led up to their incident and have consequently failed to endow the incident itself with verisimilitude. Some of the stories in the American volume[1] have excellent themes with striking climaxes, but too often the preliminary matter is so perfunctorily sketched—as if the author himself were not interested in it—that the reader's mind is not properly prepared. "What Was It?" a well-known yarn by Fitz-James O'Brien, suffers in this way. The theme itself is hair-raising enough but the author hurries along with statements like: "Mr. A., as everyone knows, escaped to Europe, and died not long after of a broken heart," which are so casual and unconvincing in themselves that the mind is not ready to give credence to the horrors which are afterwards described. There are, however, some good specimens of strange stories in this volume, by famous dead writers like Poe, Mark Twain, Washington Irving, Ambrose Bierce and Nathaniel Hawthorne, as well as by living authors like Theodore Dreiser, Edith Wharton and many others.

Algernon Blackwood on the other hand is known chiefly for his work in this genre, and the omnibus volume which Messrs. Heinemann have just issued[2] witnesses not merely to his productivity but to the high level of his achievement. Very rarely does he choose a hackneyed theme, and many of his stories possess an individuality which separates them from the mass of spookmongery which some competent story-tellers are prone to exploit. There is also a half philosophical, half metaphysical current streaming through his work which may not reach great depths but does create that atmosphere of serious conviction which is an essential ingredient of stories of the occult. Moreover Mr. Blackwood shows considerable skill in the manipulation of words and can make them express what he wishes. That strangely convincing though, coldly considered, incredible story of "The Man Whom the Trees Loved," for instance, might have been ludicrious in less skilled hands:

"For wet and shimmering presences stood grouped all round that bed. She saw their outline underneath the ceiling, the green, spread bulk of them, their vague extension over walls and furniture. They shifted to and fro, massed yet translucent, mild yet thick, moving and turning within themselves to a hushed noise of multitudinous soft rustling."

It was a happy inspiration to gather these twenty-six stories together in a single volume. All of them are readable; many of them as good examples of their kind as one might hope to find, and they are written in that intimate, circumstantial manner which makes them especially suitable for reading aloud over the fire o' nights.

Colonel E. Alexander Powell's book deals with another order of mystery. Here we have not fiction but (one fears) fact. The "last home of mystery"[3] is Nepal, but nearly half of the book is concerned with the journey on the way thither through India. Colonel Powell has a lively, practised pen and a certain power of description which is most effective when he is least self-conscious. His somewhat overheated accusations make one a little chary of accepting all his generalisations, especially as he cultivates an audacity which bespeaks a love of sensationalism. Among other unorthodox opinions he throws out this comment made by a British official about Colonel Lawrence. "Lawrence?" he repeated. "Oh, yes. He's quite a clever fellow, and did some rather useful work out here during the War. But I can name half a dozen men who have forgotten more about the Arab than he ever knew."

He spares us no detail of the horrors associated with the Hindu religion as practised in India. "Mother India" has familiarised us with such matters, and Mr. Aldous Huxley's "Jesting Pilate," though more discreet, was scarcely more reassuring. Nepal—some of whose magnificence the author not ineffectively describes—seems no less corrupt, and one feels that the chief need here, as in India, is for a completely new system of sanitation, moral and physical. There are a number of excellent photographs.

Mysteries of yet another kind are the subject of Lieut.-Commander R. T. Gould's "Enigmas,"[4] which would probably find itself in Charles Lamb's category of biblia-a-biblia—books which are not books. The author describes it as a "book of unexplained facts," and in a modest preface claims to have put together, with the relevant material which he has collected, "the facts relating to a number of incidents which have not, at present, been satisfactorily explained." Thus, we have a chapter on giants, full of curious information and accompanied by an interesting engraving; the diverting story of "Old Parr," who was over one hundred and fifty when he died, and other cases of alleged longevity; an account of the Bealing Bells (which "rang scores of times when no one was in the passage, or back-house, or house, or grounds unseen"), which links this book to those dealt with earlier; interesting chapters on alchemy, the landfall of Columbus, the canals of Mars, and divers queer matters. "Enigmas" is another book for a rainy day, a book which will stock the reader with knowledge unlikely to be in his friends' possession and thus give him the pull over them.

HERMON OULD.

Ewelina Korzeniowski
(the mother of Joseph Conrad).
From "The Polish Heritage of Joseph Conrad." By Gustav Morf Sampson Low).

THE POLISH JOSEPH CONRAD.*

Among the many sketches and fragmentary studies of Conrad which have appeared since his death in 1924, this book takes a leading place by reason of the author's thorough understanding not less than his special knowledge. It is especially good in its presentation of the neglected Polish background of the man who, after making a success of the career of an English seaman, made a still greater and more difficult conquest by becoming a famous novelist in our alien language.

Dr. Morf is able to go through the already voluminous literature about Conrad, and the often misleading confessions of Conrad himself, and to cross the "t's" and dot the "i's" of truth for us. I find especially interesting his examination of the biographical associations in "Nostromo," for that yarn of a very brief glimpse of Venezuela, and an incident noted in an old book which Conrad gave out as the origin of the story, was far from adequate to explain the richness of feeling, the imaginative passion poured into the most complicated of his novels.

One example may perhaps be quoted to show the importance of Dr. Morf's special knowledge, allied to his critical faculty, in interpreting Conrad for us. He says:

"On page 479 of 'Nostromo' may be found another Polish reminiscence. Every year the owner of a famous coffee plantation sends three sacks of coffee-beans to a patriotic society in remembrance 'of the third of May,' the date of an important battle. Now it so happens that the third of May (the only date mentioned in 'Nostromo') is one of the most important dates in Polish history—so important indeed that it is now the National Day. On that day, in 1791, the famous 'Constitution of the Third of May' was adopted by the Diet, converting Poland into hereditary limited monarchy with ministerial responsibility, and establishing the libreum veto and other anomalies."

This is followed by quotations from the same novel, concerning the name of Nostromo, which was a mispronunciation of the Italian Nostro uomo, and the quotations amply support Dr. Morf's conjecture that Conrad had developed an "alien complex" from the misuse of his Polish name, Korzeniowski, while he was a seaman. This he had changed to Conrad, his second Christian name, long before he began to write. There is much in a name, in spite of the fact being well known that the most English names by no means certainly indicate the most English blood!

In the same helpful way the author is able to explain to us important characteristics of Polish temperament and "culture," all of which are elements of any reliable portrait (or should one say "psychograph"?) of Conrad. It is scarcely necessary to say that Conrad's critics in this country have lacked the necessary clues to explain many of Conrad's imaginative impulses. As an instance of how Conrad's personal confessions might lead one far from reality, I recall a long talk with him, during which I asked him if he could say what made him start writing. " Simply that I needed an occupation for my leisure," he replied. " It was not the need of self-expression." I must confess that I did not take the assertion seriously, but Dr. Morf, in his scrupulous examination of Conrad's work, leaves no room for doubt of the psychological necessity which drove Conrad to express through romantic fiction those unconscious elements in him which he could not disentangle logically.

The greatest of Conrad's inner conflicts was his divided feeling about Poland, to which all his temperament was loyal, and yet, by expressing itself in an escape from Poland into the wide adventurous world, it led him into what he himself said could be regarded strictly as a betrayal. This feeling, which he was constantly trying to banish by elaborate explorations into the reasons for being adventurous and romantic, caused him to burden most of his chief characters with an unescapable past. Perhaps no novelist in English has equalled, though some in Russian have done so, Conrad's dramatisation of the sense of sin.

A review of this book would be incomplete without reference to the connexions traced by the author between Conrad's mentality and the contrasting types of his paternal ancestors, the romantic and brilliant Korzeniowskis, and the maternal relatives, more practical and scrictly disciplined, the Bobrowskis. He brings fresh light to a reading of the two big volumes of Conrad's " Life and Letters," by M. Jean-Aubry, whose very useful work was mainly that of the gathering together of data rather than that of analysis.

The volume is interestingly illustrated, and almost free of misprints, though I may perhaps be allowed to mention one in the bibliography, since my " Talk with Joseph Conrad " is stated to be by " D. L. Mégroz " !

R. L. MÉGROZ.

POETRY AT PRESENT.*

This is Mr. Charles Williams's first book of prose, and it is written with the excellence to be expected from a poet of his distinction. It is doubly interesting because of its subject. Mr. Williams is concerned here with the poets of his day, and a poet's opinion of his fellows cannot fail to attract. " Poetry at Present " consists of sixteen chapters devoted to some eighteen authors, the members of the Sitwell family clubbing together to make one poor gaudy day. All the writers dealt with are living at the moment —whatever be their future—with the exception of Thomas Hardy, who died after the scheme of the book had been determined upon. The poets treated here must be considered those amongst his contemporaries for whom Mr. Williams feels the most distinguished consideration. Some names are omitted that one could wish to have received attention, but Mr. Williams's plan obviously includes criticising by silence. It would have given pleasure to some had the essayist's sensitive conscience consented to include Sir William Watson and Mr. Squire at least in these pages. The preface mitigates this severity by admitting " There are very distinguished poets now living whose work is generally admired, but they seem to have created that work not only within the tradition, but without affecting the tradition. It is possible that in a hundred years they may be remembered when some of the poets here discussed are forgotten, but even so, they are of their own order, and are therefore here excluded." These politenesses are not absolutely convincing, for it is plain that these writers are not the objects of Mr. Williams's predilection. He is certainly entitled to his opinion. It is very evident that he is a sound scholar and a sensitive critic, and of a devastating honesty withal. Seldom indeed are such critical acumen, good taste, and candour packed within the limits of one short essay. When the essayist is in accord and sympathy with his subject, as for instance in the chapters devoted to the Laureate and Mr. Lascelles Abercrombie, the result is a remarkably penetrating and subtle piece of appreciation, which cannot fail to be gratifying to these distinguished recipients. Other writers, less congenial to his temperament, may find that criticism goes like an arrow between the joints of their harness. This might be illustrated by the description of the essayist's reaction to reading the fifteen poems of Mr. Hardy's "Satires of Circumstance" at one sitting, but Mr. Hardy was ever a humorist, and perhaps it may be more convenient to stress this frankness from a general statement rather than from a particular occasion. Mr. Williams remarks in one of these essays that "It has been said, and not wholly unjustly, that the younger contemporary poets have only one fault—dullness. Observation, dexterity, feeling they have, but between their experience and their expression the interest has slipped away." Undoubtedly Mr. Williams would make drastic and immediate reservations from this sweeping statement. The work of Mr. Yeats, Mr. de la Mare, Mr. A. E. Housman and Mr. Hodgson, for example, is for him, as for us all, full of magic and excitement. But certainly much of the poetry of our day is dull. It fails to give the thrill that the Lake poets communicated. It does not excite as did the Victorian and the Pre-Raphaelite poets. Possibly it is because our present-day poets work on a smaller scale, deal with moods rather than emotions, and are frequently low-spirited in the trough of the War. For the poets of ideas enchant us still. Mr. Chesterton may be a traditional Catholic and Mr. Kipling an Old Testament Protestant. It is a trifle that their ideas are fundamentally opposed. Ideas are there, and incidentally the rhythm in which they are expressed is not dissimilar. Their enthusiasm is contagious, and they move and convince the reader while under their spell.

I remarked earlier in this notice that Mr. Williams is known—and he should be better known—as a poet. Affixed to each essay included in "Poetry at Present" is a poem reminding the reader agreeably of his quality. These end-pieces to the various chapters at times are studies in the matter and manner of the author under discussion. At others they give his personal reaction to his subject, as in the delightful poem to Mr. Yeats, the first poet he ever saw when young.

"Poetry at Present" is in the truest sense a memorable book. No saner and more sensitive studies have been written on the poets of to-day. It is a necessary handbook for the serious student of modern verse, and should that verse at times unfortunately prove dull, the hand of the dyer is not subdued to what it works in.

EUGENE MASON.

PASSING GOOD.*

To find plays of interest and distinction is said to be difficult, but this, when one can pick up half a dozen novels as good as these, cannot be said of fiction. Although representing several schools of creative writing, all are good of their kind. If Mr. Manning-Sanders's first novel was as interesting as "The Burnt Man," it is no wonder press and public gave it a good reception. His second is one of those the reader cannot put down till the final "they lived as happily as two people can, who have perfect faith in one another, gaining sanctuary against all the petty and greater ills of life that perplex the souls of men," and that in spite of certain irritating flaws. Why for instance should he speak of a woman as "virile"? Also does he not know—or wasn't there a doctor at hand to tell him—that people who have been long dumb, owing to a stroke (apoplectic seizure), do not on their deathbed regain the power of speech. Owing to a curse uttered by the moribund, Humphrey and Judy come together. So excellent however has been Mr. Manning-Sanders's characterisation that the reader is in no wise perturbed by this false note. Given their temperaments, those two must have married, and the how and why is not of the first importance. The tale is closely woven and the setting shows a deeply observed familiarity with country life. Humphrey Daine, in order to escape from unhappy circumstance, has fired his home and workshop and run from the scene. "The Burnt Man" gives his further adventures till he seeks sanctuary in a western village, eventually marrying Judith Ancell. Daine's father died insane, and one of the most convincing parts of the story is the way in which Daine himself is shown to be on the borderland for much of his time. Should such men marry? Well, they do, and leave their offspring a heritage of nerves. But Judy was sound as a bell, so perhaps in this particular instance all would be well.

"Time, Gentlemen, Time!" is also a second book. Its technique reveals events through the minds of the characters, and does this so continuously that narrative shows as a stream of thought. The title of the book is the potman's cry at closing time; and the story gives us a few days in the lives of a drunken solicitor and his unhappy wife. Not once has the temptation to sentimentalise individuals or situation been yielded to. Norah Hoult is to be congratulated on a fine book.

A slighter novel but more amusing is Mr. Gerhardi's "Pending Heaven." By means of a wandering, discursive, irresponsible narrative he deals with the love affairs of a fat, middle-aged novelist. Max Fisher is the type of man who makes more or less serious love to every woman who is willing that he should. As a consequence he eventually finds himself settled at Bou-Saada with three out of the many. He does not care greatly for any of them, and they remain in order to prove that each is preferred to the others. A fourth presently arrives and is a little surprised to find three already in residence. It is suggested by one of the four that they shall turn Mahommedan and constitute—whether Max likes it or not—the four wives allowed by the Prophet of Islam. The American however prefers monogamy and a man to herself, and departs with Max's best friend. In the end Max also departs in order either to live in a Grosvenor House flat or die—it is not quite clear which, nor with so unsympathetic a character as Max does it much matter. Humour the book has, also wit, but not much else. It is, as the writer says, "in the book of life a sorry page," but it offers an occasional pithy saying, as for instance: "There are two ways of being disappointed: getting what you want and not getting it."

"The Rough House," by Bruce Marshall, is an even more witty book than "Pending Heaven." It presents a slice of life instead of telling a story. To the modern such a slice makes a pattern. Mr. Marshall's slice is the rough house of the ideals and philosophy of life now generally accepted, and he contrasts with skill the offerings of self-mutilation made to the "bitch-goddess, Success," with those it would have been natural for a man to offer. I hope "The Rough House" will have more readers than seems possible from its subject. It should appeal to the young, to those as yet untainted by the madness to which Bruce Marshall demurs. The book paints rapidly a picture which both saddens and amuses. It is filled with laughter-evoking scenes and sayings, such as—"The American girl is very virtuous. Her stockings may be of silk but her morals are of granite," yet its content is serious.

From these books which are so English that their reader could believe England and her opinions and politics the largest and most important, if not the only country in the world, it is an interesting change to turn to Jo van Ammers's

* "The Burnt Man." By G. Manning Sanders. (Faber & Faber.)—"Time, Gentlemen, Time!" By Norah Hoult. (Heinemann.)—"Pending Heaven." By William Gerhardi. (Duckworth.)—"The Rough House." By Bruce Marshall. (Jarrolds.)—"Tantalus." By Jo van Ammers. (Jonathan Cape.) 7s. 6d. each.

"Tantalus," a study of Dutch life. In "The Rebel Generation," her previous book, we were given the reactions to the feminist movement of three generations. That was an interesting bit of history, but this is an intimate study of character, and as creative work the finer book. Seldom has a woman originated so close, so solid, so true a conception of masculine impulse as in this story of Evert Tideman, for it is not given to most women to sympathise with the wandering male. That Mrs. van Ammers should have selected him as the subject of her story shows the breadth not only of her gift but of her spirit. Tideman is happily married to as good a wife as can be imagined, he has pleasant children, yet he is a dreamer and he dreams of women. His business takes him to France and eventually to America, and in these lands he seeks new sensations. One of the subtlest strokes in the story is his failure—the natural failure of a weak man—to obtain the love of the women to whom he is attracted. Actually, instead of seducing, he is seduced. He falls a victim to a predatory woman past her first youth who insists on taking him from his wife and family; and who, because she is the stronger, succeeds. She is not domestic, she takes him into surroundings of discomfort, yet he cannot escape. Even as he is the prey to his unruly desires, so also is he the sufferer when his supposed desires are gratified. "Only you and I know that he was really not a Don Juan without scruples, but a big, silly boy always chasing the same dream," says his brother-in-law, but Evert was more than silly, he was spineless, and nothing Thora, his wife, could have done would have prevented his descent into hell. Mrs. Jo van Ammers has told an enthralling story. Each of her books is an advance on the last, or as the well-worn cliché puts it, she goes "from strength to strength."

C. A. Dawson Scott.

STILL THEY COME.*

If the present writer has done nothing else for literature he has, at any rate, given the word "spate" a breath of fresh air. A couple of months ago, when commenting on the torrent of War books, he remarked, "Still the spate roars by unchecked." Since then either these actual words, or the metaphor implicit in them, have confronted him in journal after journal and in review after review. From Golder's Green to Grub Street spate has lined up amongst the "blessed words" of journalism. The books still pour by. The cry is still they come. Echo indeed answers, "More than that: some of them come back a second time." There are second editions, reprints and new impressions. The French however have an apt saying to the effect that to go back is not to return.

"Mons, Anzac and Kut" originally appeared anonymously—in the "dead" year of 1919 and is now published for the first time with the author's name, as well as with an introduction from the pen of Mr. Desmond MacCarthy describing Mr. Aubrey Herbert's remarkable and attractive personality. The title is self-explanatory, and it will be seen that the scope of the book is roughly the first half of the War. The reviewer confesses that it is a relief to him to get away from the views and impressions of platoon commanders and privates of the New Armies and to have some change from the everlasting Ypres and Somme. Aubrey Herbert was Eton, Christ Church and Foreign Office—a man of high social position, widely travelled, master of several languages—one being Turkish—and with deep knowledge of men and things. He was in Parliament when war broke out, and in addition had been honorary attaché first at Tokio and later at Constantinople. Defective eyesight put combatant service out of the question, and he was at first attached to the Irish Guards in 1914 as interpreter; wounded at Villers Cotterets, he regained his liberty by the battle of the Marne. Later he held Intelligence appointments in Gallipoli and Mesopotamia, owing to what he modestly describes as " a fairly fluent smattering of several Eastern languages." The book is a reproduction of his diary which closes on May 12th, 1916. Its chief charm is the air of detachment in which it is written, enhanced by the fact that, to a certain extent, the author had a foot in both camps. Particularly was this the case in Mesopotamia where, in the negotiations which preceded the fall of Kut, Aubrey Herbert had more than one interview with Turkish generals and renewed acquaintance with Turkish officials he had known before at Constantinople. Throughout the book there runs a strain of slightly cynical reflection from a rather " superior " viewpoint. It has an interest of its own, but it wears a bit thin at this time of day.

The next two books on the list—" Mud and Khaki " and " Pass Guard at Ypres "—deal entirely with the famous Salient; and in each book the deepest blood-bath is " Hooge, 1915," than which, in the opinion of many who went through the whole War in France, there was no more dreadful experience. The former volume is confined to part of the year 1915, and consists of the record of a private in the ranks of the H.A.C., jotted down on occasional off days. The key-note of the book—the foreground and the whole middle distance of the picture—is mud. The publishers say in a note that this " cheerful " account may be contrasted with " All Quiet on the Western Front," as the author and his friends " appear to have enjoyed life even in the worst of times." We have an uneasy feeling that this is what our American cousins would call " blah." There is no " enjoyment " in the book. How could there be? But it is interesting as the record of a soldier not cursed with too vivid an imagination; who had no illusions whatever; and who had " guts "—about the finest make-up that anyone committed to the Salient in general, and to Hooge in particular, could have possessed.

Except for the common background of Ypres, " Pass Guard at Ypres " is of an entirely different kind. It is in the form of a novel and is, in its tragic intensity, as terrible as a Greek play. The subject has become hackneyed enough—the breaking of a boy's body, the sapping of his courage, the shattering of his ideals, and the killing—almost—of his soul. The qualification is called for seeing that in the final pages Ypres becomes personified and consoles the dying lad. We frankly say that we consider the ending unworthy of the terrific but restrained strength of the rest of the book. It smacks of Hollywood rather than recalls Æschylus. And we feel—just as we feel with " Retreat "—that the characterisation is rather over-emphasised The curly-headed young officer is just too cherubic—even if he was nicknamed " Cherub "—and we might indeed say too green. The old soldier—with his reminiscences of South Africa—is rather too like what Mr. Kipling might have have made of one of " Her Majesty's Jollies." And we frankly say that the regular officer commanding the depot of the Southshires—a medley of the Reverends Barlow and Eliot Warne—is sheer knock-about. Still, we place this book just on the borderline between the " great " and the " very good " books of the War, and we are by no means sure that it does not merit inclusion in the former rather than in the latter category.

" Everyman at War " opens up the rather disconcerting prospect that everyone who fought in the late Armageddon may in time write a book or an article about it. It is almost as difficult to review this book as it would be to comment on a composite photograph. Some forty years ago Mr. Stead used to make a feature of these things in the Review of Reviews, and the recollection left upon the memory of the present writer is that if Sir William Harcourt's countenance was one of the superimposed faces, then he dominated the result completely. In this book the army almost submerges the sister services, for Sea and Air contribute but three chapters apiece out of the sixty that go to make up the book. And as regards the proportion of land warfare, we hardly feel that the Western Front should have more than eighteen times the amount of space vouchsafed to Mesopotamia. As regards the articles themselves, they vary—naturally—a good deal in merit. But it is trying Everyman rather high to launch his rather staccato reminiscences at a moment when the literary merit of War books is so extraordinarily good.

A review of " Journey's End. The Novel " divides itself naturally into two parts. The first is concerned with the pre-war narrative of Stanhope, Jimmy Raleigh and Madge as quite young people. This is short; contains some very conventional public-school stuff; and is quite obviously but a peg on which to hang the story proper. The second part—the " novelisation " of the play—makes one feel at first rather like the man who thought that " Hamlet " was made up of quotations, and after that there is a kind of feeling that one has got hold of a stage manager's copy with copious stage directions and scribbled details of " business." In the end one is left rather wondering how the story would have held its own against other War novels had the play never been written. On the whole we feel that it would have come well out of the ordeal, but a verdict can only be given by someone who has never seen the play; nor read it in the contemporary press; nor heard it on the wireless. There must be few in such a securus judicat position.

Mr. Wyrall's second volume about The King's in the Great War is one of those books which, although caviare—by the hundredweight—to the particular people concerned with, or interested in, the regiment, are Gargantuan mutton cold to the general public. Inevitably this must be so in the case of a regimental history, which has to deal with several battalions not—as is the case in Continental armies—all part of one whole and acting together, but without any tie whatever in the field, or at any rate, as a very general rule. The magnitude of Mr. Wyrall's task will be understood when it is borne in mind that he is in this volume dealing with twenty-one separate battalions, and that each of them requires separate and detailed narration. That Mr. Wyrall has achieved the remarkable result of writing a volume in which the Battles of the Somme, 1916, and of Arras absorb the crowd of battalions instead of being overwhelmed by them is a tribute to his skill. The worst of all regimental histories is that they are so objective. An exception is of course Mr. Kipling's great History of the Irish Guards, but then he had but two battalions to deal with, and a separate volume for each.

THE GOLDEN GOAT. By Donn Byrne. 5s. net. (Sampson Low.)

To many readers it must seem that the death of Donn Byrne was a great and irreparable loss to English fiction. His rise to fame was rapid and was won by nothing but sheer merit. He could write a fascinating story in fine, crisp English and his humour lit up a book as if with sunshine. Some of his charm is not apparent in " The Golden Goat "; for the scene is not laid in Ireland, and it was in depicting Irish life with an Edgeworthian humour that Byrne reached his highest achievement. But in this novel there is the old grace of writing, the admirable character drawing. We are given wonderfully brilliant pictures of Monte Carlo, when Angela Turnbull, a very attractive American girl, becomes enmeshed in the lures of the table and is rescued only in time by her humorous and cool-headed American lover. The story is slight, but the characters and scenes are extraordinarily vivid.

surprise at the end. If indeed we have one serious complaint to offer, it is that he sometimes sacrifices too much for the unexpected dénouement, as in the story called "Dementia," where the blank cheque which a husband gives his wife serves no apparent purpose but that of putting the reader on the wrong scent. Such stories again as "The Rosicrucian" and "The Grey Quakers," both of which deal with the supernatural, put too great a strain upon credulity, though they are well worth reading for the authentic atmosphere of horror and mystery which they convey. Mr. Thurston excels in atmosphere, whether it be the natural or the macabre. He excels too in the swift delineation of character—particularly a certain type of feminine character. It is a pity that he sometimes spoils what would be a first-rate "sketch" by twisting it into a "story."

MOLTEN EMBER. By John Lindsey. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)

The picture of post-war England, in "Molten Ember," and its studies in the psychology of modern young men and women, may not be altogether pleasant, but they are unfortunately true. Hugh Burford finds himself in this chaotic world, his religious beliefs shaken, his ideals rather damaged. There was no need for him to work; "he had an assured income arising from investments in the business his father had left." It was expected that he would take some business appointment, but he disliked the notion and, chiefly with a wish "to keep up his games," became a master in one of the smaller public schools. But a turning-point in his career comes when he meets and dances with the charming, unconventional Jenepher. She is an artist, an idealist, impatient of the shackles of civilisation, and keen to devote herself to working for the happiness of others. He is infected with her ideals, throws up the school, and drifts, vaguely trying to find something he can do for the good of humanity. His baffled quest leads him to a troublesome and futile farming experiment; his relations with Jenepher bring disgrace to her, disaster to her slum mission and disillusion to himself; and after a too hysterical chapter in which he rages over his experiences, an epilogue shows Hugh as a stockbroker, no longer seeing visions and dreaming dreams, but recklessly given over to the raffish pleasures of the typical man about town.

Mr. John Lindsey.

There are bitter things in the shrewd, pagan philosophy of the book; but it is well written, its characters cleverly drawn; and one looks with confidence to hear further of its author.

THE WOLF'S BRIDE. By Aino Kallas. Translated by Alex Matson, in collaboration with Bryan Rhys. 5s. net. (Jonathan Cape.)

Very beautifully told in straight, simple, picturesque language, translated from the Finnish, this story of Prüdik and Aalo and the wolves is a little gem of its kind. Prüdik, the young forester of the Esthonian Island of Hiiumaa, seeing one day a gathering of boys and maidens by the brink of the water, for the summer washing of the sheep, notices among the rough women one fair, red-haired girl with gentler ways. Himself hidden, he watches her with eager eyes, and straightway is filled with love for her. They are married, and in due course a baby girl is born to them. And then, when the spring comes again, come the great wolf-hunts, for the island is infested with these wild creatures. And Aalo, who is watching with others the hounding of the packs, hears a mysterious voice calling her. It thrills her. She goes home and tries to live her usual life and resist the call, but it is the wolf-call, and her heart leaps to it. And then one night, in mad eagerness, she goes to the wolves. She returns and is Püdick's excellent wife by day, and Püdick does not suspect. But at last his eyes are opened, his beautiful wife is a werewolf. The end of the story is tragedy. Aino Kallas has the power to write this difficult style of tale. She handles mystery with the sure touch of the artist. It is a little book and it is perfect in its own way.

WOOD SANCTUARY. By M. E. Francis and Margaret Blundell. 7s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

Michael Shirwood, betrayed by the girl he loved, disillusioned after his service in the War, sought only to hide himself from his fellow men and make beautiful his own corner of the earth. George Pritchard, his batman, had likewise suffered and was glad to join him in his exile, and so on a slope of the Welsh hills they cultivated a market garden. There was a little wood behind his land, and in this Michael Shirwood roamed at will, nursing his bitterness against the world. Suddenly his sanctuary was invaded. A young widow bought the land adjoining his and, to his horror, erected a cheap bungalow and came to live there with her maid and little son. Both he and George were terribly affronted; more so when the young widow started a rival market garden. Gradually however she won them round with her sweet helplessness, and by the time her bungalow caught fire and was burnt to the ground, Michael was desperately in love with her and fiercely jealous of the wealthy man whom, for her boy's sake, she had promised to marry. This is a charming, sensitively written story which will delight those who prefer the quiet events of the country-side to more hectic drama.

SUPREMACY. By H. D. Slater. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Seventeenth century London. London just after the fall of the Commonwealth—a London of dark, narrow streets, of intrigue and adventure, of religious and political discord—this is the London Miss Slater draws for us in vivid detail, following the history of Paul Rooksby, whose early worship of Cromwell influences his whole life. As a child he sees the great Protector and vows to uphold the ideals he represents; later he witnesses the execution of dead men at Tyburn—the corpse of his hero hanging in chains. And then into his monotonous existence comes the chance of working for those things he holds dear—working in conjunction with that mysterious, vital force, Lord Shaftsbury. It was his tragedy that love and duty pulled in opposite directions; that his love for a penniless little Catholic, Ann Cary, should imperil him in his secret service to his country. Yet, faithful to his pledge, though he loved Ann and married her, he tried not to let her baulk his ambition. He goes through severe ordeals and many dangers, and Miss Slater writes with a deep knowledge of her period, and a sympathy with her characters which makes them very real to us and absorbingly interesting.

THE CLOCK. By Guy Rawlence. 7s. 6d. (Constable.)

A tale of superstition, temperate and beautiful. Writing with a love and appreciation of the country, Mr. Rawlence fully understands the complex reactions caused by mixing the town and the land, and he gives a sympathetic study of a pretty little shop-girl married to a farmer, and her gradual hatred of the lonely country-side, which she had thought "lovely to visit." The story, while being concerned with blundering human beings, is even more concerned with the clock that has dominated the farm-house and the Stroud family for generations, and whose powers are believed to be supernatural. Quietly, yet deftly, with real drama, the story unfolds, while round its unfolding are touches of descriptive power. There is strength and beauty throughout the book, and a joy in the rich, warm smell of the earth.

SHEEP'S-HEAD AND BABYLON. By Marjorie Bowen. 7s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)

It is a truism to say that in Miss Marjorie Bowen's books one always finds careful, admirable work, that she always knows what she is writing about, knows it so well indeed that she suffers no temptation towards anachronism. But one finds more than this in "Sheep's-Head and Babylon." Careful, admirable work sometimes leaves an opening for dullness, but in this volume of short stories no dullness is to be found. There are nine "Stories of Yesterday" and nine "Stories of To-Day"; and even inside these groups there is a sub-classification, for some are supernatural and some are not. The initial story, "Sheep's-Head and Babylon," is supernatural, or at any rate the overworked brain of the Reverend Zachary Barlas makes it seem so, and the sheep's-head resting so naturally on the kitchen-table of the manse, makes even the normal reader shiver a little, how much more, then, the overwrought minister, who was warring against the Devil? Miss Bowen certainly achieves her right atmospheres. We thrill to the account of "The Prescription" and to "An Appointment with Stiff-key." And how dainty and picturesque we find "The Triumph of Mrs. Westfield." There is fun too to be found in the volume; seek it in "The Careful Youth." A book, this is, for all moods.

STEEL CHIPS. By Idwal Jones. 7s. 6d. (Knopf.)

Oil wells have been a favourite topic with modern novelists and dramatists, but this is probably the first time that steel trusts have been the groundwork of a novel. In "Steel Chips" it is more than the groundwork; the characters themselves, lacking in the gentler sentiments, appear to have taken on the attributes of the steel with which they work, and emerge vital, hard and ruthless. Bram Dartnell, the son of a mechanic-pugilist and an educated woman, is forced unwillingly into the Atlas steel works, where "the noise was a screaming, vibrant song that set every nerve in his body tingling." Through him we feel the fascination of these steel works, where efficiency is all that matters ("Trego had achieved perfectibility"), where the characters are not so much human beings as super-sensitive machines, with the romance of Bram and Bertha the welding of two vital parts, and Max's betrayal the breakdown of a faulty rod.

TURN BACK THE LEAVES. By E. M. Delafield. 7s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

The author wishes it to be understood that this study of a family of strict Roman Catholics is in no way intended for propaganda, either for or against the Roman Catholic faith. Nevertheless her picture of the somewhat dreary family of Floyd, with the fanatical Sir Joseph at its head, does not show Roman Catholicism in a sunny aspect. Miss Delafield, in her customary admirable reticence, never allows her story to become exaggerated, but it suffers from the fact that there is a shifting of the heroines. At first we are told everything about the illegitimate Stella, but later the man she marries is dismissed with a word, and Veronica, then Chloe, then Helen take the stage. This tale is neither as light nor as interesting as other of Miss Delafield's novels, but full of sad things and thwarted people. Sir Joseph is so peculiar as to be practically mad, and Stella never wins our hearts. The other girls are so strictly brought up that they are not entirely normal. It is a gloomy picture, painted with scrupulous fidelity and ability.

GOOD SIR JOHN. By Phœbe Fenwick Gaye. 7s. 6d. (Secker.)

It was a very bold proceeding on Miss Gaye's part to make a novel out of Sir John Falstaff, for if that attempt had not come off the critics would have had little mercy on her. But her experiment has vindicated itself more than creditably if not quite triumphantly. Here and there, towards the middle of the story, the action flags and we chafe a little at the author's perhaps too numerous interpolations of potted history. While certain phases and episodes of the knight's career are admirably pictured, a babyhood and childhood for instance with which Shakespeare never concerned himself, the old reprobate's public humiliation by his idolised Harry, retold in a fashion to make the reader himself go hot and cold all over, there is a flatness about the final scene which imparts a sense of anti-climax. The Nell Quickly of Miss Gaye's fancy is seen as being quite inarticulate in face of this calamity; Falstaff himself, dying in his favourite Dauphin chamber at the "Boar's Head," as he would have wished to die, at somebody else's expense, is mute, his thoughts, we are told, are all of Harry, but he does not "babble of green fields." Yet whatever its faults the book remains a very remarkable tour de force. Apart from Falstaff, Miss Gaye presents some admirable vignettes of portraiture. Throughout Miss Gaye keeps vividly before us a realistic, colourful and, we do not doubt, historically accurate background, her writing is full of delicacy and insight, and her style limpid, easy and natural, a constant delight.

SONG BIRD. By Sophia Cleugh. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Here we have a full and attractive story told with a skilful unexpectedness. In other hands it might easily have been a well-worn theme presented in a well-known way. A beautiful Spanish circus-girl with a fine voice meets a handsome and selfish young Spanish aristocrat, runs away with him, lives with him, till his mother's influence and his own behaviour drive her desperate; she runs away again and in course of time becomes a famous singer, meets her former lover again and so forth, and so forth. But "Song Bird" is to be placed in quite a different category. Here is good characterisation, here are vivid and haunting impressions of beautiful places, and of unbeautiful places. Nina is by no means merely a lovely, wronged girl who attains fame and wrings a selfish lover's heart. Nina is full of spirit and caprice; and constantly, even to the end, the unexpected happens.

DRIFTING LEAVES. By S. H. McGrady. 7s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

This is a distinctive piece of work. The author has perhaps aimed higher than he has achieved, but in spite of this we do get a fatalistic impression of his puppets as leaves blown hither and thither without volition or resistance. Some are swept away by the hand of death; others are left to be trampled upon, while others again drift into some place of security. His fictions, although deft and sympathetic, are observed from the outside rather than from within, and if occasionally with an illuminating phrase he will create a character or a dramatic episode, as when through the churchyard "among the wet, scattered leaves beside the low wall a rat was creeping," at times a hackneyed phrase will kill the interest of his prose. Even the introduction of the War does not bring reality into these lives. It is just a bigger, wilder storm playing further havoc with soulless nature. It brings no nearer to completion the love of the steward.

THE INTRUDER. By Vicente Blasco Ibañez. 7s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)

The manner of this book is if anything more lucid, more ironic and more illuminating than its predecessors. The style is flexible and suave as a branch of history, and the subject both thoughtful and penetrating. For this reason the reader regrets the shrill cry of the propagandist. Too many "à bas!" defeat their own ends. The novel is staged in the Biscay country, that strange, fanatically religious land where St. Ignatius was born, and a hatred of the Jesuits creates unbounded belief and trust in the divinities of the new religion, "Science and Social Justice." The plot works out well and carries its interest to the end in spite of a lack of toleration. It is certainly not the Roman Catholicism of Sheila Kaye-Smith or even of E. M. Delafield. The character studies are among the best that the author has ever achieved; Dr. Aresti and Padre Pauli standing for the two protagonists of modern times.

I AM JONATHAN SCRIVENER. By Claude Houghton. 7s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)

This is a very clever and original "thriller," and there go to its making literary gifts and qualities not generally associated with sensational fiction. James Wrexham, an able but unsuccessful middle-aged man, in answer to an advertisement, is appointed librarian to Jonathan Scrivener, who leaves London before Wrexham's arrival. Wrexham is presently installed in a luxurious house without any inkling as to the reason or purpose of his appointment. Presently his loneliness is invaded by a number of men and women who had been given the right of entry to Scrivener's house. Their histories form the real substance of the novel, and so varied are they that we are given a wide range of characterisation and pictures of Bohemian life. But the absent Scrivener is made the central figure of the book in virtue of the mysterious influence he had exercised on all the other persons of the drama. The interest is very adroitly maintained and suspended.

The Bookman's Table.

CALIBAN IN GRUB STREET. By Ronald A. Knox. 7s. 6d. (Sheed & Ward.)

The recent fashion for symposia in the Press in which popular novelists and others confide to the public their personal views on such questions as the Divinity of Jesus, the possibility of an after-life, or God as a Person may suggest to some a revival of religious interest, to others the decay of religious thought. Others might with some justice dismiss it as a journalistic " stunt." But we would hardly expect the expert theologian to view it tolerantly. Yet Father Knox succeeds in doing so. The temper in which he examines the confessions and conjectures of the " symposiasts " is admirable throughout. He is searchingly and even scathingly critical, but his own position is for himself so secure that he can afford to expose the vagueness and self-contradictions of the religious amateurs with a smiling wit, while he very seldom uses his wit unfairly. He aims at stinging people into considering what it is that they really believe and he shows quite clearly and convincingly not only that the majority of the " symposiasts " have never really thought out their belief, but that they rather pride themselves upon the fact. The suspicion of reason, so prevalent to-day, is understandable so far as it represents a reaction against the unjustifiable claims of science. But it is a tragedy when it extends to metaphysics. And we do not need to be Catholics to applaud Father Knox when he writes: " A religion which shrinks from intellectual inquiry and takes refuge in emotional affirmation can at best only be a weak and lopsided religion. For it does what Christianity has always been accused of doing; it treats the intellect, the reason, as something to be feared and distrusted; as if this, too, were not the gift of God." Those in fact who treat reason as if it had no say at all in the affairs of the soul put the soul at the mercy of the feelings. They have no means of testing whether what they claim to be religious experiences are anything more than subjective delusions. The majority of the " symposiasts " whom Father Knox examines are in this position. They prefer vague sentiments to exact argument; they " only believe in what they want to believe in, and only because they want to believe in it." And Father Knox has done a real service both to the cause of true religion and of exact thought in exposing with such cool and devastating wit the inadequacy of such beliefs.

THE LOVE DIARY OF A BOY. By Shaw Desmond. 8s. 6d. (Humphrey Toulmin.)

Mr. Shaw Desmond claims that this record of adolescence is based upon " authentic documents and the memories of a living boy." Its truth, he thinks, will be apparent to adult readers who are honest with themselves and who have not forgotten. The diary form, with occasional letters here and there, is a dangerous medium to employ and one is always reminded by the distinctive style and odd gleams of irony that Shaw Desmond, novelist, has edited the book. Boyhood's dreams, generosity, priggishness, loves, sexual and religious terrors are woven round the very ordinary experiences of an Irish Protestant youth who passes his life till his nineteenth year between the Irish country-side in the South and London. But these ordinary and sometimes nauseous and painful gropings of youth towards balance and freedom could hardly be better interpreted than this book interprets them. There should be a great bonfire of youthful diaries since Shaw Desmond has fixed within the framework of a human story both what was often thought but ne'er so well expressed and what has ne'er been published before. There is a frank insistence upon the physical side of life blended with passages of sheer beauty and naïve plans for the world's future: " And all the men would go about in kilts if Irish or Scottish, the Irish wearing green kilts. But the English would wear the stockingette of the Middle Ages which showed the leg and which with its colours was so beautiful and all wool Jaeger underclothing. . . . And nobody would speak to anybody about sex and everybody would know everything and everybody would know that the other knew and that also would be perfect. . . . Ultimately the world would be one whole with all men and women brothers and sisters but every nationality would be separate and distinct and ferociously proud of it. . . . So three cheers for Ireland, for the world and for the Universe and for God! Hip-hip-hip hurrah!" In brief, plenty of poetry, plenty of truth, and plenty of Mr. Shaw Desmond.

THE CAUSAL AND THE CASUAL IN HISTORY. By John Buchan. 2s. (Cambridge Press.)

This is the Rede Lecture for 1929. Addressing a Cambridge audience, Mr. Buchan said that he was conscious of treading on delicate ground, since Cambridge scholarship tends to support the view propounded by Professor Bury in 1903 that " History is a science—no more and no less." It is this conception which Mr. Buchan seeks to refute. The Muse of History, he says, is " a lady of many parts," and he here pictures Clio " with the puzzled and curious face of a child, staring at the kaleidoscope of the centuries, and laughing—yes, laughing—at an inconsequence that defies logic and whimsicalities too fantastic for art." He does not minimise the importance of the causal element in events, but he holds that to be blind to the casual is to run the risk of misrepresenting history to suit some thesis —a danger into which too many " scientific " historians fall. Mr. Buchan then takes a number of instances at random—from the time of Charles the First to the Great War—and shows how events have often been influenced, if not revolutionised, by the merest accident or the oddest mischance; and he concludes his breezy and convincing lecture by agreeing with Burke that it is " impossible, in these political inquiries, to find any proportion between the apparent force of any moral causes we may assign and their known operation."

BLACK MAGIC. By Paul Morand. 8s. 6d. net. (Heinemann.)

The exotic manner in which this book is produced is in keeping with the somewhat overheated contents, and even Mr. Aaron Douglas's strange and effective illustrations—superimposed flat blacks, greys and whites—are Eastern rather than negro in their decorative opulence. M. Paul Morand's stories range from the Congo to the U.S.A., from Syracuse to Antilles, but they are always peopled by negroes of some degree of colour. His manner

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE BOOKMAN," APRIL, 1930.

Drawing by FRANK E. SLATER.

PATRICK HAMILTON

is essentially objective, and although his astute observation provides matter for controversialists, his own prejudices—if he has any—are never obtruded. Like a true Frenchman, he does not confound art with morals nor tell a tale in order to prove a point. The spectacle of the human comedy is for him of never failing interest, and in this collection of stories he has chosen to reveal one stratum of it as it strikes a post-War European. If we who read him are disturbed by the revelation of colour prejudice, we may be sure that we are not reflecting a disturbance in his mind. His concern is to picture a number of somewhat bizarre incidents vividly, and his success is not to be denied. Whether his expression of "coloured" pyschology is accurate we do not know; all we can say is that he makes it so convincing that we accept it, at any rate for the duration of the book. If Mr. Hamish Miles's translation is as accurate as it is fluent (and we have no reason to suppose that it isn't), it is a remarkable piece of work. The style is as choisi as if it were an original book of his own. The same translator's version of "La Mare au Diable" ("The Devil's Pool")—8s. 6d.; Scholartis Press—one of George Sand's most delightful stories, is equally fine.

A HISTORY OF FREE-THOUGHT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. By the Right Hon. J. M. Robertson. 2 vols. 25s. (Watts.)

Even those who dissent most profoundly from the views on religion which Mr. J. M. Robertson enunciates in "A History of Free-thought in the Nineteenth Century" will be prepared to admit, as they turn the pages of this, his latest work, that in comprehensiveness of plan, symmetry of execution and sustained mental alertness, it is fully worthy of its author. The scheme and method which Mr. Robertson adopts is very much like that which Sir Leslie Stephen employed in describing the Deist and Socinian controversy in his "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century." But whereas Sir Leslie compromised by allowing considerable weight to the defences put up by the champions of orthodoxy and even rejected the plain testimony given by De Quincey to the privately proclaimed heterodoxy of that doughty Christian apologist, Dr. Watson, Bishop of Llandaff, Mr. Robertson defends Free-thought and attacks Christian Theology with all the vigour of the game and with something of the acrimony of the Bradlaugh-Holyoake school. As a history of the intellectual revolt against the old and exploded orthodoxy, Mr. Robertson's new book then may be regarded as supplementing admirably the work already done by Lecky and Stephen.

IN QUEST OF THE SUN. By Alain Gerbault. 20s. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

In his "narrow-built and deep cutter," Firecrest, Mr. Gerbault spent more than seven hundred days at sea and covered 40,000 sea miles single-handed. The whole trip is full of romantic adventure, but the crux of it lies in the last word—single-handed. There is almost a touch of the magician in his amazing activity. "It is not easy to tack single-handed under three head-sails and with four sheets to attend to. In this narrow channel I was not able to keep on the same tack more than thirty seconds, and during this half-minute I had to take bearings and run forward and look out ahead of my boat." Such agility leaves the non-technical reader wellnigh breathless. There were times when his log was a succession of references to "squalls, thunder, lightning, dead calms, deluges of rain and trimming of sails," but against all these and divers other difficulties lies a generous balance of diverting and unusual experiences, yielding not a little in the way of interesting facts and customs. Starting from New York in November, 1924, for the Bermudas, Panama, the Galapagos Islands, the Marquesas, Tahiti, Fiji, across to Natal, round the Cape, the gallant though battered Firecrest finally reached Havre in September, 1929. Under all conditions the author's resourcefulness was wonderfully equal to the occasion.

Books of the Month.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

HOMEPLACE, by Maristan Chapman (7s. 6d.; Philip Allan), renews the delightful acquaintance made in "The Happy Mountain" a short time ago. Once more we are wrestling with strange colloquialisms, this time we fancy rather more involved (despite the many helpful footnotes, quite a number of words leave us perplexed—froshed, shogging, scunnerest, agley, smooch, etc.). But glimmering through them all is a rare and bashful beauty curiously in keeping with the simplicity of these lives and surroundings. Dena and Waitstill have gone to their homeplace, while Fayre (as tangled up as ever) and Bess pursue their thorny path to peace and happiness. Everyday happenings in Happy Mountain are commonplace enough, but the quaint diction, with its biblical resonance, added to Miss Chapman's delightful delineations, convey a sense of dignity and real charm. She has appropriated a little plot of country and made it uniquely her own, much to our delight.

Daphne and her friend Pamela were drably plodding in a drapery establishment when a veritable upheaval came their way in the shape of Jimmy and Billy. Daphne and Pamela lost their posts, and Billy, whose "old top" was "near enough to a millionaire that you wouldn't know the difference by candlelight," got the brilliant idea of floating DAPHNE LIMITED (by Richard Starr. 7s. 6d.; Herbert Jenkins) for their benefit. Mr. Starr has kept the farce at a steady level of joyous inconsequence and entertaining banter, particularly a most hilarious telephone conversation which occupies pages, and only came to an end with Billy's surprising store of coppers. Sheer comedy and romance are generously balanced and move at a swinging pace.

In THE ROMANTIC LUSTRE, by A. E. N. Andrews (7s. 6d.; Heath Cranton), the political and romantic affairs of the little state of Montesacria are pleasingly woven into a colourful picture. An English girl, Elizabeth d'Estecourt, had been appointed governess-companion to the Princess Elena, and it is principally through her eyes that we glimpse the varied happenings, the political disturbances, the life inside the palace and, most outstanding of all, the young King Christopher's romance with a peasant shepherdess. In the latter cause, despite her own feelings, Elizabeth proved their strongest ally. Real charm and delicacy, and in the end a true sense of fitness, characterise an excellent first novel.

The period of the Norman Conquest, with all its manorial rivalry, servitude and gallantry, is glowingly depicted in WHEN THE SAINTS SLEPT, by E. O. Browne (7s. 6d.; Heath Cranton), a romance of the evil days of Stephen. The beautiful Mary de Gifford, commanding in person and half royal in blood, dominates the book in her struggles to honour her husband's memory and keep his fief for their little son. Jealousy, brutality, deception, romance, intrigue, all wage a persistent battle around her, bringing her at last to breaking point, in a powerfully conceived scene, in the house of her deadliest enemy whose son has cruelly lured her daughter away. Her honour was saved and she wins through to happiness, but at a terrific cost.

SWORD AND SCYTHE, by Elizabeth M. Weale (6s.; Daniel), is a romance of the French Revolution by a young author who is still in her teens. "During a visit to Paris and the neighbouring country," she says, "the buildings and palaces gave me an ideal setting for a story of the downfall of the French throne and the ensuing Revolution."

Men of letters and of business, ministers of religion, members of the peerage, scientists, lawyers, army and navy officers, physicians, educationists, musicians, actors and miscellaneous centenarians all contribute confessions in LIVING AS WE DO, by Leonard Henslowe (2s. 6d.; Joseph), to the habits of life by which they have secured good health. Many smoke, and many do not; many take alcohol, many are abstainers; their diets, hours of work and recreations vary widely. The moral seems to be that if you wish to live long and be happy you may eat and drink and do whatever you find agrees with you, so long as you avoid excesses. The series of records from personal experience with Mr. Henslowe's own chapters are both interesting and of value. Perhaps, in view of his warnings against obesity, Mr. Henslowe is a little too harsh on those who rush about at night, going to theatres instead of sitting at home in comfortable chairs listening to the wireless. Otherwise his advice is common sense of the soundest and broadest kind. "The ideal drink is pure, soft water," but one deduces that you may safely take alcohol, provided you take it as two of the centenarians do, either "not as a beverage," or "only medicinally."

The Writer's World

No. 2 | April, 1930 | For New Writers

What Editors Want

By a Professional Journalist

If you are able to view a subject in a new light, you are, if you can write English, a potential journalist capable of earning a considerable income in your spare time.

The key-note of all newspaper contributions is novelty. There are comparatively few new subjects, but there are many variations on the same themes. Any averagely intelligent person is capable of striking a new note. It is that new note, that variation on familiar themes, that literary editors want—in fact, one type of " magazine " article is nothing more than a novel point of view upon a familiar or topical subject.

But there is another kind of article—that which deals with unfamiliar aspects of, or gives interesting facts about, a particular business, profession or experience. They are usually signed " By a Lawyer," " By a Hostess," " By a Teacher," " By a Gardener," " By a Philatelist," etc. It is quite possible for one person to be hostess, gardener, philatelist, and a dozen other things, so that the writer's scope is not limited.

That is the secret of subject choosing.

Ideas for articles are endless. But the free lance needs something more: he needs to know the technique of article writing. It is not difficult to acquire. Anybody who takes the trouble to do so and can learn how to treat subjects in an entertaining way has a wonderful chance to add to his income—and in a way that is not only really fascinating but which broadens his outlook and interests amazingly.

The Regent Institute offers practical correspondence tuition in article and story writing. If you have aptitude for literary work—if you, for instance, can write an interesting letter—you can be trained to turn out articles for which editors will pay big prices. Send for the interesting booklet " How to Succeed as a Writer " (free and post free) to-day, and learn how the Institute has enabled hundreds of men and women to write for the Press. Many of them started to sell their work while still taking the Course.

. . . Now I Earn £400 a Year

By JOHN CLEMENT

The assertion that writers are born, and that the art of writing saleable articles and stories cannot be taught, is quickly disproved when one becomes a student of the Regent Institute.

My literary career began after an interview, some two years ago, with the Assistant Director of Studies. I knew nothing whatsoever of writing at that time, and, moreover, I had not the advantage of a good education.

After reading a sample of my work, the Assistant Director told me that I had a fair chance of success, provided, of course, that I was willing to work. That day I enrolled as a student, and although I have much more to learn, I am now a professional journalist earning about £400 per annum.

It is but giving the Regent Institute their due to say that I owe my success to their valuable tuition, and the infinite pains to which they were put in instructing one who knew absolutely nothing about journalism. I have no hesitation in recommending those who have an urge to write to place themselves as students with the Regent Institute. The fees charged are ridiculously small when compared to the remuneration that success brings.

That I enjoyed none of the advantages of a public school education, and yet progressed to the extent of contributing to most of the big daily and weekly newspapers within eighteen months, is sufficient to illustrate the great value of the tuition offered by the Regent Institute.

Earning While Learning

Swift Success of Regent Students

Hundreds of Regent students have earned money by the pen during tuition; many of them have recouped the fee several times over while taking the Course. Most of these successful pupils were novices when they enrolled. Typical reports of earning while learning are given below :—

Selling Two or Three Articles a Week.

" For some time the Liverpool Echo and the Evening Express (and occasionally the Weekly Post) have published one article each week. . . . I remodelled a few articles according to the hints in your lessons, and they were at once accepted."

Thirty-Three Times in Print.

" I have now (after Lesson 6) been in print thirty-three times."

Permanent and Remunerative Work.

" I have secured permanent and remunerative work besides selling every one of my exercises."

Over £30 Earned.

" I am doing fairly well. I expect to touch £50 from Journalism by December, as I am now beyond £30 (after eight lessons)."

A Busy Writer.

" I now forward my ninth lesson for criticism. . . . At present I can scarcely find time to continue with your Course, as every spare minute is spent in writing articles. Some weeks I place as many as four."

Write to-day for a copy of the Institute's prospectus, " How to Succeed as a Writer." This interesting booklet will be sent free and post free on application to The Regent Institute (Dept. A/93), Regent House, Palace Gate, London, W.8.

How I Made £600 in Spare Time

By a WOMAN WRITER

I had always been keen about writing, though I had no practical knowledge as to how to dispose of my MSS. I decided to join the Regent Institute, for the simple reason that the slogan " Earn While You Learn " appealed to me! I paid my fee, and before I had got to the end of the third lesson had refunded myself in full. Evidently the slogan was a true one.

I finished the Course, which I found tremendously interesting, stimulating and helpful. Not only were my articles criticised and corrected, but I was given the names (with the happiest results) of those papers likely to take my MSS. In a few months I had made more than enough to encourage me to continue.

It was pointed out in one of the lessons that an author should only write on those subjects of which he or she has some personal and practical experience. This advice has been the key-note to my success. I asked myself what subject I knew most about. The answer came in a flash. I wrote my first book. It ran at once into over 20,000 copies and is still selling. I followed this up with others on the same subject, and in four years have made well over £600. Last year I made £240 from royalties and other sources, and this in the midst of a very busy life.

Truly, my introduction to the Regent Institute was a very lucky one—for me!

The Collector

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—Burton

FINDING FIRST EDITIONS.

It is more than evident that the interest in the collecting of books, especially modern first editions, is growing and expanding. There are many people who say that this interest is purely a fashion of the moment and that, like everything else that comes into the public eye in this way, it will soon pass. Those who say and write such things do not understand. I am quite ready to admit that in all movements, of any kind, there is always a percentage of those who become interested in doing something because so many others are doing it. The crowd psychology cannot be entirely obliterated. It must always be with us, and the trouble is, it frequently influences others who have little capacity to resist it. In the case of book-collecting, there is an additional influence among those who are always captured by the mood or interest of a large body of people. It is the very potent influence of potential money-making. There is no need for any one of us who collects books for the love of the books themselves, to cast a stone at those who are drawn to collecting by the profits that come out of it. Many are susceptible to the double lure, and each finds his own contentment and joy in the pursuit.

Portrait by Howard Coster. Mr. J. B. Priestley.
First editions of whose "Good Companions" are in demand among collectors.

The man who brings to the pursuit both a love of literature and a good commercial instinct has perhaps the hardest field to hoe. He is a reasonable, logical being. Times are hard, and how can it be when, having bought a much desired volume for £1, some tempter offers him £50 for it? There's the butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker to be paid; clothes to be bought for man and wife, and the irresistible taxman to be made content; so what would you? He stifles his regret and lets his treasured volume go. His sorrow is greater than yours or mine. I know one big-souled fellow who always asks five times what he knows is the market price. I have heard him. "What a cheek!" says the matter-of-fact one. But he is wily in his spiritual rapture. He knows that no one will pay the price, so he saves the situation and goes his way with a quiet conscience, when he should have sold his book and paid his bills.

Book-collectors of all kinds are in and around about us. They are thriving, and increasing in numbers. They are, each in a different way, earnest and thorough. They know, as we all know, there is always something to be learned. No one is completely in possession of all knowledge. No one is omnipotent. No one can be omnipotent. I come across proofs of this day after day. There are those who will bluff you—or rather try to do so: for no expert likes—least of all myself!—to be found out. Hence, there is much writing and inquiring about the prices of this and that. The letters are anxious ones: full of pertinent questions, full of intelligence, all showing how thoroughly the correspondents are interesting themselves in the business. Sometimes the answer is simple; sometimes it is complicated and difficult. It all proves my point that there is a truly tremendous and growing interest in book-collecting, in all directions.

But however great this interest may be, it can lead nowhere unless there is some plan by which one may learn how to discover the first editions which are, or will be, of value. Following fashions in collecting is more or less futile. We can all do that, and with ease. There is so much information provided in the press these days, that any intelligent person may, without much difficulty, keep track of those books that are commanding high prices. I suppose most readers of this article have only that system as a guide. Let me say at once, it is fraught with many problems. One learns that the first issue of the first edition of, shall I say Mr. Robert Graves's "Good-bye to All That," containing the poem that was afterwards deleted from the subsequent printing, is fetching £6 or £7, and that there is promise that it may go up to even a higher price. It may, or it may not. It may even depreciate in price. This is happening always in the first edition market. It is one thing to buy at a high price in the hope of an advance, but it is usually quite a different thing when it comes to selling.

To follow the current fashion has its attractions, and I will admit it may possibly work out to our satisfaction, if we are quick enough to buy a book long before it has reached a high price. But it has many dangers, and I, for one, will never recommend it as a general policy. Of course it is conceivable that the demand for a particular volume is so prevalent that the market price goes on advancing. As in the case of J. B. Priestley's "Good Companions." I think this is an instance where a first edition collector may well invest in a copy, if it can be found, even at the present price of £3–£4. The book is important as a piece of literature. In years to come I think it will stand out as one of the notable volumes of the twentieth century. Mr. Priestley was comparatively little known a few years since, but to some of us, whose duty and pleasure it is to watch and weigh the work of current writers, it was clear that Mr. Priestley would one day, and before very long, rank high among his contemporaries. He has climbed to the heights with "Good Companions." Frankly it emphasised his importance earlier than I had anticipated. But he is always such a steady worker, and so exacting a critic of himself, that one never doubted he would, sooner or later, win the wide recognition that has come to him.

If the average collector had recognised this probability in, let us say, Mr. Priestley's "I For One" or "Lilliput Papers," or in some of his other books, he would have laid up for himself treasures of no mean literary value. And in the future they will have considerable commercial value. My point is, we must establish our own literary standards and remain faithful to them. Then in spite of fashions and conventions, we shall go forward and regularly add each new book of the author whom we have judged as an important addition to our collection. We shall of course make mistakes. At least so far as fashion is concerned. But shall we not have established a fashion of our own? And the chances are that as experience and light come to us, we shall find that we have been collecting just those books which fashion has selected for the "boom" of the moment. Harking back, if we had established this plan, some of us by now would have had a richer collection of such authors as Walter de la Mare, John Galsworthy, Henry Williamson, H. M. Tomlinson, W. B. Yeats, J. M. Barrie, C. E. Montague, G. B. Shaw, and so on. When we see the crowd buying these authors and others, we wonder why we did not begin collecting them earlier. There is just one excuse: our collecting may have been so definitely individual, so limited to authors whose writings make a special appeal to us, that we had not had the desire to add to our shelves the books of one or another of these whose first editions have now become precious.

DISTINCTIVE CATALOGUES.

There can be no completed understanding of book-collecting, if the book-collector does not make a habit of receiving and studying the many catalogues now issued by all antiquarian booksellers of any standing. There is more information to be gleaned from such lists than is generally realised. These catalogues are complete in details as to year of publication, condition, special particulars relating to first editions, and many other facts. If earnest book-collectors not only examined these lists closely, but committed to memory at least the important information provided, there would be much less difficulty in the search for the books which the collector is anxious to obtain, and there would be no difficulty in personally recording the market values of a great number of books. Some antiquarian booksellers give a short description under the titles, and sometimes we wonder if the special lists devoted to modern first editions might not regularly have a foreword about the market in general, and the books contained in the catalogue in particular.

We have on the table before us a galaxy of lists, and in writing that they are all of considerable attraction to the book-collector, we are in no way exaggerating. They are very tempting indeed to the genuine book-collector and, if we dared, we should deal with all of them in detail. As we have said before, a good catalogue of books, either old or new, is always fascinating; sometimes more so than some new books.

Just as we reach this point, the postman, good man, brings us Catalogue No. 29 of Elkin Mathews, Ltd. There is also before us, asking for a word, the same firm's list of books on "Byron and Byronia." The latter is a very valuable list, and one that we shall keep for reference. It is a long time since we have seen anything more useful of this kind. The "First Editions" list should be asked for, and studied carefully, on the lines we have mentioned above. Interestingly enough, we are pleased to note, on opening it, that here is a list that includes exactly what we have suggested above: there are two pages of excellent and helpful notes for collectors.

Messrs. Fletcher, Ltd., send us Catalogue 46. Here again is a list of miscellaneous books in all classes, at moderate prices; something like eleven hundred odd titles. Looking through this catalogue, we observed a number of valuable books on costume and the decorative arts from a collection formed by the late Atillio Cormelli. In going through it, as so often happens, we indulged in the pleasant task of marking those books we, perhaps wickedly, coveted.

Different businesses of course have different ways of making their lists. The one that comes to us from Henry Danielson is easy to read. We like the bold type of the titles, and the especial display of the more notable works. The number of this list is 29; it includes both old and modern books, many in fine bindings, principally from the libraries of the late Sir Edmund Gosse, and that great collector, Clement K. Shorter, affectionately known among us as C. K. S. There are also illustrated works and books on the fine arts, besides a large number of modern first editions, including many printed on large paper. Being something of a maker of association books ourselves, we are glad to note several such works in this list.

One of the handsomest of the catalogues on our table just now is Messrs. Myers's new (No. 274) illustrated catalogue of rare books, manuscripts, autograph letters, historical documents, etc. It includes, among much else, rare first editions of Wordsworth and Coleridge, of Marlowe's "Hero and Leander," Jonson's "Volpone," the three volumes of Hardy's "Dynasts," the poems of Gray and Dr. Johnson, an exceptionally good copy of the Third Folio Shakespeare; and a large selection of letters from Shaw, Southey, Dickens, Scott, Crabbe, George Moore, Thomas Moore, Livingstone, Nelson, Henry Fielding, Longfellow, Cruikshank and many another famous person of to-day or yesterday. Many of the letters are printed, and this, with the facsimile title pages and excellent portraits of Scott and Samuel Richardson, make this, even apart from the number and variety of books in its list, a most interesting as well as most attractive catalogue—the sort one cannot see without being tempted to write to the bookseller for a copy. We reproduce on one of our art pages the Scott portrait—a beautiful and rare mezzotint after Raeburn, priced at £35.

A very nicely arranged list is issued by the Frank Hollings Bookshop. A really useful catalogue it is. Naturally such a list contains only a small proportion of the books which Mr. Hollings has for sale. Here again the titles are very easily readable, and we observe that this is one of those lists that, in many cases, includes a note underneath an entry. The distinctive character of the catalogue is that when there are many books by an author included, the name of that author is printed in large type at the beginning of that author's titles. This is a pleasing plan.

From Grafton & Co. we have received three lists: One (No. 76) devoted to recent purchases of books on medicine, chemistry and allied subjects; another (No. 81) is a list of books on Italian art, bibliography, history, topography and literature; a third (No. 79) quite an interesting and valuable catalogue of works on transportation.

Recently two magnificent catalogues arrived from Messrs. Maggs. Catalogue No. 534 is unique and beautifully produced, with a great number of extraordinarily fine illustrations It is Part II of "Bibliotheca Nautica." It is of inestimable value to the specialist, and fascinating for the general book collector. We should dearly love to write at length about the catalogue, because there are many, many most alluring items in it. There is only one way out. The reader must try to get a copy of it from Messrs. Maggs. Speaking generally, we may say the same about the other catalogue, No. 533, deals with books of the fifteenth century, from the presses of one hundred towns. This is Part I—there will be others later—and includes towns of Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, England and France. There is also an important foreword of eight pages printed at the beginning of this notable catalogue.

Other lists which are on our table have been issued by Henry Sotheran, Ltd., and W. M. Murphy & Sons. The Sotheran one is illustrated, and concerns itself with a country library, and includes many fine books of English literature and rare Americana; while Messrs. Murphy's list, of nearly a thousand volumes, covers the various branches of literature purchased recently from private libraries. There are some good items in this, and not at all high-priced.

Two or three, we are interested in noting, have come from U.S.A. Messrs. Goodspeeds, of Boston, send us two—one of autographs and one of first editions.

It is always a useful study to compare English prices and American. On the whole they do not vary a great deal, but if there is a difference the American price is higher than ours. A very delightfully made list is that of the Gotham Book Mart, of New York. It is full of the titles of those books which we are all conventionally collecting. There are many items of Barrie, Chesterton, Coppard, Galsworthy, Hardy, Huxley, Kipling and so forth. A signed edition of Galsworthy's "Caravan" is marked at $250; "Forsyte Saga," ordinary edition, $125; limited signed edition, $500; "From the Four Winds," $675, and "Villa Rubein," $475.

We have again been looking over Foyles' recently issued catalogue. There is an attractive item in the first edition of Jane Austen's "Emma"—we wish people would read her books again—and a number of collections of autographs, containing some very rare items. We note a unique collection of G. B. Shaw's pamphlets for £16, and a great number of first editions, at extremely low prices, as well as many association books.

We have been browsing over Messrs. Pickering & Chatto's catalogues (Nos. 260 and 261) with great enjoyment. There are some first editions of John Evelyn that particularly attract us; some of Henry Fielding, including a first of "Tom Jones," in six volumes, which is getting scarce; some of Fletcher and Ford, and and other of the Elizabethan dramatists; Phineas Fletcher's "Locusts" and Habington's "Castara," which we covet perhaps as much as any. Leigh Hunt is well represented, and we hear that his first editions are appreciating; so too are those of that once popular eighteenth century novelist, dramatist and essayist, Eliza Haywood; and there is a first edition of Matthew Green's witty poem, "The Spleen," at a very moderate price. Some of these minors are curiously attractive—Elijah Fenton for instance, who helped Pope with his translation of the Odyssey; Laurence Eusden, who was poet laureate after Rowe and before Colley Cibber—his official odes and other poems fill a page—these two poets have a niche in our literary history and are interesting in themselves as well as in their associations. We have only jotted down a few of the items that for personal reasons appeal to us, and would recommend you to obtain the catalogues for yourself; they are well illustrated with reproductions of title pages, and give a selection of nearly two thousand books, another of which that tempts us, by the way, is a first edition of Gay's "Trivia."

A pleasant sight that catches your eye as you come out of Charing Cross station into Villiers Street is the Little Bookshop across the road. There is always something interesting in the window, and the catalogue which has just reached us indicates that collectors will find it worth while going inside. Modern authors whose first editions it offers at moderate prices include Tomlinson, T. F. Powys, Walpole, Milne, Kipling, C. E. Montague, Arthur Machen, David Garnett, Galsworthy, D. H. Lawrence, and a number of others, in addition to a large selection of "Press" books.

Mr. Basil Hyman's 1930 catalogue, No. 4, also contains an excellent list of Shaw, Galsworthy, Chesterton, Bennett, Priestley and Tomlinson first editions, and a selection of seventeenth and eighteenth century first and rare editions of which we have not space to give particulars. If you have not got this and the Little Bookshop catalogue—write for them.

Before finishing this month's Catalogue notes, we should like to draw attention to a few lists that have come in just as we are going to press. Catalogue No. 38, from Mr. J. D. Miller; No. 3, from Mr. Gilbert Jamieson; a new one (No. 341) from Messrs. W. Heffer & Son; a list of English colour-plate books of the early nineteenth century, from Messrs. Francis Edwards; and a very useful catalogue in quarto size from Mr. Harold Halewood, of Preston. This latter catalogue is very readable in its "lay-out," as we say, the titles and prices being quickly seen on opening the list. This is an aspect of catalogue making that is always worth while studying. The Halewood list has a general appeal, and includes old and rare, as well as modern books. We notice a first edition of that wonderful book of Butler's—"Erewhon"—for £8 12s. 6d. Other lists we shall deal with at length next month.

THE MARKET.

In another column, the writer of the article about current lists suggests that a foreword might well be printed in all catalogues of modern first editions. It is an interesting suggestion, and we feel sure it would be appreciated by all collectors. We have noted such an introduction in more than one catalogue that comes from America, and we are particularly interested in the two pages entitled "Notes for Collectors" that preface the new list of Messrs. Elkin Mathews, Ltd. This prefatory note deals with advertisements in books, and it is both an informative and intelligent commentary. We have definite views about these advertisements, and agree with the writer that "They form no part of the book, and unless they are dated very much later than the year the book was published, they can be safely ignored by collectors." It seems to us poor judgment to allow the presence or absence of the advertisement pages to affect largely the value of the book, except when they are dated a year later than the advertisements in another copy of the same book, and would so seem to indicate that it is not a first edition. We have several such instances of this sort in mind, and shall return to the matter at a later date.

There are some excellent and critical paragraphs about collecting in the current spring number of the Library Review. Much of what the writer says is true, but there are bound to be a good many who will not agree with him. We do not for instance altogether accept as a fact that "The position is that the buying of first or limited editions is, to quite a considerable extent, going into the hands of people who are speculators." To some extent this may be so, but we honestly and hopefully believe that there are a goodly number of collectors who are collecting for the joy of it, and out of a real love of literature. Of course there are commercial collectors, but we have no right to criticise them. It is an honest calling, and if a shrewd individual can turn a few shillings into a few pounds, there is no harm in that. Profit making is always a stimulating experience. The astute speculator may make a loss, and in that we would sympathise with him, as we are ready to congratulate him on his successes. "The person," says the Library Review note-writer, "with more money than sense is almost sure to be caught, unless he goes into the business with his wits about him, and his eyes open." We leave it at that.

Although the prices of many of the first editions of Mr. Galsworthy's early books are much lower just now, there is no need for those who have copies to be disturbed. Mr. Galsworthy's first editions will always be valuable possessions. We saw a fair copy of "Villa Rubein" marked at £85 the other day, and "A Man of Property" for £100. These prices are many pounds lower than were secured for the same books some months since. A fine copy of "From the Four Winds" was also offered by Mr. Raphael King for £165; "Caravan," £20; and "The Forstye Saga," £20. This latter book is appreciating again.

We were much interested in noting in the list of Mr. King's Catalogue a copy of that fine story of George Moore's "Evelyn Innes." It is a presentation copy from the author "For Bertha Newcomb, from her friend the Author." The inscription is dated July, 1898, and the price £25.

The latest "find": a Toronto lady had a piece of good fortune the other day. She bought a pile of old books for a shilling or two. When the lot was carefully gone over, there was found among the books a first edition of Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter," and she was offered several hundred pounds for it. One does not often come across such a distinctive piece of luck these days.

Readers of THE BOOKMAN, who are also collectors, should not assume that when they see a scarce first edition priced at, shall we say £100, they can secure such an amount for the copy which they may be fortunate enough to possess, and desire to sell. It would be wise always to assume that they will obtain for it not more than half that price. The chances are, they may get more, but it is well to be cautious and avoid disappointment.

Some fine books have been sold at Sotheby's lately. They included the following: Several Boccaccio, notably "De Mulieribus Claris," £740, and "De las Mujeres Illustres en Romance," £800; Lytton's "Eugene Aram," £990; Shakespeare's "Comedies, Histories and Tragedies," £680; and Fielding's "Joseph Andrews," £165.

The series of portraits in colour by "Ape," "Spy," Max Beerbohm and W. R. Sickert, which for so many years appeared weekly as Vanity Fair cartoons, supply a gallery of portraits of the famous men of the fifty years beginning in the seventies, with Carlyle, Browning, Tennyson, Ruskin, Matthew Arnold, Wilkie Collins, Huxley, Darwin, Swinburne, Trollope, and closing in the first decade of this century with Sir Oliver Lodge, Shaw, Maeterlinck, Mark Twain, Ibsen, Rosebery, A. E. W. Mason and Tolstoy; Gilbert, Hardy, Kipling, Meredith, Pinero, Churchill, Oscar Wilde, and many another coming into the years between. We reproduce the Darwin cartoon, on one of our art pages, by permission of the Vanity Fair Cartoon Company, from whom the prints in this unique series may be obtained, most of them at half-a-crown each, some few at five shillings. A good selection of these brilliant cartoons makes a collection that is of great interest and will be of increasing value.

To commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of Wolsey's death, which falls in November, the Richards Press will publish an edition limited to three hundred copies of George Cavendish's Life of the Great Cardinal, as the first in a series of fine editions planned to include all the classic English Lives.

TO A BOOK-COLLECTOR.

DEAR ——,

You tell me you have recently become interested in book-collecting, and you would like to have some general advice from an older hand at the game. Well, let me begin by congratulating you, for book-collecting is a pursuit that will give you not only a good deal of interest and amusement, but, if you go about it wisely, considerable profit as well. Even men who collect solely because they like books and without any intention of selling again, must feel pleased that profit has been gained and can be realised if they wish. And most book-collectors have this satisfaction. The rises in the prices of some books during the past few years have been extraordinary. Five years ago, to take one example, a first edition of Fielding's "Tom Jones" could have been bought for about a hundred pounds; to-day it would cost about five times that amount. Similar rises have taken place in the values of other famous books during the same period. Darwin's "Origin of Species" was then worth five or six pounds; it would now fetch about sixty. Burke's "French Revolution" has advanced from a couple of pounds to twenty or thirty—an uncut copy in the original boards would cost you a hundred pounds. And the prices of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall," Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" and Byron's "Don Juan" have multiplied nearly ten times.

These are a few examples of rises in values, and what has happened in the past will happen in the future. Some books which are now cheap will fetch prices five years hence that will make you wonder why on earth you did not snap them up. Part of your business as a young book-collector is to mark down those books, to find them, and to buy them for your collection. But don't forget that there is another side to the picture, and that in the book market, as in all other markets, there are falls as well as rises. In the early years of the nineteenth century enormous prices were given for the Aldine and Elzevir editions of the classics. These prices gradually declined, and, with a few exceptions, such books are not of much commercial worth to-day. And even within the past few years we have seen remarkable declines as well as remarkable appreciations in the values of books written by some modern authors.

What, you will ask, are the causes of these rises or falls? It is hard to say, but one thing about book-collecting seems to me to be quite certain. And that is that books which are the best of their kind, or that have had a deep influence on the thoughts of men, will always continue to rise in price. You will have noticed that the books I mentioned at the beginning belong to this class, and there are others which a little thought will show you come very near to books of this calibre. Is it not likely that Macaulay's "England," the second most famous history in the English language, will follow the path of Gibbon and become a valuable book? Has not "The Golden Bough" done in anthropology what "The Origin of Species" did in biology? And if Mr. Pickwick is a figure known all over the English-speaking world, is not the same true of Sherlock Holmes?

You will, I think, be wise if you give at least some consideration to speculations of this nature, and one reason why I mention them is because I want to set you right about a matter in which you seem to be entirely mistaken. You say that you envy me the bargains I made years ago when books were cheap, and you regret that no such opportunities are to be had now. This is a great mistake. Cheap books can always be bought if the buyer is able to recognise them when he sees them. Take the Victorian writers. Until the other day most of them could be got for next to nothing, and there is still room for a big appreciation in their prices. You can buy books by Tennyson and Browning for sums which your children will think ridiculously small. Or, to go back a little further, a collection of first editions of Thomas Hood would not cost you much. Yet Hood is sure of a place in all anthologies, and for this reason his books have some enduring value. The best bargains are only to be got by looking out for something that other people do not yet want, but which they will want when its importance is brought to their notice. The great field for this is in writers who have enduring merit but are not of the first rank, and writers of whose work only a small part will live. Do you know in what books "Rule, Britannia," "Home, Sweet Home" and "A wet sheet and a flowing sea" were first printed? None of these pieces is of much literary value, but he would be a foolish collector who despised first editions of the books that contain them.

What I have said, up to the present, has had no bearing on modern first editions. This I believe to be the most difficult and speculative branch of book-collecting, but as you are a man of your own time, it is bound to occupy some share of your activities. Values of modern " firsts " are largely determined by the American market, and as American collectors are very fickle in their tastes, prices rise and drop with bewildering rapidity. The first thing I would say then is never to pay a fancy price for a modern first unless you are sure that it is so genuinely scarce that the supply is not likely to satisfy the demand. Scarcity is always difficult to determine, but if you can find out the number of copies first printed, or any fact like the destruction by fire of most of the first edition of Mr. Wells's " Love and Mr. Lewisham," you have something to go upon. Buy a book at the first opportunity if it is a genuine rarity, but if there is any reasonable doubt, don't.

But the real problem remains. You want to buy modern books at the published prices, as they come out, but your time and your space are limited, and how are you to select ? You cannot obviously read more than a small proportion even of those new books that might appeal to you. Your difficulty is to find some sort of sieve that will separate the wheat from the chaff. Well, there is no sieve, and the only plan I can think of is that you take in three or four of the best literary papers, and read the reviews in them. When you find the critics agree in praising a book, read it, and if you are sufficiently impressed, collect the books of that author. Unanimity among critics is a guide, but not an infallible guide. Don't think them sure to be right because you agree with them, but don't think them wrong because they disagree with you. Remember that George Meredith in one generation, and Joseph Conrad in another, were steadily and consistently praised by the reviewers long before they came into the popularity which they afterwards enjoyed.

Before I end this letter I should like to remind you of the one rule which is universal and absolute in book-collecting. Never forget the importance of condition. Most collectors only learn this by experience. They begin by preferring to buy a fair or moderate copy of a book cheap rather than a fine copy dear. It is a short-sighted policy, and I would strongly urge you to make a small collection of really fine books rather than a large collection of books in indifferent state. The difference between a fine copy and even a good copy of a book is simply immeasurable.

Yours,

X.

THE PLEASURES OF GRANGER-ISING.

It is supposed that a Mr. Granger was the first man to think of extra-illustrating books, and of adding to them articles and other data relating to the subjects dealt with. Whether this be so or not, this particular person of the name of Granger has certainly given his name to a practice which, though more popular in the middle and latter part of the last century than to-day, has much to recommend it, and certainly provides an interesting hobby for the enterprising bookman.

Many people, indeed, must often have regretted when reading biographies, for example, the absence of portraits of some of the people mentioned in the text ; just as other readers must often have longed for the pictures of certain beauty spots or historic buildings in books of travel. And it was doubtless this desire which gave to Mr. Granger the idea of extra-illustrating books which came into his possession.

In pursuit of this hobby he collected portraits and other pictures, which were inserted into specially bound copies of the books that he had set out to " granger-ise," with the result that often a single volume would by this process be extended into four or five, an extension necessitated by the amount of new material incorporated with the original work.

A friend of ours, who has been a Granger-iser for many years, possesses half a score of works, occupying several shelves in his library, which have in the course of years been each of them expanded by several volumes. One MacCarthy's "History of Our Own Times," originally a four volume edition, has with portraits, pictures of places mentioned in the text, autograph letters from people referred to and other matter, been swollen to no less than ten volumes, providing a most fascinating work, of interest, far in excess to that of the original, interesting and readable though that undoubtedly is.

This particular friend has also extra-illustrated ones of the best known travel books of the latter half of the last century with pictures of the places mentioned in it as they were at the time the book was written or the author visited them, and with many pictures of the places as they were a few years ago. Morley's Life of Gladstone has also been treated in this way, and the original two volumes have been extended to no less than six by the insertion of portraits, newspaper cuttings neatly mounted on separate pages, autograph letters, and other material. An illustrated book upon Fashions, issued in the early years of the present century, has been enlarged to four volumes by the insertion of illustrations, mostly in colour, and interesting cuttings relative to the more eccentric of fashions prevailing during the Victorian era.

National Portrait Gallery. Robert Southey.

There is no limit to what can be done in the way of Granger-ising, but it has indeed been said, not without reason, that it is a hobby which can easily be carried to excess. But careful and intelligent Granger-ising has much to recommend it, and in such cases is far from an unprofitable hobby.

For example, not long ago, a Granger-ised volume, dealing with the social life of the late Georgian and Early Victorian eras, expanded to eight volumes was sold for upwards of £300. The original book had been published at a little more than a sovereign. The description of the book was as follows:—"Enlarged by the insertion of 362 portraits, steel engravings and plates; 118 views of noblemen's seats and other places mentioned in the text; nearly 100 autograph letters and signatures, and a large number of interesting newspaper cuttings referring to the people mentioned in the text." It is possible that the whole of these additions may have cost the gentleman who made them from £90 to £100, but he had the pleasure experienced by a collector in the carrying out of his idea, and a profit over expenditure of something approaching two hundred per cent.

Half the pleasure of Granger-ising is the search for material in old print shops and old book shops. A long sought for Bartalozzi print of a once famous beauty, for insertion in a Georgian book of reminiscences, was discovered and purchased for a couple of shillings not long ago in a print shop of a little West Country town, and was found quite by accident when searching through a portfolio of miscellaneous prints and engravings.

A friend, who has made this extra-illustrating of suitable books a hobby, picked up an almost unknown mezzotint of Charles II. in a little print shop in the Rue de Seine, not far from the Institut de France in Paris, for five francs not long ago, and he certainly would not part with it for one hundred times the amount paid. This same collector acquired two letters written by Lord Nelson to Lady Hamilton when in Rome a few years ago. He paid a good deal for them, but not a quarter of their real value, and they are now included in his very much extended copy of Southey's Life of Nelson. Possibly the collection of autograph letters is one of the most expensive departments of Granger-ising, but often quite large sums have to be given for portraits and old coloured prints.

Quite recently we were shown a wonderful book dealing with the "Ancestral Homes of England" which had been enormously extended by the inclusion of beautiful coloured and copper plates gathered from various sources. The book was valued at several hundred pounds, but the present owner, who is not in need of the money, declined an offer by an American for it.

To those who wish to take up this hobby a few hints may not be out of place. The most suitable books to be Granger-ised are "full dress" biographies in the larger sizes; books dealing with the people of past ages, for example, "The Memoirs of the Comte de Grammont"; books of travel; and histories in which the social life of various periods is thoroughly dealt with and famous people are mentioned. It is well to commence by obtaining portraits, and views of the principal places, mentioned; supplementing these by degrees with places of lesser note. But one thing it is well to remember never to lose an opportunity of acquiring a special portrait or view, even if not quite perfect, as another opportunity may not occur. Even if it does, and a more perfect copy turns up, the other can always be disposed of.

A perfectly Granger-ised book is one which has been thoroughly "combed" through with reference to the people and places mentioned in it, and has been most carefully supplemented by portraits and pictures of these. It is a work of time, of course, and of some expense, but it is a fascinating hobby and, carefully done, can generally be expected to pay for itself, if one excludes any consideration of the time occupied in pursuing it.

The Granger-iser of the lesser kind is however a terror to the librarians of our public and circulating libraries, as he has sometimes the unfortunate habit of detaching plates from the books he borrows, to add to any book he may be "extending." And careful as most librarians are to examine valuable illustrated books when returned by borrowers, it is not always possible, in these days of enormous business and numberless books taken out by borrowers, to detect when a plate here and there has been abstracted.

Clive Holland.

A QUEER BOOK (BAILEY'S DICTIONARY).

Edmund Gosse relates in "Father and Son" how he caught his first glimpse of romance on the page of a cheap novel, which was stuck to the lid of a leather trunk. He read there of the sorrows of a lady of title, who had to flee the country and was pursued by enemies bent upon her ruin. A fearful interview with a "masked minion" scared young Gosse. "Minion" was too much for him, and he searched for an explanation. There was a dictionary handy—Bailey's Dictionary. And there he found to his evident chagrin, that minion meant "favourite or darling, also a great gun." He was nonplussed; but I don't believe Gosse put the dictionary back again. I believe he spent the rest of that morning absorbing it.

He came back to it again, and again. Over it, he says, he would pore for hours, playing with the words, and delighting in the savour of the rich, old-fashioned country phrases. But Nathaniel Bailey is lost to our generation. I suppose the advent of the cross-word did for him, if—which is doubtful—he was not already done for. For where efficiency is at a premium, Bailey is no favourite. Also the "great lexicographer" cut him out. But it is notable that Dr. Johnson worked from Bailey, and built his work around this earlier compilation. He had an interleaved copy and filled in the gaps. By using Bailey as a basis, Johnson paid the richest compliment that could come from an executioner to his prospective victim. But still, metaphorically, Bailey scrambled up after the blow and ran off with Johnson in pursuit. This is one of the exciting races of the eighteenth century—Bailey's old dictionary, born in 1721, running neck and neck with the learned folio of the other. There were nearly fifty years to go to the end of the century. It is almost incredible, but Bailey won. By 1800 he had gone through twenty-four editions, with Johnson halting along on eight.

But now, as we said, Bailey is forgotten. He was the veritable king of dictionaries in his day. His predecessors besides being few were also shoddy. Cockeram and Kersey and Blunt they were. Bailey set out to please everybody, which was hazardous. But I believe he succeeded. He wrote "as well for the entertainment of the curious as the information of ignorant, and for the benefit of young students, artificers, tradesmen and foreigners." He drafted in "several 1000 new words." Many of them, it is true, are creatures of fearful length and cacophony, hiding as often as revealing matters of mysterious import. They would still make a happy hunting field for sesquipedalian concatenations of enigmatical and superbiloquent reproach. But then, Bailey, like Thomas Browne, fondled and gloated over the happy captures which he drew out of the great murmuring sea of sounds. Listen to his explanation of "nostock": "it is the stinking tawny jelly of a fallen planet, or the nocturnal solution of some plethorical and wanton star." Here indeed is the voice of Sir Thomas Browne.

We have not done well to forget such discoveries as "pigritude," "quappe," "ugsumness" or "rogitate." He went far afield for his prize efforts. He trimmed them and laid them arow. Then he set about discovering their ancestry. This is very much to the credit of Bailey—that he produced the first etymological dictionary. Johnson did not. Johnson gave "early readings," but Bailey first tackled roots and derivations. Because to-day we work from Johnson, we do not realise that Johnson himself was a debtor. It is a pity that, as Professor Skeat says, Bailey's Anglo-Saxon is in a fearful state, and that he is only right by luck. He evidently knew little about the work of the Queen's Scholars. But at least he was well intentioned.

What eventually, it will be asked, are the "rich, old-fashioned phrases" that Gosse mentions? But one has only to seek out such quaint terms as "white-hart silver," "mercury women," "hell-kettles," "maid-marrion" or "weat the head," to realise why the young boy delved so excitedly. They are strewn thickly through the book. Who knows what a "lawless court" is? In Essex every Wednesday after Michaelmas Day, they meet on King's Hill at cock-crowing, where they whisper and have no candle, nor any pen and ink, but a coal. Another legal curiosity is the "Free-bench," when "if a customary tenant dies, the widow shall have her free-bench in all his copyholds. But if she commit incontinency she forfeits her estate; yet if she will come into the court, riding backwards on a black ram, with his tail in her hand, and say the words following, the steward is bound by custom to readmit her to Free Bench.

> "Here I am
> Riding upon a black Ram,
> Like a Whore as I am;
> And for my Crincum Crancum
> Have lost my Bincum Bancum;
> And for my Tail's Game,
> Have done this worldly shame."

The dictionary is rich with this local lore. Bailey was also something of a Nestor; saws and proverbs are regularly expounded. We may learn here why "hungry dogs eat dirty pudding" or how to be "as good as George o' Green." "What is got over the devil's back," he explains, "will be spent under his belly."

But beside expounding proverbs, Bailey also betrays a weakness for slang. There are some men who never forget a word once they have heard it. Bailey must have been one of these. He was a born dictionary-maker. He absorbed the vocabulary of the "rattling cove" and the "mumping cadger." And there certainly is something pungent and enticing about "crashing cheats," "moon curser," and "rum-boozing welts." "Stow your whids" is even more expressive than the "nark it" of the modern cockney. It is a delightful fancy to picture Bailey holding high converse over a glass of rum-gutlers with all the culleys and cheats and coves, mumpers and padders and nappers who came his way, and scoring up their choicest phrases for his own delectation. Perhaps he made assiduous journeys to "Ruffins Hall" for that very purpose.

But Bailey is always careful to distinguish cant from dialect—vulgarisms from a regional tongue. It is one of the valuable features of his book that he caught and preserved many of the old local idioms of speech—"to cut the neck" or "cry the mare" for instance; both of them old reaping terms. The "Lying wonder" of the Kentish longtails is thus put on record: "The Kentish men are said to have had tails for some generations, by way of punishment; for the Kentish pagans abusing Austin the monk and his associates, by beating them, and opprobriously tying fishtails to their backsides." Bailey also relates another interesting old saying concerning Sir William Tracey, the most active of the four knights who killed Sir Thomas à Becket. A miraculous penance was imposed on his descendants, so that whether they go by land or water, "the Traceys have always the wind in their faces." But if this were so, Bailey adds, it was a favour in a hot summer to the females of that family, and would spare them the use of a fan.

But beyond folk-lore, what a wealth of sea terms Bailey collects. Had we not known him for a schoolmaster (yet no pedant) we might have supposed that he came from the sea. From the technicality of "loxodromicks" to the lore of the high-seas he was master. He had heard too of that bream fish—"a sea monster like a pike, a dreadful enemy to man"; and of the equally murderous sea-unicorn with "six large fins like the end of a galley oar and a deadly horn issuing out of its forehead nine foot long." We rather suspect that this beast came out of some map-maker's imagination to break the monotony of the curling waves. For Bailey's natural history is amusingly naïve in its credulity. Here are his specific details of the land unicorn—"a beast as big as a horse, having one white horn in the middle of the forehead, about five handfulls long, found in the province of Agoas in the kingdom of Damotes in Ethiopia, said to be a timorous beast, residing in the woods, but sometimes venturing into the plain." Bailey also believed that the tarantula's bite was cured by sweet music, that the salamander survived the fire and that a vital flame resided in the hearts of animals.

While searching for his new words, Bailey also made notes of local matters of unusual interest. His dictionary is therefore something of an encyclopædia. You will find in it, inter alia, notes on the Lollard's Tower, Long Meg of Cumberland, St. Wilfred's Needle, and Audley End. There are concise biographies of Zeuxis, Fair Rosamond and Rowena. Everything is 'pintledy-pantledy," one of those rich mixtures, those salmagundis and olios, whose piquant blend was happily discovered in that quixotic "age of Reason."

Philip Parker.

CRABBED AGE AND YOUTH—A BOOKMAN'S CAUSERIE.

The new book has a manifold appeal. Its pages are crisp and clean, its plates guiltless of even the tiniest suspicion of "foxing," whilst its binding displays miracles of gilded blazonry. These are only a few of its more obvious attractions, yet, to the bookman at any rate, it has one grave defect. It has no past. Ironically enough, though between its pages may be some learned contribution to history, the book itself has none. Unknown to its virgin pages are the pencilled marginalia of the scholar or the dirty finger-prints of the demagogue. It has still to taste the peace of some collegiate library or the indignity of the "twopenny" box. Its newness is at once its virtue and its damnation.

Why do most of us fight shy of the aggressively new in the book world? The feeling is partly physical, I suppose. How well do we remember the evening we took down the de luxe edition of a book on the fine arts. It was a magnificent book and we ought really to have enjoyed it. Somehow, however the art-paper reflected the light in a most annoying manner, the leaves refused to turn and, in spite of its magnificence, the book was undeniably clumsy. Anyway it was returned to the shelves.

In exchange we took down the tiny, hundred-year-old volume of Clare's poems. What relief—even in the physical sense only—we experienced. The paper was browned with age but was pleasant to handle. The leaves obeyed our fingered demands; in fact (strange contradiction!) the book would remain open at certain pages—bearing witness to the favourite verse of some reader long since departed. The old blunt-faced type was comforting to read too. And then, after slowly enjoying the beauty of some such poem as "Summer Evening"—true country-breathing verse, in spite of rather overworked alliteration—to return to the bookman's delight of a leisurely, caressing inspection. To muse upon the fact that the book was really poor Clare's "first edition." To reflect on the short tale of the poet's works (how well we knew the titles and dates of each!),and to wish the Northamptonshire peasant, than whom poet never spent a more unhappy life, could have peeped over our shoulder and have seen the book-plates pasted in the book. What pleasure would Clare have reaped from reading the names of "Frederick Locker" and "Austin Dobson"! Strange again that although both of these men were poets, there the resemblance ceased. Locker and Dobson were as comfortably circumstanced as Clare was miserably; as Clare's voice was tuned to country life so did the others sing the joys of town.

When we returned "Poems Descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery" to its shelves (so much more carefully than we had handled Mr. De Luxe!), our fingers picked upon the magnum opus of one of Clare's friends. The once popular "Farmer's Boy" of Bloomfield. In age it was some twenty years older than the other (as bookmen we should describe it as "Third ed. large paper"), and we remember we bought it chiefly for the assurance of the dealer, who had inscribed it "Bewick cuts" (this in spite of the fact that the frontispiece was plainly signed "Thurston" and "Nesbit," and the rest of the engravings were as much unlike Bewick as could well be imagined). And how later, when collating our purchase, we chuckled to find the unusual book-plate, which consisted of a small portion of Psalm xxxvi, cut from some Bible, and carefully pasted below the signature. The extract ran: "The wicked borroweth and payeth not again"! Truly a most delectable de libris!

And so we spent the evening. Somehow the chain of circumstance that had led us from Clare to Bloomfield, urged us from Bloomfield to Crabbe, and from Crabbe to Cowper. We did not pretend to read each poem or to turn each page. It was just a quiet, ambling journey, but though we extracted much enjoyment from the text, it would be idle to deny that a lot of our pleasure came through just handling these old books. We liked to conjure up pictures of their one-time owners, who had so carefully written their names on fly-leaf or cover (with the inevitable addition of "His," or now and then "Her Booke"). To wish how keenly, that it might be possible to trace the successive owners from 1800 to the time the book took its place upon our shelves!

We do not disparage the new book (which in any case can well look after itself), for it will in due season attain mellowness. Its leaves too will brown; its plates will suffer mutilation, and mayhap its back (though never we hope its heart) will be broken, but we must humbly subscribe to a preference for those age-worn volumes in shabby calf or, better still, clothed in what the catalogues so delightfully term "old sheep"!

THE BOOKMAN ILLUSTRATED SPRING SUPPLEMENT.

RUGBY.

By Joseph Pike. 3s. 6d. (Black.)

RUGBY SCHOOL.

By G. H. Bettinson, O.R. 2 guineas and 1 guinea. (Birmingham : Rugby School,)

By a coincidence which should prove a happy one, two books appear simultaneously about Rugby, each being, or should be, as the titles show, the complement of the other. For the exquisite delicacy of Mr. Pike's twenty-four drawings we have nothing but admiration and appreciation. In their delightful finish and artistry they have caught and happily reflect the glamour that has attached itself to these scenes through succeeding generations. Twelve are of the school itself and the remainder portray typical bits of old Rugby and the villages of Dunchurch and Brownsover, the latter with its curious old cottage, to which clings the very doubtful tradition of being the birthplace of Lawrence Sheriff. Mr. H. C. Bradby, a master at the school for many years, has contributed a running commentary on the pictures, which has been sketched to include a wide and interesting survey of the town's history and associations. Mr. Bettinson does not claim for his book that it contains anything new, but what he has been at pains to present is a collation of all the relevant information extant by a system of chronological order, with full acknowledgements and an excellent index. For his successful manipulation of his material he is to be congratulated. In this compact, concise form it will be of real value to all Rugbeians, past and present, while outsiders may readily pounce on much that they will find immensely interesting. Needless to say, the War Register makes a sadly significant and impressive contribution.

RETURN TO SCOTLAND:

An Egoist's Journey.

By Moray McLaren. 8s. 6d. (Duckworth.)

Here we have a genial account of the author's experiences in revisiting Scotland. Very well did Mr. McLaren know that much nonsense has been written about Scotland and the Scots, " and though," says he, ' I realised how difficult it is to understand them, I surprisingly found myself being angry as I thought of the stupid, uncomprehending abuse which the Scots themselves have in some ways done so much to deserve, and of the far more painful sentimental slobbering over them which they have done nothing to deserve." What then did Mr. McLaren find on his journey in the height of summer, on foot? He was now twenty-five and past that adolescence which he considers more painful for a Scot to endure than for any other youth. He travelled without much money, and his first landlady at " Beds for Gentlemen, half a crown a night," near Leith Walk, was bewildering enough, for she gave him a glass of milk without charging for it! His new observation of Edinburgh gave him the impression that it is sharply divided. Restrained and exact are the lives of the professional classes, exaggerated and wild are those of the very poor in their high crows' nests. In a pub he immediately discerned the difference between the talk of the Scots and a conversation held in like circumstances in an English bar. Brain and coherency are with the Scot. Some of the very cream of Scottish conversation and argument has taken place in the tavern. All of us who know Edinburgh are aware of the variety and interest of its population. These grey, solid houses, so reserved and private that you have locked gates to most of them, are typical of the dumb, observant, able citizens who inhabit them with such depressing denial of any colour, as a rule, at the windows. Cool, critical, unimpressed, full of a certain gloom which represents a lack of courage in pleasure (Mr. McLaren saw that), the fear of being laughed at is the curse of the Scottish middle class. This book is a clever and illuminating study. Mr. McLaren wandered far, and the fact that he travelled very light makes his narrative all the more fascinating. He had struggles, he knew dismay, he tasted adventure. He saw the Inner

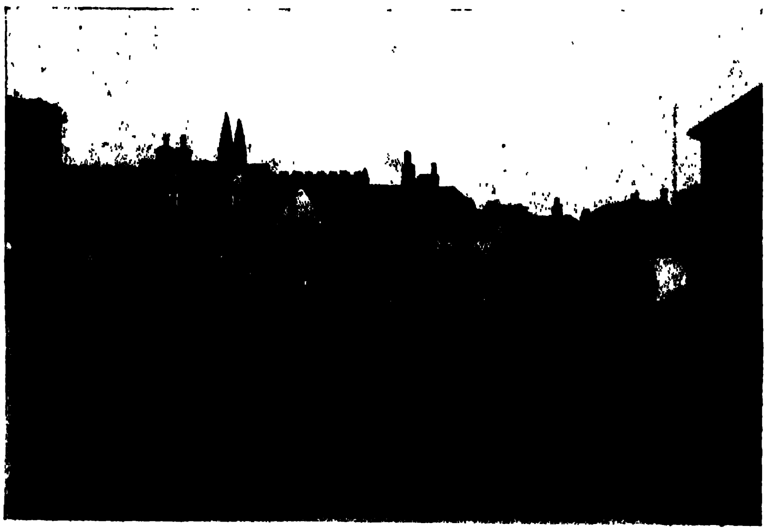
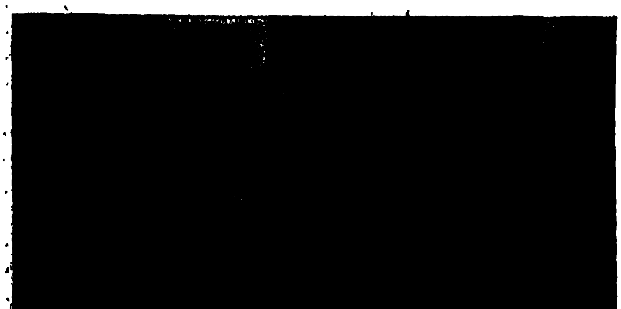
A HISTORY OF CLARE, SUFFOLK.



By Gladys A. Thornton, B.A., Ph.D., F.R.Hist.S. 10s. 6d. (Heffer.)

This admirable and comprehensive work of historical research was first published in 1928, and the fact that a cheaper edition has now been issued, is proof in itself that it met with the success it deserved. Originally written as a thesis for the Ph.D. degree of London University and since slightly altered and extended, no pains have been spared in its compilation. Particular interest attaches to the mediæval period when Clare was a seignorial town, and to the history of the woollen industry which dated back to the fourteenth century and probably earlier. For these and the numerous other aspects, administrative, religious, architectural, etc., Miss Thornton has had unusual opportunities for access to original documents and records in the possession of private people, and has turned them to excellent advantage. Special mention must be made of the delightful old print of Clare Priory in the eighteenth century, and numerous other interesting illustrations.

THE ANNIE MARBLE IN GERMANY.



By C. S. Forester. 8s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)

Annie Marble is an old friend who has provided many with delightful imaginary holidays. In these days of amazingly increasing road traffic it is particularly alluring to examine the possibilities from the motor-boater's point of view. Mr. Forester is an authority on that viewpoint concerning England, France and Germany, and in blithesome vein compares many of their outstanding points, undoubtedly to the advantage of the last. The Elbe " has no locks at all for the whole 400 miles of its length from Bohemia to Hamburg, and only at one point (Magdeburg) is navigation in the least dangerous." In joyous, care-free mood the course is followed up the rivers Elbe and Havel, the various canals to Potsdam and back by the Mecklenburg lakes. The culinary and other interests aboard Annie and the shopping dilemmas freely mingle with the hance acquaintances, the vivid descriptions of unspoilt villages with their mellowed cottages and various varieties of weather. Once again Mr. Forester has fired us with a keen desire to hit the trail ourselves.

URGENT PRIVATE AFFAIRS.

By H. Fletcher Moulton. 7s. 6d. (Arrowsmith.)

1916! What a lot of memories the year brings to most of us, no matter whether we were at the front, or on the home line. But, anyhow, the year will always be a time for vivid memories of Captain McCarthy. He had to hurry, eventually, to Doctors' Commons, although it was only his enthusiasm that made him do a bit of hustling. It is some years since we read Mr. Moulton's first novel, but there were sure signs in it that he would do a very good piece of work—as the saying goes—one of these days. And here it is. This " Urgent Private Affairs " business is as exciting a story as anyone may wish. It will not fail to entertain. This good McCarthy finds some troublesome business at home in the dark days of 1916, and we can assure you that these troubles become positively moving, confusing and complicated before long. And, of course, attractive as we find the hero, he is not in it when we come upon Marjorie Fleming, the lady of the piece. There is a generous heap of incidents, but all comes out satisfactorily in the end. Although there is a lot of pother to happen before you get to the Doctors' Commons business, " Urgent Private Affairs " is decidedly worth putting down on your library list.

A MYSTERY SHIP ON THE IRRAWADDY.

THE ROARING FORTIES, AND AFTER.

By Captain D. J. Munro, R.N., C.M.G. With a Foreword by Admiral of the Fleet Earl Jellicoe of Scapa, G.C.B., O.M., G.C.V.O. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)

The age of the clippers has passed, only one square-rigged vessel flying the "Red Duster" remains afloat, and the men now living who actually served on those ships are becoming few and far between. As one of this dwindling band Captain Munro has contrived to produce, before it is too late, some sort of record for us as to what life was like for mariners who set their course, under the old house-flags of the Albion, Loch, and White Star Lines, "for the Southern point of New Zealand, on the Great Circle Track, commonly called the Roaring Forties." Obviously those were the days. As Earl Jellicoe points out in an introduction that is as ship-shape and straightforward as the modest narrative that follows it, we have heard a lot lately about the romance of the clippers, but precious little about the reality of life aboard them. Captain Munro now attends to all that, and adds further yarns of Burmese and other territorial adventure.

THOU SHALT DO NO MURDER.

STRANGE COMPANY.

By S. Theodore Felstead. 12s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

Two themes can never fail the compiler of crime records—the themes of the first two of these three books: murder, and London River: an inexhaustible mine. But the compiler, even though denied the "nine-and-ninety ways" of the novelist, has still some range of choice in the handling of his material: as these two volumes show. In "Great Thames Mysteries" Mr. Elliott O'Donnell is frankly sensational. He relies largely on reported dialogue to achieve his dramatic effects, a plan which, though making for variety, has one serious drawback. The essence of these mysteries is that they were mostly mysterious—that is, they were revealed in their results, whereas the details of their working-out could only be guessed at; so that the talk of their protagonists, as invented by the author, is at once too fictional for good record writing and too sordidly fact-bound for good fiction. All the same, "Great Thames Mysteries" cannot fail of its appeal to anyone who has ever felt the romance of the river, a romance which the author has judiciously heightened by including one or two authenticated tales of the supernatural.

In "Thou Shalt Do No Murder" the author's treatment is in marked contrast to that of Mr. O'Donnell. His theme of course is sensational; but his consistent tendency is towards psychology rather than sensation. His touch is light, his horrors often mitigated by a sense of humour. Query the sense of humour, if you will, in such company (some readers may decide that Mr. Lambton's does not always escape the pitfalls of bad taste); the fact remains that his chief concern is with human nature, which has a way of being not the less odd and complex and intermittently humorous, even when its connections are grim. And certainly, in concentrating on the criminal's psychology, he has achieved a book which is much more than a mere record of crime. It contains some extraordinary things—the failure of two separate doctors to attend on Matilda Clover; the folly of Mrs. Maybrick, in giving so damning a letter to her servant to post; the odd lapse of Dr. Lamson, the "quinine poisoner," who returned from abroad to volunteer his help at the Yard—his pockets full of quinine powders, and a warrant already outstanding for his arrest! Strangest of all, the long immunity of George Joseph Smith, who enriched himself from three successive brides by drowning them in a bath.

These two books cover a long period ("Thames Mysteries" goes back as far as the early 1700's); and one arrives at the conclusion that undetected murder, even twenty years ago, was a much easier proposition than it is to-day. Crime keeps its end up, we are told, by an increase in motor raids and in scientific burglary; it would be interesting if some compiler of crime annals would collect statistics that we might see how the account stands.

"Strange Company," the third book on our list, lives up to its title handsomely. There is a murderer or two; but for the most part Mr. Theodore Felstead finds material far more interesting in the procession of most plausible rogues who troop through his book on journeys that stop short of the gallows. He introduces us to forgers, blackmailers, secret service men (in several good war-time stories), fences, dope traffickers and confidence tricksters. He is not given to morbidity; he has an eye for character and a witty turn of narrative. There is good reading in the "Theft of the Nelson Relics," and in the tale of the bluff gentleman who posed as a Yard detective: much food for thoubgt in the case of the luckless Adolph Beck: and the full flavour of romance in a story of Australian pearl-fishing. In short, this is a thoroughly companionable book, which stands out both in its writing and in its variety as the best of the three.

MEDITERRANEAN PORTS.

By ALICE HUNT BARTLETT. 6s. (Cecil Palmer.)

In this book of verse, with one prose interlude—an interview with Mussolini—Mrs. Alice Hunt Bartlett gives us a pleasant record of her journey from New York to the Mediterranean, describing the various ports she visited and the impressions she received. Most of the verses are short, some are longer, but all are interesting, particularly to those who have covered the same route. In Algiers a little Arab rug-weaver moves the writer to pity:

" Before her rug she sits the whole day long,
Unlearned, for learning makes one free !
And that, alas, this child will never be !
Over, over, singing her bit of song,
Her deep, dark eyes pleading for liberty . . ."

She sees London under a July moon:

" . . . stilled and girdled with the green
Of her sweet gardens' wealth . . ."

The second half of the book is made up of miscellaneous lyrics, many of them fresh in idea and pleasingly musical.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SUBMARINE.

By G. GIBBARD JACKSON. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

Mr. Gibbard Jackson, in this well printed, handsomely illustrated and judiciously written book not only reveals the romance of the submarine, but answers every question the most curious could ask. In nineteen very full chapters he gives an historical account of the early history of the submarine from quaint ideas in the time of Alexander the Great until the present day, a technical but lucid description of submarine models in the various European navies, and many sidelights on the tragedies, heroisms and scientific triumphs which the history of the underwater craft affords. Particularly striking are the accounts of the Great War, the submarine in America and the salvage of submarines. Emphasising that the submarine, though useful as a blockade runner is a terrible weapon of war, the author opines that with the limitation of navies its use will be more and more restricted.

THEATRE STREET.

By Tamara Karsavina. With a Preface by Sir J. M. Barrie. 25s. (Heinemann.)

The delightfully characteristic preface by Sir J. M. Barrie is an added attraction to a volume already overflowing with vastly entertaining glimpses behind the scenes. " It is," he says, " mainly a story gay and buoyant only because of its gallantry, of work as hard as that of the breaker of stones or the double firsts, set in a scene very strange and picturesque to us." There is the volume in a nutshell. From a mere mention of some of the friends met with—Stravinsky, Debussy, Strauss, de Falla, Picasso, Cocteau, Isadora Duncan, Lovat Fraser, etc.—and the fact that she was painted by Sargent, Glyn Philpot and Laura Knight, some idea may be gleaned of the wide sweep of interest that has been gathered together and infused with the graceful charm that belongs, both on and off the stage, to the brightest star of the Russian Ballet. Over fifty reproductions of works of art by Sargent, Laura Knight, Dulac, Scrov and Bakst, as well as many rare photographs of leading dancers, help to swell the feast of good things the book offers.

DEADMAN'S BAY.

By L. A. Knight. 7s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)

A good bustling detective story centring on the activities of cocaine smugglers in the extreme west of Pembrokeshire. Bits of Welsh lore are well introduced, and some acute knowledge of woodcraft, by a tramp named Jerry Scant, who would have been a real acquisition to the Scouts or Kibbo-kift. The characterisation is good and the style easy—though it is a pity that the author indulges in such phrases as " rather unique " —" came the dawn," etc. But don't let a little slip like that prevent you from making a start on the book—having started, you will have no difficulty in reading through to the end.

THE SPLENDID CRIME.

By George Goodchild. 3s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Who was the Reckoner ? That is the question which tantalises us through nearly the whole of Mr. Goodchild's thrilling mystery story, and only in his own good time does he allow us to put a finger on the real man behind the painted rubber mask. In the criminal world of London, the Reckoner is a person to be reckoned with. Calm, audacious, brilliantly clever, he baffles the police, despite his habit of giving his victim a timely warning. Ann Blackham, though herself an innocent girl, finds her path cast among criminals. It is the Reckoner who helps her to escape, who enables her to secure work with the artist, Reynolds. It is the Reckoner indeed who through the medium of crime is all the while working for noble ends—a modern Robin Hood. Hunted by the police, his own confederates turning against him, he is forced at last to put up a desperate fight. Mr. Goodchild has made an excellent story round this mysterious figure, and blends romance and excitement with his usual ingenuity.

VAGABONDS AND PUPPETS.

By Walter Wilkinson. 7s. 6d. (Geoffrey Bles.)

Through sun and rain, through cold and heat, went Mr. Wilkinson with his barrow. The puppet box, full of the admirable company of players, is fixed on a little carriage with the theatre, the showman's tent, his knife and fork and bread and cheese, and he wanders. When an audience can laugh and be young again, before a simple puppet show, it makes the owner feel that there is still some hope for the silk stocking age ! There is nothing of course of such poignant interest as the true story of a pilgrimage undertaken without money. The rebuffs and disappointments, the welcomes and successes, the ever recurring problem of the stand in the market square, with boisterous policeman behaving boisterously—all this is described with a simplicity and an engaging humour. One of the most charming chapters is about a gipsy audience. The gipsies enjoyed the show and spoke in a curious soft manner, sitting on a clean bit of grass bright with daisies. Mr. Wilkinson's reception is usually good at children's schools. He is not out to make much money, but to have pleasant pastime with his little theatre of dolls, and we wish this true artist well with all our hearts.

AS I KNEW THEM.

Sketches of People I Have Met on the Way.

By Ella Hepworth Dixon. Illustrated. 21s. (Hutchinson.)

Miss Ella Hepworth Dixon, daughter of a one-time editor of the Athenæum, and herself for many years an indefatigable worker in Fleet Street, has met all the stars who have glittered in the social and professional firmaments during the last forty years, and now assembles a record of these contacts under their various categories, theatrical, social, writers male and female, "the people I have met in trains," "people in the War" and so forth. Her portraits are not very profound, nor in most cases particularly vivid, but it cannot be said on that account that her book lacks interest. Its appeal is popular, and it is sure to prove so. Miss Dixon has known, and apparently got on extremely well with, practically every person or personality recognised as "in the news" since the eighties of last century, and in its unpretentious way this account of a singularly full, active and happy life is a real contribution to the social history of three reigns.

THE LITTLE WOOD.

By Temple Lane. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

"Inasmuch as it features neither politics, peasants, gunmen nor hunting, this is not an 'Irish novel,'" say the publishers on the jacket of Miss Temple Lane's new book. But it remains most essentially an Irish novel, for all that. Hyacinth Comerford, the centre and substance of the book, is altogether Irish—poetical, temperamental, misunderstood, melancholy and fanciful—she is indeed the embodiment of the Irish spirit, as interpreted by the Irish, and the world seems a hard place to her. An unsympathetic nurse warps her early years, and throughout her youth—for she is still a young woman when the book closes—she comes in contact with people and things that wound her sensitive nature. A love of beauty, a desire to express herself in the language of poetry, bring her success more swiftly than it comes to most poets. Happiness is not so easily won. A disastrous love affair sends her back to the Ireland of her dreams, and here we see her gathering together again the broken threads of her life. Hyacinth, drawn with delicacy and understanding, stands out against a background of less definite characters, her childhood being particularly well done, and Miss Lane is to be congratulated upon a very unusual piece of work.

BITTER WATERS.

By Heinrich Hauser. 7s. 6d. (Wishart.)

A remarkable book in all ways—as a first novel especially remarkable. Highly praised by Thomas Mann, Wassermann, and other leading German novelists, and accorded the Gerhart Hauptmann prize for 1929. In an introduction, Liam O'Flaherty says that it may not be a great book; nevertheless it is amazingly vivid in its jerky sentences, forceful like the rhythmic spit of a piston-rod. It is a sea story, about a sailor and a girl of no reputation, which takes you from Mexico to the Baltic. Extraordinarily powerful; in parts, moving too. And only 240 pages. An admirable translation by Patrick Kirwan. And, last but not least, a beautifully produced book, a joy to handle—makes the usual run of seven-and-sixpenny novels look by comparison mighty poor stuff.

ARSENIC.

By John Remenham. 7s. 6d. (Skeffington.)

Is it that a sensational affair in the courts last year, provided the first idea for this story? At least there seems to be a certain generic similarity between them. Four members of a family die in quick succession under uspicious circumstances. There are inquests, trials, and the usual paraphernalia of mystery—to which the title of the book gives a solution. The now indispensable Scotland Yard man "unravels the complex problem." The story is well told and well sustained; it contains plenty of thrills and a satisfactory background of characterisation; and the setting out of the court scenes in the form of question and answer enhances their effectiveness.

MR. ABSALOM.

By Alan Sullivan. 7s. 6d. (John Murray.)

"Mr. Court, are you coming here? . . . If you do, 'twill be a stiffer thing than you've tackled yet. I've seen you fight like a lion, but it's another sort of courage that is needed here." Thus whispered the butler at Monk's Mount to Hector Court, who had just been appointed secretary to its owner, Mr. Absalom. The reader who likes thrills will find plenty here, and yet there is no villain, only someone who has made a great discovery which causes people to hail him as blessed, and then sometimes wonder if their judgment be right. Mystery broods over the house, the black servants, the ancient and forbidding animals, the great hidden laboratory and the master of them all. It broods also over that master's delight when Hector falls in love with Anthea, his stepdaughter. It is an especially well constructed and well written story.

TRADITIONS OF LANCASHIRE.

Second Series

By John Roby. 7s. 6d. (Warne.)

Lancastrians, especially those living in exile, will welcome a reprint of old John Roby, whose "Second Series" was first published in 1831. These folk-tales are like the men and women of the County Palatine who created them—a curious mixture of religion, superstition, patriotism and sentiment: the latter notoriously qualified by the flair for a good bargain. "Set a sprat to catch a whale!" is the old saw that will recur most often to his Lancashire readers. And there are tales which give us vivid glimpses of the real old Lancashire: of a seaboard of flat, unending sands, where there is silence save for the faint suck of the water beneath, and where the sea shows only a far silver line on the horizon: where summer days bring skies of unbroken turquoise, and the dunes roll for miles knee-deep in their coarse sea-grass, and the "foreigner" gets lost: or of bleak moors inland, bounded by strange-shaped naked hills, and broken here and there by tumbled masses of rock: where boggarts still lie in wait, to coax the wicked or unwary towards the deadly morass. Lancastrians will appreciate such a book. But it is also good reading for the "foreigner," who knows the county only as a place where coal is mined or cotton loomed, a district of dirt and dock strikes. For these things are not all; they have been superimposed on the old Lancashire by men too eager for "brass," forgetful of the warnings which their own legends convey.

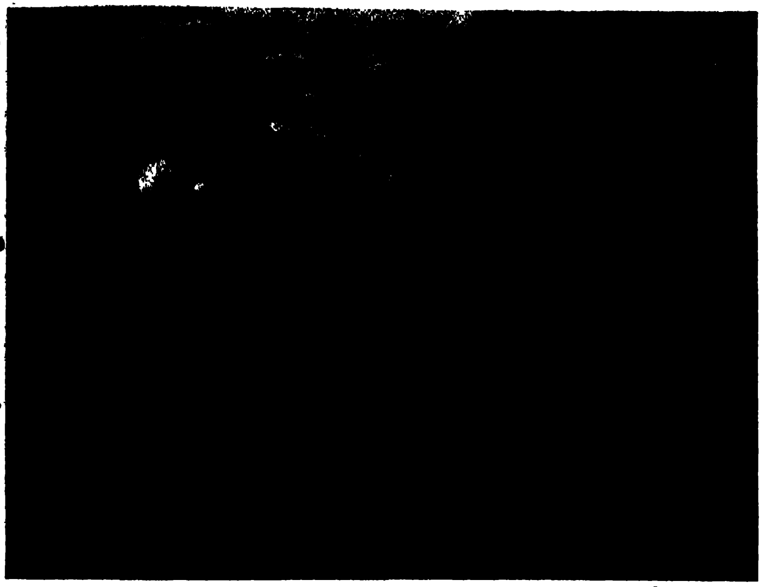
A HISTORY OF THE MODERN CHURCH

By J. W. C. Wand. 8s. 6d. (Methuen.)



Mr. Wand's book is a companion volume to Miss Deanesly's "History of the Mediæval Church." It is no reflection upon the excellent way in which she performed her task to say that, compared with Mr. Wand, Miss Deanesly had an easy task. It was possible for her to speak of one attitude towards life, one faith and one Church system. Mr. Wand has had to trace the rise of many attitudes towards life, many conceptions of the faith and many ecclesiastical systems; and these have had to be set against a highly complicated background of general history. Undaunted by immense difficulties, he has succeeded in giving us a really lucid and well balanced survey of the whole field of universal Church development from the sixteenth century to the present day. His book, if necessarily elementary, is a marvel of compression and, considering the nature of his task, of fairness. While writing primarily for Anglican students and not hiding his own Broad Church affinities, he summarises with insight and sympathy the varied achievement of the many religious groups which have arisen since the break-up of the mediæval unity, and he sees those groups as each contributing its distinctive quota towards a fuller and truer unity in the future. As an introductory textbook to its subject, his volume, with its admirable chronological tables and index, should immediately take its place as the standard work.

THE TRIUMPHANT FOOTMAN:

A Farcical Fable.

By Edith Olivier. 7s. 6d. (Martin Secker.)

The answer to the fable must be that virtue brings its own reward, for the triumphant footman certainly owes more to his virtues than to his eccentricities. He tells a lie, or many lies, now and then to adjust matters more delicately, but he is absolutely honest when handling his employers' concerns. His great asset is his capacity to learn, by which he makes himself master of four languages, and becomes a connoisseur of gems, pictures, and bric-à-brac. But sometimes the devil of mischief enters into him, and he sets the social world round him spinning, and then it cannot be foretold what will happen, a bear in a ball-room, or perhaps a circus, at a dance. In any case it is a most amusing story; Miss Olivier has the daintiest touch in comedy, and at the end invokes Nemesis to visit the footman for his first lapse from the path of virtue.

LAKE BAIKAL.

AMONG PRISONERS OF WAR IN RUSSIA AND SIBERIA.

By Elsa Brändström. Illustrated. 18s. (Hutchinson.)

As daughter of the Swedish Ambassador in Petersburg at the outbreak of war, Elsa Brändström enjoyed peculiar facilities for work among prisoners of war in European Russia and the whole of Siberia for the ensuing five and a half years. She worked the first year of the War in Petrograd and with the transports of severely wounded prisoners exchanged between Russia and Germany; in the winter of 1915–16 in Siberia; in the spring of 1916 in the Government of Pensa, the point of transit for employed prisoners of war; then six months in Moscow; later in Petrograd, and the second half of 1917 in Siberia; then again in Siberia from the summer of 1918 till that of 1920. In all, her work in camps, hospitals and labour depots brought her into touch with some 700,000 prisoners of war. Her notes of that experience are now published in the hope that they will rouse public opinion to the necessity of new legislation for dealing with prisoners of war; to this end she has written her book "not as an accusation, but as a duty."

EARL BEATTY: ADMIRAL OF THE FLEET.

By Geoffrey Rawson, Lieut.-Commder R.I.M. (Ret.). 12s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

If there is one biography that the British public should enjoy reading, it is a life of Lord Beatty, who has always been a romantic figure for them, and will probably grow more romantic as the years pass. Commander Rawson's biography is so good, that the romance of Earl Beatty's life is bound to expand until it absorbs all the admiration that the British are ever ready to give to one of their heroes. How far this romance has sprung from the alluring tilt of the gallant Admiral's cap, who shall say? Great things come sometimes from little things, and there is no doubt that the cap's famous angle has had a lot to do with the fascination of the Admiral's appearance. But our respect and enthusiasm for Lord Beatty are based upon something more solid. He is a great sailor and a great leader. He might have been a success as one, and a failure as the other. Fortunately for us, he was, and is a past-master at both. Commander Rawson is a wise biographer, never unbalanced, and always shrewd in his judgments. We not only see the Admiral as a man who has learned all there is to know about his profession, but—and this perhaps is almost always more important—he knew, in those fateful days in the North Sea, how to apply his knowledge. And that is the genius, and always has been, of Earl Beatty's life. No doubt this book will find, as it should do, many readers among many kinds of people.

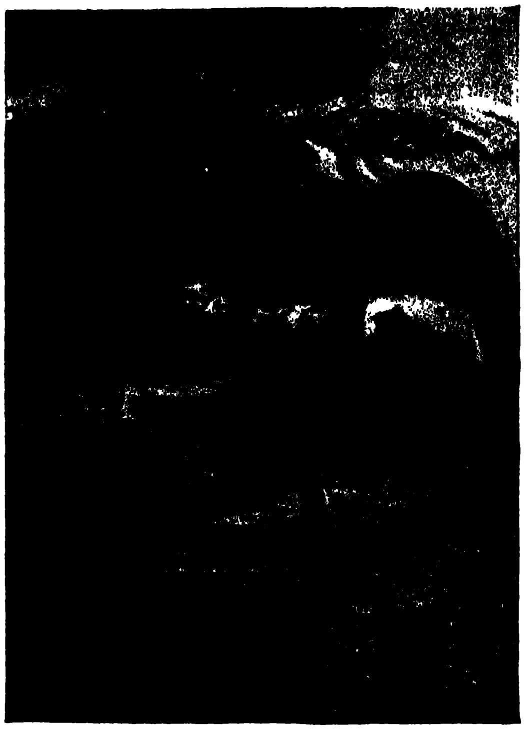
he were recording them to-day for a contemporary newspaper. The book is tremendously impressive in its background of semi-civilised, semi-tribal life; it is inevitably less convincing with its people because, despite the author's theory, they are too remote from us in time and place. They hover on the borders of legend. The dramatic climax of the story is spoiled by being recorded in a letter rather than being interwoven into the text of the book, but apart from this the telling of the story is remarkably well done. Whether in fact the theory of unchanging human nature upon which the experiment is based holds good remains a moot point. Often one is tempted to think that it is the author and not the character supplying the motives for the action, but in the handling of the relationship between Samson and Delilah, although the author has embroidered the legend, we have a very convincing and subtle study. " Samson the Nazarite " is not everybody's book, but those who like its type will hail it as genius.

TENT FOLK OF THE FAR NORTH.



By Ester Blenda Nordstrom. 12s. 6d. (Herbert Jenkins.)

Miss Nordstrom was appointed by the Swedish Government as teacher in the Lapp summer school in the settlement on the shores of Lake Tarpallajauri. The descriptions of the school's early days, the author's housekeeping experiments with her little Lapp maid Ellekare, not to mention her various daring adventures forth, are all entertainingly related, but they pale beside the vivid pictures of her trek with the tribe from Soppero to the Swedish-Norwegian border. " The storm clutched us with cruel hands, greedy and merciless, as if no pity existed in all the world." " Two tent poles had to be sacrificed for the fire that night and provided us with a few cups of coffee." " Whirling flakes cutting like a thousand sharp knives," and yet, so warm was the native hospitality and friendship that it was with a sad heart the author heard their last jolly " Boris, Lärarinna " and reflects " no other spot on earth was marked by a greater peace and freedom."

fascination, the discomforts, dangers and disillusion of East Africa are cleverly introduced as background to a dramatic story. If you can accept the improbability of Michael Lorimer consenting to impersonate Justin Ferraby and go out in his place to the lonely farm in Kenya Colony, you will enjoy a good, romantic tale of a man in an exceedingly difficult position, burdened with another man's past. Lorimer and Ferraby meet on board ship, bound for Africa. Lorimer is going out in the hope of finding work; Ferraby has been banished by his family to make good on an uncle's farm. Stricken with illness and dying, he pleads with Lorimer to take his place; and for the sake of a girl, whose portrait Ferraby shows him, Lorimer agrees. It is soon impressed upon Lorimer that the ne'er-do-well he is supposed to be has earned a particularly discreditable reputation in England, and it is up to him to live down that reputation. He falls in love with Gloria, the girl, and she falls in love with him—but Ferraby's past is between them. The story holds you, for the action is brisk and the situation becomes more tense and complicated, till a cousin who knew Ferraby arrives from England, and then . . . But you must read it for yourself and discover how the unfortunate adventurer escapes from the tangle.

SCRAPS OF PAPER: INDIA'S BROKEN TREATIES, HER PRINCES, AND THE PROBLEM.

By A. P. Nicholson. 21s. (Ernest Benn.)

AN INTERNATIONAL DRAMA.

By Henry Morgenthau. 18s. (Jarrolds.)

Mr. A. P. Nicholson in "Scraps of Paper" has presented a thoughtful, detailed and historical account of the Indian Princes and their treaties with the paramount authority. The author has taken infinite trouble to place before his readers the causes and events leading in so many cases to the breaking or modifying of these treaties; he has had access to the same material as the Harcourt Butler Committee. A very illuminating chapter dealing with "The Tyranny of Words" shows to what a very large extent outward and visible signs count with this Empire of the East. For instance, a vast amount of irritation has been caused by the use in connection with the States of the word feudal or feudatory. First adopted by Lord Ellenborough, it has frequently been interpreted by officials in its English sense. The Indian system however is entirely different from our own remnants of feudalism. Land was not granted to prince or peasant in India because we had conquered it. It was theirs by right and the political agent was not an overlord. This is but one example of the ever outstanding difficulty of blending East and West, and in spite of laws and treaties smooth relations always must ultimately rest on the personal good will and feeling of the persons concerned in each case. Still, there may be another side to some of the vexed questions. It is possible that in a dim and distant past just one or two princes may not have proved always anxious to hear, consider and adopt all reasonable suggestions for the general good. Scindia of Gwalior used his "courage and craft" for us in the Mutiny; others with more craft, subtlety, and evasion may have brought about the necessity for a little deeper thinking, a little closer attention, and perhaps some unwelcome suggestion on the part of the agent. The necessity for immediate action may have been great. In a short notice it is impossible to deal with every part of the book. Mr. Nicholson's "Perspective" gives a clear and concise summing up of the position of Indian affairs as they appear to-day, and should be read by everyone who has the welfare of this vast country at heart. The Princes have proved their loyalty to us in the past, and, says Mr. Nicholson, "it is a political absurdity to suppose that any arbitrary arrangement (with British India) would stand whereby land-locked States were circled by a dominion that could penalise imports, or arrest communications." The illustrations and maps are excellent.

"An International Drama" brings us back from Asia to Europe, and the problem here is to deal with just over six million people, not upwards of 322 millions, as is the case in India. Still, when it is remembered that Greece is a small country and that over a million of these people were "dumped" on their brethren after the frightful catastrophe at Symrna in 1922, and that the immigrants brought nothing with them beyond the clothes they wore, it does not require a great deal of imagination to realise that an acute problem was presented to the nation Greece willingly and courageously did all she could for her starving countrymen But the undertaking was stupendous, and Greece was poor. In 1923 a Refugee Settlement Commission was created by the League of Nations with Mr Henry Morgenthau, late American Ambassador at Constantinople, as chairman He was sent to Athens to undertake the very difficult task of handling the problem Gifted with faith, self-confidence, energy and a special knowledge of Balkan difficulties his amazing achievement is recorded in this book Funds had to be raised, and Mr Morgenthau s interviews with the Governor of the Bank of England reveal a vivid picture of the undaunted American spirit This same spirit was manifest in Greece when things appeared specially difficult or workers were disheartened The political situation also was not particularly cheerful, for ministers were beginning to get busy to exchange a king for a president Mr Morgenthau however steered a very happy course and was friendly with all, his great services were acknowledged by a grateful country, and the greatest honours were conferred upon him The book must be read in order to grasp the full significance of the marvellous results accomplished in this small peninsula during the last six eventful years.

LINCOLN.

By EMIL LUDWIG

21s (Putnam)

Up to the present it is a generally recognised fact that the best biography and the best play written round Lincoln's life have been from the hands of Englishmen (Lord Charnwood and John Drinkwater) this despite the fact that thousands of books have been written about this rugged, gaunt figure Now comes a real contribution from the hands of that brilliant biographer Emil Ludwig, and it will be interesting to watch its reception Armed with enthusiasm born of a long and deep admiration, he has drawn into focus the whole span of Lincoln s life from the early struggles in the cabin down to the last tragic years Such a scope naturally means considerable compression, but the real gain in this volume is the full length powerful figure that stands out vividly against the turbulent background All the towering strength, the amazing simplicity, the just as amazing humanity, the loneliness of soul, the eccentricity, the gentleness that went to the making of that paradoxical figure are charmed into these pages and cast their spell afresh a spell that grows with the years Numerous portraits of Lincoln at different periods of his life add their quota to a book of absorbing interest We are greatly indebted to Eden and Cedar Paul whose translation runs with the fluency of an original, thanks to their excellent labours.

A LIFE OF JOHN WILKES.

By O. A. Sherrard. 10s. 6d. net. (Allen & Unwin.)

The author of this eminently readable apology would have us see John Wilkes as "the father of modern democracy." That won't do, though Mr. Sherrard makes out a very good case for his client. Wilkes was hampered from the start. With a father, the whiggish and wealthy distiller of Clerkenwell, set on having his son John a gentleman, a mother rigidly puritan, and the marriage à la mode at twenty with an heiress ten years his senior, it is no matter for surprise that the youthful Wilkes was a rake, profligate and spendthrift. The trouble was that the reputation—quite richly earned—could not be lived down till middle age had come. Dr. Johnson, to whom Wilkes in 1763 was no more than "an abusive scoundrel," revised his opinion after Boswell had arranged a meeting, and it was "Jack has a great variety of talk, Jack is a scholar, and Jack has the manners of a gentleman." But that was in 1777, when Wilkes was nearly fifty. As for the last meeting of Johnson and Wilkes, has not Boswell painted it for all time?: "When I returned I was struck with observing Dr. Samuel Johnson and John Wilkes, Esq., literally tête à tête; for they were reclined upon their chairs, with their heads almost close to each other, and talking earnestly in a kind of confidential whisper. . . . It presented to my mind the happy days which are foretold in the Scripture, when the lion shall lie down with the kid." The public life of John Wilkes in Parliament and in the City of London was entirely creditable. It belongs to eighteenth century England and to political history. Mr. Sherrard's biography of the talented, courageous and engaging John Wilkes, a man of ready wit and large social gifts, is a capital piece of work.

THE LAST OF MRS. CHEYNEY.

By Denys G. Herriot. 7s. 6d. (Collins.)

In a few weeks' time the first holiday of the year will be upon us, and in "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" the author has provided just the type of novel suitable for a period of leisure. Dealing with crooks of the lighter type, the story is amusing, and much of the dialogue particularly smart. Mrs. Cheyney's two lovers, men of entirely opposite characteristics, are entertaining people, as is also the Hon. Willie Wynton, the rather brainless youth of the party. The two tense scenes of the play (the book is adapted from the play by Frederick Lonsdale), one when against her will the female crook, Mrs. Cheyney, is locked in her hostess's bedroom with Lord Dilling, and the other, when Lord Elton's letter, with its scathing criticism of hostess and guests, is shown to all and sundry, are also two of the most arresting passages in the story.

RED LIKKER.

By Irvin S. Cobb. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

There are some very fine passages in this story, and although the author assures his readers that the setting and characters are all products of his imagination, the whole has been so well welded that by the time the last page is reached it is difficult not to feel that such a striking personality, for instance, as Colonel Bird, the soldier and distiller, who lived and saw so much during his varied and eventful life, is not a real character. The story touches upon the American Civil War and the Great War of Europe. Most of its scenes are laid in Kentucky, and it deals with three generations of Birds, and their discovery and distilling of the "Red Likker" of the title. The author does not take sides when Prohibition rears its head. He simply tells the story of its effect upon different people to whom he introduces us, and the result is a most arresting and uncommon story.

THE ELIZABETHAN HOME.

Discovered in Two Dialogues.

By Claudius Hollyband and Peter Erondell, and edited by M. St. Clare Byrne. 5s. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

The original limited edition of this book was deservedly exhausted almost as soon as it was published, and all who wish to taste the flavour of the Elizabethan age at its most intimate will be grateful that a second and unlimited edition has now appeared. The dialogues which it contains have been selected from the conversational manuals composed by two Huguenot refugees who taught French for their livelihood in Elizabethan London. They were born of their makers' practical experience of the difficulties of teaching French, but they serve a purpose to-day never intended, by throwing open to us the privacy of the Elizabethan home and schoolroom. They are full of quaint entertainment, and if Hollyband creates more successfully the illusion of immediate conversation, Erondell realises with an even greater verisimilitude the atmosphere of an aristocratic household directed by a great lady from the moment of waking to her retirement at night after family prayers.

THE TUNNELLERS OF HOLZMINDEN.

By H. G. DURNSFORD, M.C., M.A. 6s. (Cambridge University Press.)

This is the second edition of a book originally published in 1920. It certainly deserves reprinting, for it contains not only one of the fullest but one of the raciest accounts that have been written of the life of our soldiers in a German internment camp during the War. Mr. Durnsford gives us a vivid description of the conditions, the humours and the pains of imprisonment at Holzminden, "that highly advertised Brunswickian retreat which, on a day in September, 1917, flung open its hospitable gates to its first English guests." But Mr. Durnsford has also a remarkable story to tell of how, in the teeth of every imaginable difficulty, the "English guests" bored a tunnel by which many of them, including himself, made their escape. The account of his own "making good" is more thrilling than most novels.

CONFESSIONS OF ZENO.

By ITALO SVEVO. Translated from the Italian by BERYL DE ZOETE. 12s. 6d. (Putnams.)

Freud and James Joyce appear to be Italo Svevo's gods, and we are told that but for the encouragement given to the writer by the author of "Ulysses," these "Confessions of Zeno" would never have been set down on paper, let alone published, which they were in Italy some seven years ago, to be hailed on their advent as the product of genius. The reception on this side of what appears to be an admirable translation is likely to be a little more mixed. Zeno Cosini is hypochondriac, valetudinarian and amorist, haunted by a "sense of sin" and a "sense of disease," and spares his readers very little indeed by way of self-revelation in this diary alleged to have been composed on the advice of a psychoanalytic practitioner. The idea was apparently that the patient would benefit from the effects of a spiritual purge. Whether he did so or not remains unrevealed, but as Cosini is a mere figment of the author's imagination, the point need not be pursued. The ordinary person will dip into this queerest of books and find himself repelled at first, then rather fascinated. Possibly his compatriots are right, and Signor Svevo is in effect a genius.

THE GREAT LITERARY SALONS: XVII and XVIII Centuries.

With Illustrations. 7s. 6d. (Thornton Butterworth.)

There is a distinct and distinctive charm about this volume. It reveals with clarity and an absence of dry detail the reality and the allurement of five of the most notable salons in France in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The chapters are the special lectures of the Musée Carnavalet, written by five "leading French critics," and translated by Miss Mabel Robinson. Louis Batiffol writes of the Marquise de Rambouillet; André Hallays treats of Madame de la Sablière; Paul Reboux, of Madame de Jencin; the salon of Madame Geoffrin is described by Nozière, and that of Madame du Deffand by André Bellessort. And Louis Gillet contributes an introduction which gives just the right key-note, so to speak, to arouse interest in the charming chapters which follow. It is impossible to learn of these gathering-places of the intellectual and the great without learning subconsciously much of the history and atmosphere of the times. The clear, lively yet dignified "lectures" leave lasting and pleasant impressions on the mind.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A BRITISH YARN MERCHANT.

By W. F. M. WESTON-WEBB. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. (Cayme Press.)

Politicians and painters, soldiers and students, judges and jailbirds, usually sit down to write their reminiscences when they attain a certain degree of eminence, but for some obscure reason it is very unusual for merchants to do so. This makes Mr. Weston-Webb's story of an honourable and successful career in the world of "business" very acceptable, concerning as it does various aspects of English life which are worthy and characteristic, but very seldom written about. Destined for the Navy, Mr. Weston-Webb had to take to clerking in his teens owing to inability to conquer sea-sickness, but seems to have conquered everything else life had in store for him. Raising himself before thirty to the position of a captain of industry, he still found time somehow to compete and excel in many sports, shooting, fishing, volunteer soldiering, cricket, and boxing. As Mr. Stephen Gwynn remarks in his preface, it is extraordinary to read how this Englishman, knowing no language but his own, managed to establish not only connections but branch establishments all over Europe, in France, Germany, Austria, Russia. He even had a shot at Turkey.

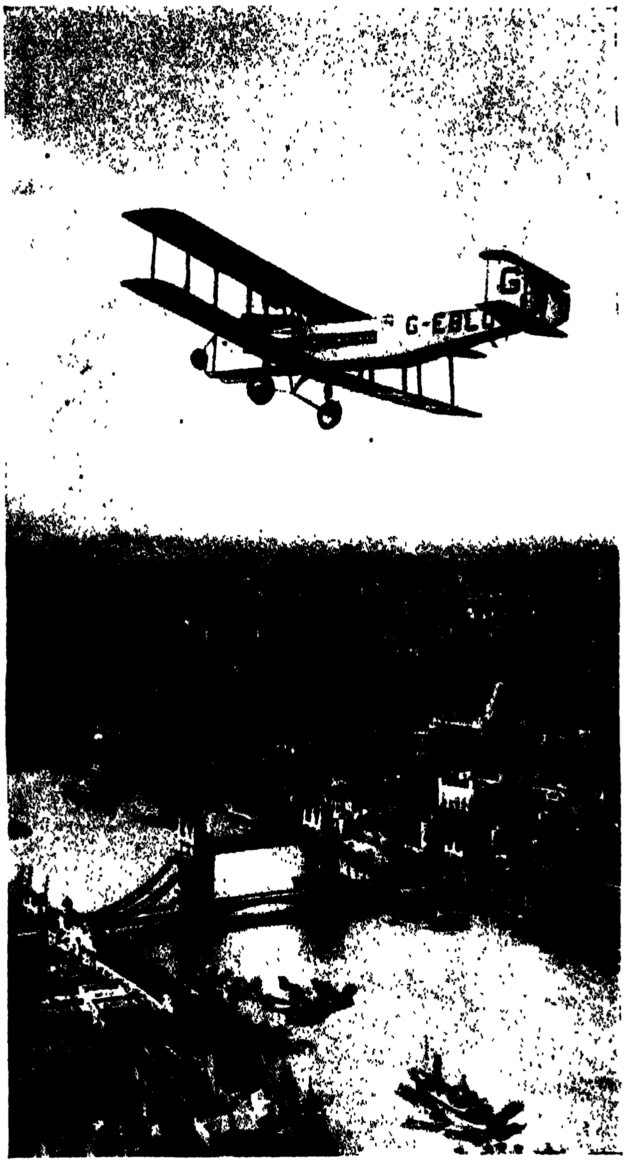
THE EVOLUTION OF THE FLYING MACHINE.



By Harry Harper. 21s. (Hutchinson.)

FROM POST BOY TO AIR MAIL.

By G. Gibbard Jackson. 12s. 6d. (Sampson Low.)

These two books have this much in common: they trace incidentally the development of speed, the one in relation to man's conquest of the air, the other as it concerns the carrying of the mails. But Mr. Harry Harper, the air correspondent of the Daily Mail, has the more romantic theme and, with the aid of a generous assortment of illustrations, he has made the most of his opportunity. He adds little or nothing to existing knowledge but that, one imagines, he had no thought of doing. What he has done, and done well, is to produce a book which gives a vivid survey of the evolution of all types of aircraft from times legendary to the R 101. It is a story fabricated of humour and tragedy.

The dream of conquering the air has troubled the days of a curiously diverse company of men. Poets and scientists one would expect, but here are Jesuit priests, a humble locksmith, a bishop, a manufacturer of lace machinery, monks and a watchmaker. They gave their time and their money, and some of them gave their lives. Not many of them knew the joys of achievement. There is pathos in the labours of Francesco Lana, who wrote a long treatise on an aerial ship whose lifting power was to come from globes of thin copper exhausted of their air. His idea was not put to the test, so he lived out his life and never knew that his metalled vacuums would have collapsed before the pressure of the outside air.

From The Airway to See Europe
By Eleanor Kisner
(Marriott).

"Silver Wing" over Europe.

The real story begins with the Montgolfier brothers and their hot-air balloons. The earliest of all balloon passengers were a sheep, a cock and a duck. The first of the Montgolfier man-carrying balloons, flamboyantly painted and decorated, was fitted with a brazier so that the pilot could prolong his aerial voyage by stoking the fire. A gallant young Frenchman, Pilatre de Rozier, earned undying fame as the first balloon pilot. He soared into popularity at a bound, but, like many who came after him, he did not long survive to enjoy the sweets of fame. In an attempt to cross the Channel in a balloon which combined the hot-air and hydrogen principles, he fell in flames near Calais.

There followed attempts to make balloons navigable, and we get systems of oars and sails. In the suggestion of General Meusnier for a rotating oar placed vertically instead of horizontally we see the idea of the modern propeller. So the pageant passes before our eyes to the age of steam and electric engines until, with the perfection of the petrol engine, we come to the airships of our own times.

The story of the development of the heavier-than-air machine is less picturesque, but has more of purpose in it. Mr. Harper tells of the long and patient gliding experiments of Otto Lilienthal, whose work inspired the Wright brothers towards their first free flight in a power-driven heavier-than-air machine. With the achievement of the Wrights in 1903 the flying age dawned. The progress made in the last quarter of a century has been phenomenal and offers ample material for speculation on the future.

Mr. Jackson, whose book is also delightfully illustrated, tells the history of the British Post Office. His theme is less exciting than Mr. Harper's, but it is also less well known to the average reader. He goes back to 1484, when relays of horsemen were organised to convey early news to the King of a possible landing by Henry Tudor. In this initiation of a system of Royal posts he sees the genesis of the idea that the Posts should be a State institution. The Royal monopoly was confirmed by Queen Elizabeth, but Charles I passed it to a private citizen who used his privileged position to enrich himself at the expense of the public. Thence afterwards for many years the posts were "farmed" to the highest bidder, and although the inefficiency and abuses of the system were glaring, it was not until 1667 that the main service reverted to the Government. More than a century was to pass however before the first mail coach was run. This, a marvel of speed in its day, covered the 118 mile journey from Bristol to London in seventeen hours. For fifty years the mail coaches, with all their pomp and circumstance, flourished.

In November, 1830, the first rail-borne mail was carried between London and Manchester. The development of the railways and the inspired advocacy of Rowland Hill brought about the penny post, a revolution in Post Office history. From now onwards the Post Office grew apace. The number of letters handled yearly has jumped from seventy-nine millions in 1839 to the three thousand millions of the present day.

And the Post Office has added other great activities to its organisation. The story of the ocean mails, the travelling post offices, the post office tube railways, the money-order and savings-bank businesses, the telegraph and the telephone systems, is told by Mr. Jackson with a keen eye for the romance of their development. We would have welcomed from his pen the inner history of the part played by the Post Office telephone organisation in the air-raid warning schemes which did so much to limit the threat of the airship and aeroplane attacks during the War.

LIFE IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

Vol. IV.

Selected, edited and arranged by G. C. COULTON. 10s. 6d. (Cambridge University Press.)

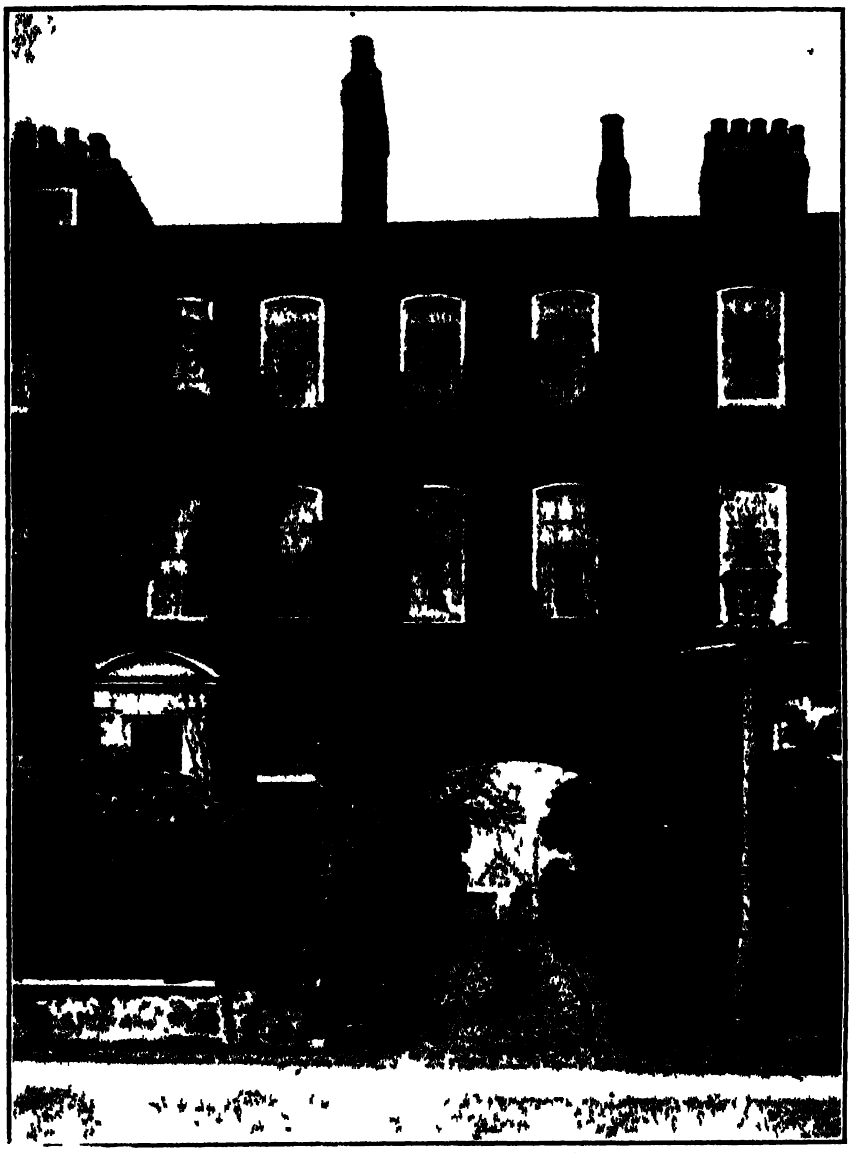
This is the last volume of Dr. Coulton's invaluable anthology illustrating, from contemporary sources, the life of the Middle Ages. This final book is concerned with Monks, Friars and Nuns, and Dr. Coulton, whose authority for such a task is unrivalled, has collected no less than 121 long extracts from mediæval human documents. "The records here printed," he modestly claims, "represent thirty years' study among all kinds of mediæval writings, and could scarcely be outdone in this respect but by scholars who have better work to do." Drawn from six different languages, the majority of the extracts are now translated for the first and perhaps the last time, since "they are only the cream from bulky and often inaccessible volumes." Dr. Coulton's anthology is indispensable to the growing army of readers who wish to get at the real Middle Ages.

THE AIRWAY TO SEE EUROPE.

By ELEANOR ELSNER. 6s. (Marriott.)

The term "just a flying visit" falls glibly enough from one's lips when it merely implies a hasty one, but Mrs. Elsner has infused the words with a spirit of reality, tinged them with magic. It is a wonderful vista that she opens up, wonderful not only on account of its thrills and the charm of new aspects, but because of its enormous possibilities. To breakfast in London, lunch in Rotterdam and dine in Berlin and attend the opera there the same night no longer savours of the magic carpet stories, but is an attractive possibility. Mrs. Elsner has had exceptional facilities for collecting her material, and in its disposal she gives free rein to her excellent descriptive powers, her infectious enthusiasm and her ready recognition of salient features and interests. Now that safety, comparable to any mode of travelling, is an accomplished fact, and comfort added to it, the lure is a tremendous one. It only remains for the important point of cost to be improved, and Mrs. Elsner, with her happy knack of blending the practical with the adventurous, should do much towards paving the way for the needed improvement by winning an enormous response from all who are interested in the popularising of travel by air.

DAWN ON MONT BLANC.



By WILFRID BENSON. 7s. 6d. net. (Hogarth Press.)

Mont Blanc really had nothing to do with it, though Madame Schloop, whose interruptions are always welcome, gives us the word at the very end. Roger Maiteland was a thoroughly good fellow, there's no doubt about that, but he had no sense of humour; and so there was bound to be trouble at Veagen when Roger came to be employed in the International Institute of Racial Peace." (The reader will quickly understand that Veagen is Geneva.) And then Nina was rather a tough proposition for official society at Geneva, more particularly after Roger was married. No one can blame Barbara for running away. How could she tell her husband was not in love with Nina? The author's note assures us that Geneva is surmounting the difficulties of the institute "by its team-work." We are glad to hear it. But as the author depicts them in this very clever novel, what a set they are at Geneva!

THE CHRONICLES OF CLAPHAM.

By J. H. MICHAEL BURGESS Privately printed. (Anthony Cavendish & Co.)

This is a selection from the reminiscences of Thomas Parsons, formerly a member of the Clapham Antiquarian Society, who died recently at the age of eighty-eight. He left behind five manuscript volumes in which he had written his own recollections of Clapham, and historic records of the district gleaned from many sources. From these volumes Mr. Burgess has made an admirable selection, furnishing it with notes and an introduction, and a wealth of additional matter in eleven appendices. Most of the houses round the Common have a history, and retain memories of men who were important in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. There is the house of Mr. Robert Thornton, a wealthy London merchant in the Russia Trade, where Pitt and his Cabinet were entertained at a banquet. It was occupied after Thornton's death by Lord Teignmouth, and then by Mr. Spencer Perceval, the premier who was assassinated in the Lobby of the House of Commons in 1812. There is the house in which Mr. Edgar, of the firm of Swan & Edgar, used to live; the house of William Wilberforce; the one in which Captain Cook resided; the Academies where Thomas Hood and Macaulay were among the scholars; and, to say nothing of others, here is the site of Gauden House, where in his latter days Pepys lived with his former clerk, Mr. William Hewer, whose name is familiar to readers of the great Diary. All this and much more make "The Chronicles of Clapham" a local history that, as Mr. de M. Rudolf says in a foreword, is an indispensable addition to the bibliography of Clapham. It is illustrated with many excellent photographs and drawings.

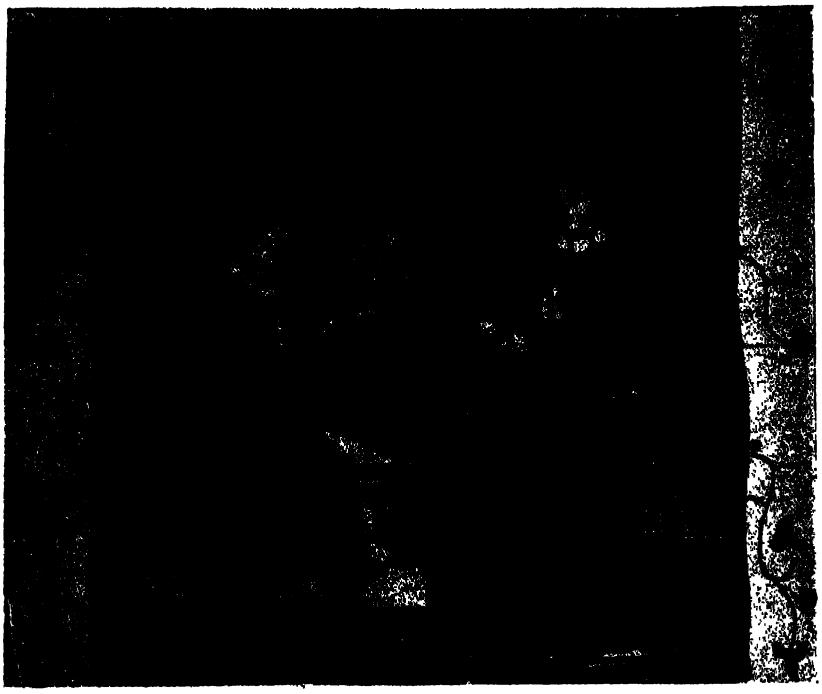
A LITERARY HISTORY OF THE ARABS

By REYNOLD A. NICHOLSON. 21s. (Cambridge University Press.)

This book, well known and indeed indispensable to all students of Arabic literature and Moslem culture, was first published over twenty years ago. It is now reissued, from another press and with some revision, as a companion to the late Professor Browne's "Literary History of Persia," and it is worthy to stand beside those famous volumes. Though intended in the first place for students of Arabic, it may be read with pleasure and profit by those who have no knowledge of that language, for Professor Nicholson has set his detailed accounts of writers and their works against a background which is a lucid exposition of the culture which produced them. He pays particular attention to poetry, which he exemplifies by frequent and admirable translations of his own making, but to read his book is to gain knowledge not only of a literature, but of a remarkable civilisation in all its aspects, political, social, religious and philosophic.

NOT ON THE SCREEN



By HENRY B. FULLER. 7s. 6d. (Knopf.)

Is the coloured wrapper going out of fashion? Of six current novels which the present writer has to review, five of them have a plain printed jacket. The one that has a coloured wrapper is this novel by Mr. Fuller, and, like the novel itself, it is an extremely good one. It seems there are two kinds of novels largely being read these days—War novels and novels about Hollywood. The former, they say, are likely to be fewer in number in the future, but Hollywood stories will always find their readers, especially when they are as good as this. It comes from America, which is, naturally, a recommendation for a story set in Hollywood, or rather novels with Hollywood plots. But what is a Hollywood plot? The chances are that when we think of such things, we see ultra-melodrama and bizarre situations, which the serious student of fiction avoids like the plague. Here, in "Not on the Screen," we have indeed a very clever travesty of such things, as the title might well suggest. You may readily recognise the ingredients of a cinema story in this novel, and by the time you have reached the end of it, you will realise the clever subtlety of the author who, alas! died last year, and this novel was his last.

THE MYSTERY AND ROMANCE OF ASTROLOGY.

By C. J. S. Thompson. 15s. (Brentano)

There is always a curious fascination about the prediction of the future on the one hand and the pseudo-sciences of the past on the other. Mr. Thompson, who is an expert in such matters, gives full rein to both—he shows how empires have been led astray through the belief of their rulers in what is now recognised as a falsehood; he shows also how remarkably accurate have proved some of the predictions made by the astrologers of old. Covering, and covering well, a remarkably wide field, the book gives evidence of loving and thorough research; but, though Mr. Thompson night reply that it was out of place in a popular volume, one reviewer at least would have welcomed even a short bibliography or other note of sources.

WHY STAY WE HERE?

By George Godwin. 7s. 6d. (Philip Allan.)

The threatened slump in War stories has not yet started; we hear of many still to come, and one we had heard of was "Why Stay We Here?" It is worth reading for itself—which is almost as good a thing as you can possibly say about a novel; it is certainly realistic, and decidedly unflinching. It is not crude or coarse—but ruthless—yes. There is another reason why we should read it; why we have read it: it is a story of the Canadian Expeditionary Force in France. We do not think we have had any other novel about the Canadians in the War. Goodness knows, we have read countless novels about warriors of almost every nationality under the sun, and we are indeed grateful to Mr. Godwin for building up a story around the Canadians. Mr. Godwin is a brilliant writer in many ways, and in "Why Stay We Here?" one feels and sees the irresistible imagination of the author. It was certainly time we had a story about those gallant heroes from the Dominion, and Mr. Godwin's is worthy of them.

COMPOSITION AND EXPRESSION IN LANDSCAPE PAINTING.

By F. J. Glass. 15s. (Seeley, Service.)

"To say to the painter that Nature is to be taken as she is, is to say to the player that he may sit on the piano. . . . The artist is born to pick and choose." This is the text, taken from Whistler, upon which Mr. Glass founds an eminently practical course of instruction to the student of landscape painting. He treats his theme comprehensively and thoroughly. With a welcome avoidance of æsthetic jargon (in passing he has some hard things to say of some of our art critics), he discusses the principles of picture-making from the preliminary sketch to the finished work in pencil, charcoal, pen-and-ink, water-colour, etching, aquatint, mezzotint, drypoint, wood and lino-cutting and so forth, using simple and effective diagrams to clarify his directions and reproductions from old and new masters of the British and foreign schools to the number of nearly a hundred and fifty, their points in each case carefully analysed, to illustrate his argument.

FROZEN SLIPPERS.

By A. M. Williamson. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)

" She froze her slippers,
But her feet were never cold."

For many years this talented author has given us novels of the utmost charm, and "Frozen Slippers" is even better than some of Mrs. Williamson's earlier novels, all of which have been worth the reading. In the present story, though you may not be much interested in life at Hollywood—but who is not attracted by the cinema these days?—once you start reading "Frozen Slippers" you will find yourself changing your mind, for the plot is so swift and thrilling that the reader is, willy-nilly, compelled to be interested. This is always the test of an entertaining story, and Mrs. Williamson, as those who know her work would always expect, gives us striking evidence once again of her distinctive capacity for story-making. Her knowledge of the world behind the scenes at Hollywood must be as complete as is possible, but she only lets it appear in the lives of her cleverly drawn characters.

CHATS ON OLD ENGLISH TOBACCO JARS.

By REGINALD MYER. 15s.
(Sampson Low.)

The charms of My Lady Nicotine are delightfully exploited and amplified in Mr. Myer's description of his almost unique collection of tobacco jars. Surely a new field of interest this. Fully recognising the fact that by thus sharing his treasures with an extended public his future prospects are almost inevitably jeopardised, he has nevertheless done it generously. It is impossible to do justice in words to the beauty of many of the jars here reproduced, they are delightful examples both in design and interest. They lure not only the student of art, of manners, customs and beliefs, but bear a definite relation to history. Added to Mr. Myer's vastly interesting stories of his experiences while collecting and much general information concerning the jars, there is also included a reprint of a book on "The Westminster Tobacco Box," published in 1824, and an Introduction by Mr. Charles R. Beard, himself an authority on the subject.

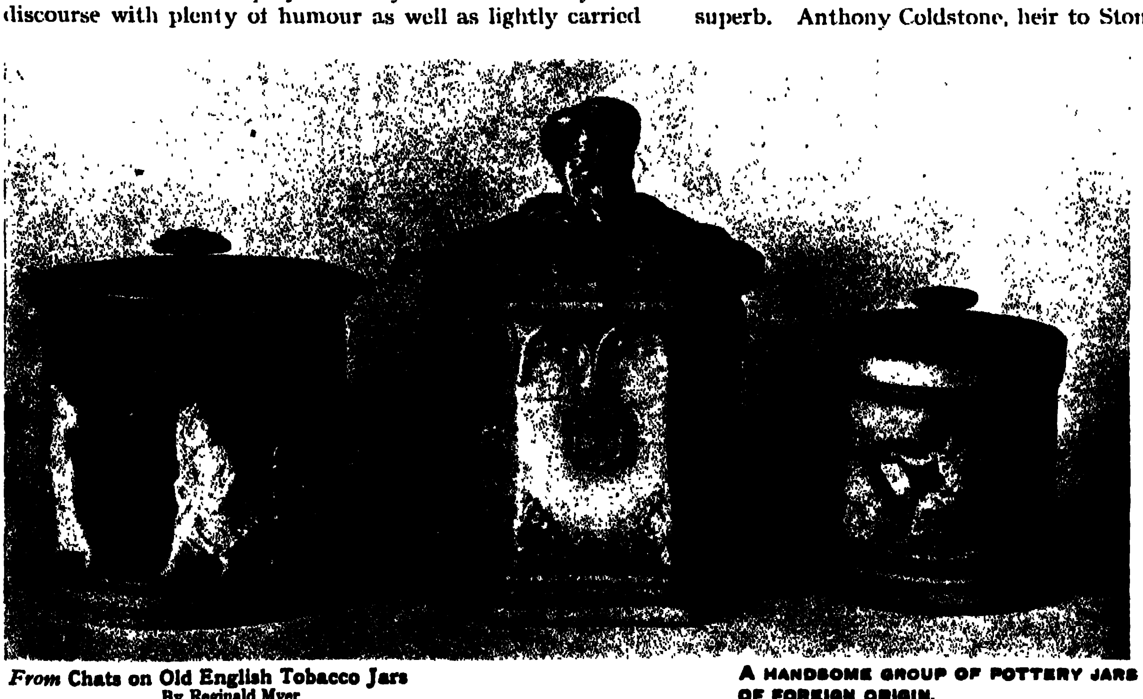
ILLUMINATION FROM THE POEMS OF CHRISTINE DE PISAU.

THE ROME OF ST. PAUL.



By A. G. MACKINNON. 7s. 6d. (R.T.S.)

In this handsome volume Dr. Mackinnon has completely realised what we take to have been his intention. He has written an account of ancient Rome that is at once scholarly and popular, and the book will be read with unflagging interest by readers of very different attainments. To readers of the New Testament it provides an invaluable historical background, and even classical students will find their interest quickened by the manner in which Dr. Mackinnon brings out the innumerable points of resemblance between the social problems and conditions of the present day, and of Rome in the days of St. Paul. He writes as one deeply fascinated by his subject, and to achieve his end he employs an easy and familiar style of discourse with plenty of humour as well as lightly carried knowledge. The book is splendidly illustrated from Professor Gatteschi's fascinating reconstructions of ancient Rome.

THE COLDSTONE.

By PATRICIA WENTWORTH. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

This novel has the qualities that one has come to expect from the novelist of originality, a keen sense of character and some historical sensibility. Primarily a mystery story, the plot gathers not moss but bricks and mortar from its setting; whether this be a country village, hag-ridden with a fear of the Middle Ages, or the very flamboyant atmosphere of Chelsea. For if Camilla is an entertaining character, even for Chelsea, with her jungle room and her Finns—or was it Kurds? Gran with her pawky humour is superb. Anthony Coldstone, heir to Stonegate and a dead man's strange bequest, comes upon mystery after mystery when he claims his property, till, finally, he discovers the solution to the secret, and the treasure of the house. Giving full weight, Miss Wentworth rounds off her novel with a romantic love incident, for her modern squire troubles not at all over the antecedents of his pretty village maid.

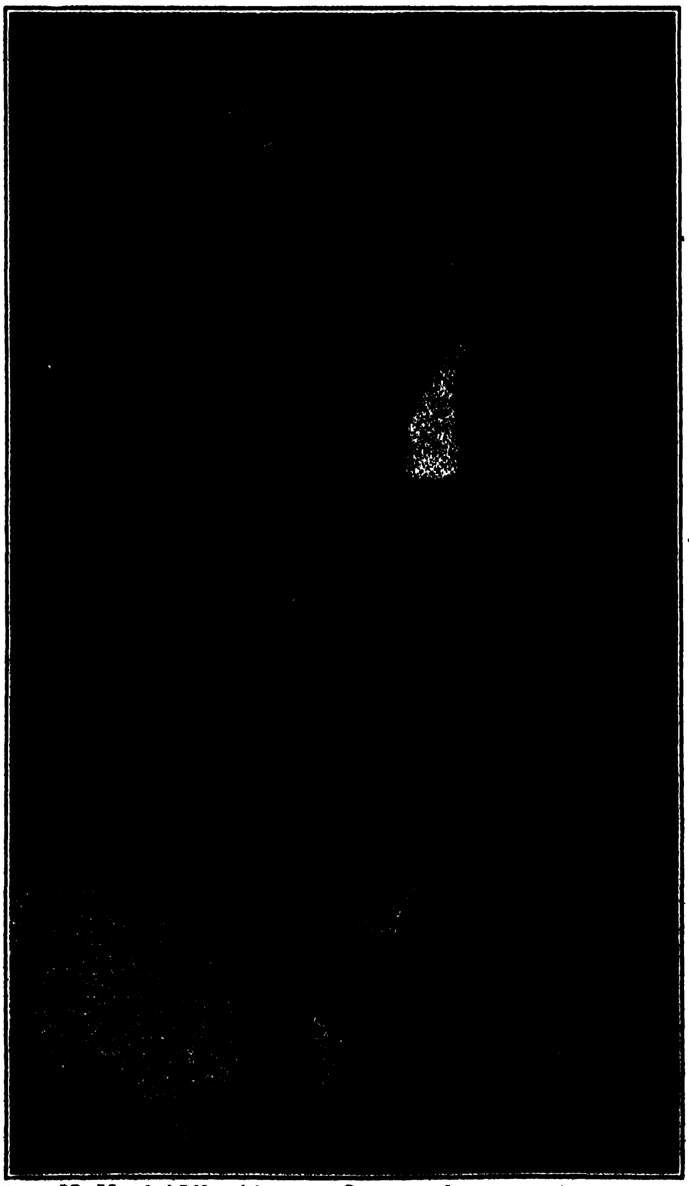
RUTLAND BARRINGTON AND JESSIE BOND AS SIR DESPARD MURGATROYD AND MAD MARGARET IN "RUDDIGORE."

MY MARRIED LIFE WITH LUDENDORFF.

By MARGARETHE LUDENDORFF. 18s. (Hutchinson.)

It is always interesting to view well known happenings from the converse point of view, and to glimpse the human nature behind the familiar stern exterior. That Ludendorff had a tender side is evidenced over and over again in this story which is told by one who was his wife, with much frankness and yet with unfailing good taste. Perhaps that latter is Frau Ludendorff's greatest charm, allied to her undoubted facility for drawing intimate word pictures and pen portraits. In an easy flowing sequence they steadily present the wearing anxieties, rumours and ordeals behind the German lines during those fateful years, especially from the woman's point of view. The activities at their home when the Kapp and Hitler plots were being hatched are of special interest, as is the story of the estrangement between Ludendorff and Hindenburg, on which the book closes. It is all general knowledge, but with a difference, and viewed through intimate and kindly if not always approving eyes.

THE LIFE AND REMINISCENCES OF JESSIE BOND.



As told by herself to ETHEL MACGEORGE. 7s. 6d. (Bodley Head.)

Jessie Bond is one of the last survivors of the original Savoyards who worked under the direct inspiration of Gilbert and Sullivan. How she danced and sang her way into the hearts of Savoy audiences is well known, but the vivid pictures in this book reveal the early struggles that led to the ensuing brilliant successes. From the safe anchorage of her peaceful retirement she now looks back over the stormy sea of those struggles and attainments and presents them deftly interlaced between intimate glimpses of many outstanding people with whom she was on familiar terms: Gilbert, Sullivan, Edward VII (then Prince of Wales), Santley, Garcia, Charles Wyndham, to mention but a few. How quaint now sounds Gilbert's stern discipline, but not more so than the author's reprimand of the then Prince of Wales when her dignity was slightly aggrieved. Fifteen illustrations show Miss Bond in some of the parts she did so much to create.

BROOMSTICK NIGHTS.

By ANNE CORNER. 5s. (Wells Gardner.)

A happy idea, this of Miss Corners, to look more closely into the home life of the Nursery Rhymes. Humpty Dumpty—we are sure that none of the children who devour this book will ever have heard it—Humpty Dumpty was put into his ugly egg-case because he was a cry baby and a sorrow to his parents! There is a long story about Bopeep's home and mountain. And in the story about the Old Woman Who Lived in a Shoe a great secret is revealed. The ancient dame wasn't their mummy at all; she was just a nasty old woman who didn't like housework! As for Wynken, Blynken and Nod, how delicious it is to meet them again, this time at school under the sea. They inherited their names from tiresome little tricks they had. These artless and cheerful tales will suit people up to eight years old, and Mr. Michael Stachowitsch supplies pictures well above the average.

PRODUCING PLAYS.

By C. B. Purdom.
7s. 6d.
(Dent).

Mr. Purdom is well known as the dramatic critic of Everyman and as one of the leading amateur producers in Great Britain. He was responsible for "Mr. Sampson" when that play won the David Belasco Cup at New York in 1927 and the Lord Howard de Walden Cup at London in the same year. In this copiously illustrated volume he offers, from his own ripe experience, a wealth of practical advice for amateur producers of plays. He deals fully, lucidly and interestingly with every aspect of his theme, there being twelve long chapters under such headings as "Choosing the Play," "The Actor," "Rehearsing," "Stage Management," "Scenery," and (not least important) "Finance." The book should be eagerly welcomed by amateur producers everywhere, and a careful study of it should do much to improve the standard of their performance.

THROUGH THE KENNET AND AVON CANAL BY MOTOR BOAT.

By Cyril Herbert Smith. 3s. 6d. (Roberts.)

Considerable interest undoubtedly attaches to traversing the old Kennet and Avon Canal, which has existed as a waterway since 1810, "if only," as Mr. Smith says, "to see the feat of engineering which was accomplished when the canal was built, also it is worth anybody's time to pass through the Bath Arm and Savernake Tunnel." Nevertheless he and his wife needed more than enthusiasm to carry them through such a delicate venture. Perseverance, patience and genuine hard work indeed were just as necessary and occupy so much of the space that there is very little left for the scenery they passed through or for more personal reflections. The daily log invariably runs after this manner: "We accomplished 3 mile from Reading and 5 locks"; "we only covered 7 miles again and 9 locks"; "10 miles and passed through 19 locks," and so on. In fact so much labour with locks, swing bridges, weeds, etc., was involved that considerable outside help was needed as well as a regular assistant on board. The idea is very attractive, but one would scarcely be unreasonable in wishing for smoother waters in which to indulge it.

GILBERT THE GHOST.

By R. Raleigh King.
7s. 6d. (Cecil Palmer.)

It is somewhat puzzling to know in what class of fiction this story should be placed. Perhaps farce is the right word to use; as such it is really excellent. Its centre is Ben Alder, a house in Hampshire, said to be haunted and in which is hidden a chest containing £80,000 in gold. In addition to the owner of the place, his son and son's fiancée and daughter Patricia, there gather three members of a Psychic Research Society (alias crooks), a detective, an actress, a lunatic baronet, a money-lender and a widow lady, nearly all treasure hunting. And there are three Scotch ghosts. What could not be made of such a company?

FOREST LIFE AND ADVENTURES IN THE MALAY ARCHIPELAGO.

By Dr. Eric Mjöberg. Translated from the Swedish by Anna Barwell. Illustrated. 12s. 6d. (Allen & Unwin.)

From Scraps of Paper By A. P. Nicholson (Benn). See page 93. A TROOPER IN THE FAMOUS BIKANER CAMEL CORPS, WHICH HAS FOUGHT IN MANY WARS.

Dr. Mjöberg, a Swedish naturalist, here tells the story of eight years spent recently in exploration and research among the tropical forests of Borneo, Sumatra and other islands of Insulinde. His record is interesting, but for a scientist he seems a little too prone to accept hearsay for fact. The Malayan gavial, tomistome or fish-eating crocodile, for instance, is not confined to a few rivers on the coast of Borneo as he states, but has long been known in the Perak, Pahang and Selangor rivers of the Peninsula and their tributaries, and specimens from this district are to be seen at the Reptile House in Regent's Park. Our own Zoo too has also harboured the serow or "goat antelope" (kambing gurun of the Malays), though Dr. Mjöberg claims to be the only European, barring "Governor Swettenham," who has ever set eyes on the beast. Admittedly not often seen or shot owing to the nature of its habitat, this animal is really quite common on the high ranges and isolated limestone crags throughout the Peninsula. Probably Dr. Mjöberg's most real contribution to science made on this trip was his identification of the male (a full grown but tiny beetle) of the eccentric monstrosity known as the "Trilobite larva," whose life history has long been an unsolvable riddle to entomologists. There are some interesting photographs of this and other subjects.

THE FLAGRANT YEARS.

By Samuel Hopkins Adams. 7s. 6d. (John Hamilton.)

New York is the centre in which Consuelo Barratt makes her lonely struggle for life, and we are given a lively and impressive picture of a section of the workers in the greatest city of America. Consuelo is almost starving when she meets "Ipsi-doodle" Smith, who advises her to work in a beauty parlour, and writes her an introduction to the head of one. She follows the advice, and incidentally comes into contact with many people and aspects of New York life; and has just decided to marry Rowdy Pontefract, to save him from himself, when he disappears. It is not only an interesting but a lively story, which betrays the difference that exists in social and moral ideas between girl workers in New York and in London. There is certainly more candour in the former.

THE ADMIRABLE SIMMONS.

By Katharine Tynan. 7s. 6d. (Ward, Lock.)

"Just a bit out of life" is the kind of remark one might utter as the last page of a book by Katharine Tynan is turned. But it is an amusing bit chiefly, and interesting always. Her men and women are men and women who might easily be one's near neighbours, and their talk the talk we might expect from them under like circumstances. But those critics who know something about people and about writing, know that this is deftly concealed art. The one character in this novel who would be an unlikely near neighbour is the Admirable Simmons himself. He comes first into our ken as the butler of the young couple named Hunter, who have just come to live at Summerfields." There is no doubt about his faithful adoration of the Hunters, and his loyal protection of them at all times. There is a bit of mystery hinted at in connection with the Admirable one, now and then, but not till his biography nears the end of the volume is the solution suggested. Here is a pleasant story, very human, and taking us again, for a short while, through some of the War days at home.

VAGARIES OF A VAGABOND.

"The Fighting Parson."

By George Gray. 12s. 6d. (Heath Cranton.)

Dedicated with affectionate reverence and esteem to Dame Madge Kendal by the author, who was for long in the Kendals' company. Dame Madge contributes a foreword, and there is a delightful photograph of the popular actress as frontispiece. Mr. Gray has many amusing things to tell; he is perhaps most widely known for his playlet, "The Fighting Parson," which was produced in 1903. It ran for over a hundred and fifty performances at the Holborn Empire and brought its author and hero many interesting letters. Throughout this volume are photographs of Mr. Gray in his various rôles, showing his wonderful versatility. His handsome, genial, shrewd face changes subtly into the old man, the Indian, the Russian. Mr. Gray in his retirement is still active and useful as Deputy in the Jersey Royal States Assembly, and has taken the part of the Examiner in "Outward Bound" in an amateur production he undertook at the request of the Dean of Jersey.

EN GARDE.

By Samuel Morse. 7s. 6d. (Cassell.)

How is this for a dramatic opening sentence to a narrative of romantic France? "The austere primate, silhouetted in the firelight before the mantel, raised a monitory finger, and Comte Henri thought covetously of the great sapphire on the slim uplifted hand." In this picturesque manner the story proceeds, and continues to the end, and all lovers of the flowery historical novel should put its name on their library lists. It is a brave tale tricked out with intrigue and roguery. Monsieur le Comte de Villeron goes to Indry, in Poictou, to wed Liane, the daughter of Monsieur le Comte de Montremy. He does not love her; but for France at a troubled time it will be a service. But Liane, proudly crying "You may inform her gracious Majesty that Liane de Montremy will choose her own husband," escapes by knotting the sheets of her bed and dropping from her balcony; and she borrows the ostler's jacket and breeches. A pretty situation, and Mr. Morse develops it with art and spirit, and in the end true lovers, moonstruck with love, are united.

THE ROMANCE OF NAVIGATION.

By Captain B. W. Whall. Illustrated. 6s. (Sampson Low.)

Rear-Admiral "Broke" Evans, in a foreword to this volume, recalls that on his earliest Antarctic expedition the first two works of seamanship put into his hands by his skipper were Whall's "Handy Book of the Stars" and Todd and Whall's "Merchant Service Seamanship." He adds that they were the first textbooks of their kind he ever found attractive, and when in command himself on subsequent polar ventures, he saw to it that his ship's library possessed every work with which the author's name was associated. It is not surprising therefore that he should find Captain Whall's last book, described by himself as an attempt to tell of navigation ten thousand years ago, of the golden age of Henry the Navigator, of Columbus and his followers, of Pirates and Buccaneers, of the wonderfully swift sailing ships, tea-clippers and so forth, of his own time, as "beautifully written and of absorbing interest from cover to cover, besides promising to be a standard work." That is the view of an expert, and no layman is likely to question it. In the author's stirring narrative much curious lore is embedded, the account of the long forgotten Harrison's manufacture of the historic chronometers tested on Cook's second voyage, and rightly earning their inventor an Admiralty award of £20,000, being particularly interesting. Really remarkable photographs,

THE JOURNAL OF MAARTEN HARPERTZOON TROMP.

Anno 1639.

Translated and edited by C R BOXER 21s (Cambridge University Press)

To most English readers Admiral Van Tromp is connected with a single event in our history, and he himself is vaguely associated in their minds with a broom What sort of man was Tromp? What were his other exploits besides the burning of our ships in the Medway? And what were conditions like for the common sailor in the seventeenth century Dutch navy? These and many other interesting questions are answered by Mr C R Boxer, who for the first time has translated into English the "Journal" of Tromp for the fateful year 1639, and has introduced it with some admirable explanatory chapters The book, which is excellently produced and illustrated, not only throws much light upon the period, but reveals in Tromp himself, as Mr. Boxer says, "one of the noblest and most sympathetic figures in the richly crowded canvas of Holland's Golden Century."

THE TENDENCY OF RECENT FICTION.

By J. D. Beresford.

A FEW years ago, I and certain of my brother-novelists agreed that the novel in its popular form could hardly survive another generation. It may be that we were all suffering from the effects of the War, and the ban which at that time was laid by most publishers on war novels. Our themes were horribly restricted; the whole of modern life had been sharply divided into the two incompatible periods of "before" and "after" the great event, and it was exceedingly difficult to bridge them and still preserve the nice sense of continuity that was essential to the life-story of hero or heroine. Also, some of us had reached that stage in which we suffered from a kind of mental "stitch." We had expended our first energy and had not yet got our "second wind." I remember very clearly that in the years immediately following the War I often felt that for such non-combatants as myself there was little left to write about.

I am less pessimistic in this connection at the present time, but I still believe that there will be within the next few years, a strong reaction against the conventional type of fiction. As a literary form it has had a wonderful vogue; a hundred and ninety years, if we may date it for this purpose from the appearance of Samuel Richardson's "Pamela" in November, 1740. And in the course of that period it has exhibited almost every possible variety of subject and treatment. What more can be done with the neat, constructed story of the type that was so generally popular in the nineties and still provides the staple of the provincial lending library? Its plots have all been worked again and again, and the expert is able to forecast the development and climax with tedious certainty from the first two or three chapters. It may still have a public, quite a large public, among those who forget all about a book as soon as it is read, or are ingenuous enough to take every variation with a simple seriousness. But the time is coming, if it is not already come, when no author of any talent will dare to write a story of this kind, oppressed as he will be by the consciousness that his plot must certainly have been used before.

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. J. D. Beresford.

The main line of escape from this perplexity is the resort to an honest realism. The development of modern conditions moves so swiftly that raw material is always within our reach; and the younger generation prefers to read stories of its own times rather than of those "costume" periods behind the dread year of 1914 that so suddenly closed an era of history. If some young Dickens were to arise now and write of life as he sees it, using the big canvases of the Victorians, but speaking without their all too obvious repressions, he would find a ready welcome.

The nearest thing that we have had to this ideal in the last year or two was "The Good Companions" of Mr. J. B. Priestley, and if he can go on writing as well as that he is sure of a large audience. The quality that for me distinguishes this book from the mass of contemporary work is not so much the bonhomie and freshness which have been as highly praised as the honesty of his portraiture, but the fact that Priestley has gone straight to life for his characters. And I believe that the chief reason why so much modern fiction produces upon me an effect of almost unbearable ennui is that in an intolerably high proportion of novels the characters are the product of the authors' imagination, which means, in fact, that they come out of other books. I do not mean by this that Mr. Priestley has made close studies of each of his characters from some living model. The nature of his story precludes that possibility. But the people of "The Good Companions" appeared to me to come out of the author's experience rather than out of his quite extensive knowledge of books.

I would say the same of Lady Eleanor Smith's "Red Wagon." Now and again I recognised the influence of what we may call "conventional psychology," which means that the novelist is using the test of probability rather than that of experience in his or her characterisation. But Lady Eleanor's protagonist, Joe, must have been founded on observation, as must, also, her general account of circus life. This is of course a very unusual first novel and exhibits a high degree of literary attainment. The descriptions of English country are better than anything Mr. Priestley has given us. And apart from the interest of the story, the power of the writing would have guaranteed the author a warm reception. But for my present purpose it is the resemblance to life that is the chief recommendation.

Other recent novels that have had a reasonable success solely, or almost solely, on this account are "The Story of Button Hill" and "Time, Gentlemen, Time." In each of these cases the story, from the more or less sentimental, lending-library point of view, has little to recommend it. Both are stories of failure. In "Button Hill," the important love interest ends in a sudden and accidental tragedy, while disaster of a kind descends upon the Leeds suburb that is the true protagonist of the story. In "Time, Gentlemen, Time" there is not the ghost of a love interest and our whole attention is concentrated upon the increasing degradation of an idle, drunken solicitor and the miseries of his unhappy wife and children, none of whom is in any degree sentimentalised. Nevertheless these two novels come to the mind as counting among recent successes, almost entirely, I believe, because they produce an effect of being taken directly from life.

Another symptom that exhibits the same tendency is the astonishing vogue of war stories, whether presented as fiction, as in the case of "The Retreat," frankly autobiographical, as in Robert Graves's "Good-bye to All That," or a mixture of the two, as in Mr. Tomlinson's "All Our Yesterdays.' In this case, the form is evidently of small importance. What matters, apparently, to the educated reading public is that they should have the truth about these things. And the success on the stage of "Journey's End" is not due mainly to the desire to be harrowed, but to the desire to witness something that by the magic of Mr. Sherriff's fine art produces so powerful an effect of reality.

The other outstanding phenomenon in the world of fiction is provided by the excessive increase of detective novels, none of which presents the facts of familiar life nor even, in most cases, the persons. Nevertheless this development also has a bearing on my main contention, since it illustrates a tendency to find relaxation not in the unrealities of the typical novel but in a form of mental exercise and excitement. Moreover the craze for detective fiction must be ephemeral. There are only a limited number of plots, and although the variations may mount into thousands, they are not inexhaustible. The time will come, and that before very long, at the present rate of output, when anything approaching originality in the field will be impossible. We have had over seventy years of it, dating its inception from the publication of Emile Gaboriau's "L'Affaire Lerouge," and it is exhibiting the marks of senility, as all "genre" novels must in the course of time. I prophesy a tremendous slump in detective fiction within the next ten years.

Also within that period the already powerful influence of the cinema will have an increasing effect upon the book trade. The films are able to condense the plot of a detective story or a romantic novel into an hour and a half's entertainment, and present it in a form that appeals more directly to the attention of the crowd than the most highly skilled writing. And with the coming and perfecting of spoken dialogue to supplement the obvious deficiency of the silent films in competition with the novel, the scope of the cinema will be enlarged and include a type of book that has hitherto escaped this form of rivalry.

The full effect of this will not be felt until such time as the expert novelist finds himself ready to break away from tradition and experiment in a new medium. But I do not think that that time is many years distant. This new medium is a peculiarly fascinating one for the writer of stories, and provides facilities impossible upon the ordinary stage. And once a sufficiently large public has been educated up to the point of taking an interest in the film presentation of a form that depends less upon its action than upon its psychology, another and a very large class of printed fiction will feel the effects of urgent competition.

Wherefore my view of the tendency of the novel presents it as departing more and more from the classical and romantic forms that can be exhibited with greater effectiveness upon the screen, and developing a sterner though by no means necessarily a more depressing realism. The public that provides author and publisher with a means of livelihood will get its "stories" at the picture-palace, but will still go to printed fiction for an account of life lived in its own times. And if I were called upon to advise an earnest young novelist as to his choice of treatment and subject I should tell him to study contemporary life closely at first-hand, and to write of it as he saw it.

SILVER BOY. By Vance Joseph Hoyt. 7s. 6d. (Chapman & Hall.)

Here is a section from the life story of a silver fox out in the wilds of California. It is unwise to generalise when dealing with the ways of individual members of the Wild, but to one who has studied the English fox there are things done by this grey fox of Topanga which verge on the impossible. We may be wrong; it may be that Silver Boy was not only possessed of a greater reasoning power than is given to any English "sly 'un," but that he was an outstanding specimen of his own kind. He has certainly provided the author with opportunity to tell some interesting and exciting stories of wild life. The illustrations by Charles Livingstone Bull are, naturally, a delight, and make us regret yet again the death of our own Warwick Reynolds.

THE NOVEL IN MATTHEW ARNOLD'S POEMS.

By H. M. Walbrook.

THE "Marguerite" poems of Matthew Arnold, telling a love-story supposed to have been enacted in Switzerland, appeared for the first time in the volumes of his poetry published between the years 1849 and 1867, and will be found distributed over the Oxford edition of his collected poems edited by Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch under the following titles:

1. To my Friends who ridiculed a Tender Leave-taking
2. The Lake.
3. To Marguerite in returning a Volume of the Letters of Ortis
4. Absence
5. Parting
6. A Dream.
7. To Marguerite.
8. A Farewell

Matthew Arnold.
From the drawing by Sanders

They bear such an air of reality that many commentators have assumed their story of passion, disillusionment and parting to have been an actual experience of the author in his early post-Oxford days. Herbert Paul, in his essay on Matthew Arnold in the "English Men of Letters" series, expresses the opinion that the Marguerite of these poems "can hardly have been a creature of the imagination." Stopford Brooke, in his book, "Four Poets," says a little vaguely, "I do not like to think that the subject was invented," though he adds that there are passages in the lyrics which are "chill with that intellectual or moral analysis both of which are apart from love in its eager romantic mood." And last but not least, Dr Saintsbury, in his brilliant study of the poet, contents himself very properly with saying "It is not easy to decide, and it is perhaps in both senses impertinent to speculate, whether the Marguerite of the poems had any live original." Against all this we have the assurance of the poet's daughter, Lady Sandhurst, that her father always declared Marguerite to have been an imaginary person.

Indeed, the longer one reflects, not only on the poems but also on the poet, the more confidently one feels that we are in the presence here of another of those consummately-wrought love-stories which poets have been inventing for ages, and of which more than one have survived from that identical period of mid-Victorian literature. Is it credible that if this story of enchantment, jealousy and anguish were one of actual fact, Matthew Arnold of all men would have gone pouring it forth to the public during the early years of his perfectly happy married life? Or that, under any circumstances, he would have committed a Marguerite whom he had not only loved and lost but also, in the bitterness of disillusionment, harshly analysed, to the stray speculations of any stranger picking up the book? Surely a thousand times more probable is the assumption that here, once more, as in so many other instances, we have a poet's imagination working on an "airy nothing," and giving it "a local habitation and a name." As for the touches of realism in the lyrics, of which so much has been made, anyone can see that they are more than paralleled by those in Tennyson's "Maud," a dramatic masterpiece of the same period which none even of the "bright young things" of the present day, so far as I know, has declared to be the story of an actual experience in the life of the author.

Among the many lovely phantoms, then, with which our poets have peopled the imaginative domain, the Marguerite of Matthew Arnold assuredly takes her place:

> But who is this by the half-open'd door,
> Whose figure casts a shadow on the floor?
> The sweet blue eyes, the soft ash-coloured hair,
> The cheeks that still their gentle paleness wear,
> The lovely lips, with their arch smile that tells
> The unconquer'd joy in which her spirit dwells!

and again:

> 'Paint that lilac kerchief, bound

"Swiss chalets glitter'd on the dewy slopes
And from some swarded shelf, high up, there came Notes of wild pastoral music."
A Dream.

Half refus'd and half resign'd,
Murmuring, 'Art thou still unkind?'
Many a broken promise then
Was made new—to break again.
Ere the parting hour go by,
Quick, thy tablets, Memory!

"Paint those eyes, so blue, so kind,
Eager tell-tales of her mind:
Paint, with their impetuous stress
Of inquiring tenderness,
Those frank eyes, where deep doth lie
An angelic gravity.
Ere the parting hour go by,
Quick, thy tablets, Memory!"

And in all the English poetry of the nineteenth century is there a lyric more impassioned than that in which the writer of these lyrics compares parted lovers to islands separated from each other by a waste of ocean, and concludes with the beautiful lines:

"Who order'd that their longing's fire
Should be, as soon as kindled, cool'd?
Who renders vain their deep desire?
A God, a God their severance rul'd,
And bade betwixt their shores to be
The unplumb'd, salt, estranging sea."

Indeed the poems are exceptionally rich in verses with which the world is growing increasingly familiar as the years roll by. Take the following, for example, from the poem called "Absence":

"This is the curse of life: that not
A nobler, calmer train
Of wiser thoughts and feelings blot
Our passions from our brain,
But each day brings its petty dust
Our soon-chok'd souls to fill,
And we forget because we must
And not because we will"— and these from th poem called "A Farewell":

"I too have long'd for trenchant force
And will like a dividing spear;
Have praised the keen unscrupulous course
Which knows no doubt, which feels no fear;

"But in the world I learnt, what there
Thou too wilt surely one day prove,
That will, that energy, though rare,
Are yet far, far less rare than love"— with all the musical and touching quatrains that follow in the same poem.

During two holidays spent in the Canton of Berne in the summers of 1920 and 1921 I tried to locate the scene given to the story. I admit I started with a theory. From reading the poems I had already formed the opinion that the supposed Marguerite lived in the picturesque old Swiss town which the French call Thoune and the Germans Thun, and which is the scene, in Rousseau's "Confessions," of one of the few "tender episodes" in that remarkable book which breathe any sort of fragrance. The following will show how I prospered.

The Stockhorn Mountains beyond Thun.

"The frore mountain wall
Where the nich'd snowbed sprays doon
Its powdery fall."
Parting.

Readers of the Marguerite poems will have observed that the lover, on his way to the cottage of his beloved, passed "twin lakes," that her cottage was in a town on the river Aar, that near it were a "churchyard fair," a roofed bridge that spanned a stream, and a hill-side thinly sprinkled with farms; that a "frore mountain wall" was part of its prospect, and that the last part of the way to the cottage lay up a "steep street." All these topical references I duly discovered in and around the mediæval town I have named. The "twin lakes" are the lakes of Brienz and Thun, at the western extremity of which lies the town of Thun, and between which lies the fashionable town of Interlaken. The churchyard of Thun is not only "fair" in itself but looks down from its castle-crowned hill-top on one of the loveliest views in Europe, stretching away to the far-off silvery heights of the Blümlis Alp. The Stockhorn range, which almost overhangs the town, has all the look of a "mountain wall." Many of the streets round the castle and churchyard are steep. There is more than one neighbouring hill-side thinly sprinkled with farms. There is a "roofed bridge" (as a matter of fact there are two) across the river. And, last but not least, the river on which the town stands is the Aar.

On my return to London from the second of these holiday tours I communicated this identification in a short letter to the London Mercury, which appeared in that magazine in February, 1922; and so far from having been corrected by letter writers, my identification has been enthusiastically adopted by more than one as an original discovery of his or her own. These little things however are part of the comedy of life, and one smiles at them and goes on. This particular instance however becomes especially amusing when I reflect that perhaps when next I revisit Switzerland I shall discover that the little town of Brienz at the other end of the two lakes is equally identifiable as the scene of Marguerite and her story. There are in fact lines in "The Terrace at Berne" which suggest Brienz far more than Thun, so that after all the inquiry may still be open, though I hope that future commentators will be more careful than one very dogmatical writer who, in an essay on the subject, muddled up Thun and Interlaken and announced that the former town lay between the two lakes!

I once heard Henry James talk in his wonderful way of the novel which might be written on Browning's poem, "The Ring and the Book." Might not rather a fine novel also be based on these Marguerite poems and their story? The analysis of the two chief characters in the drama has been left fairly complete by the poet. We can all meet Marguerite in a Swiss valley as surely as we can meet Juliet in Verona. We can see her graceful figure standing by the moonlit lake as unmistakably as we can see Hamlet as a young student in Wittenberg, or Mr. Micawber swinging his cane along one of the narrow old streets of Canterbury. The comrades who chaffed the lover after witnessing an early parting from his enchantress are also there; and there is the friend called Martin who rowed with him one day along the river past the chalet balcony on which Marguerite, with her companion called Olivia, stood and waved greetings as they passed. The scene of the idyll may quite reasonably be set in one of the most picturesque old towns in Europe, and for its background stand the great mountains in their silent power and grandeur. Let any writer of romances who is reading these lines think it all over.

The Jungfrau from Interlaken.

"The Jungfrau snows look faint and far."

On the Terrace at Berne.

"It is easy," wrote a novelist to me lately, "to imagine the exquisite thing Henry James might have made of this theme of a highly cultured man of one race falling in love with a woman of the people of another. Or how ironically Lytton Strachey would treat the same theme, and what play he would make with the moralisings of the lover! And can one not also imagine a Victor Hugo let loose upon the story with all the thundering guns of his irrepressible romanticism!"

Yes, but I can also see something entirely different—a romance quite simple in its outline but very delicate and complex in its implications, calling for no irony whatsoever, and in which any sort of artillery would be entirely out of place. I can see the hero of such a story at work and at play in the schools and fields of Old Houses at Berne.

"Ten years!—And to my waking eye, Once more the roofs of Berne appear."

On the Terrace at Berne.

Oxford, a cheerful young optimist among his friends, ardently championing a "cause" (conceivably that of "Labour" in politics), prophesying largely "across the walnuts and the wine," and conspiring with a chosen few to bring about a better world. In short, a youth of much cricket, infinite tobacco, and immeasurable idealisms. Fired by the stories of a mountaineer, I can see him deciding for a summer in the Oberland, and the hazards (with rope and axe) of its challenging heights. I find him exalted as never before by the splendours and glooms of mountain and gorge and the "fearful joy" of the precipice and the crevasse. And, looking up one day to a chalet balcony or through the oleanders of a cottage garden, his eyes first meet those of Marguerite, and in that moment the book of life opens for him. He lays at her feet all he has—his generous chivalrous youth, his belief in goodness, his enthusiasm, his culture, his honour. His friends mock and warn him, but he brushes them aside. The girl herself is as frank as she is frail, and as the idyll deepens her lover is haunted by suspicions as by ecstasies, doubt dissolving not more surely in surrender than surrender is followed by shame. And through it all, around and above him tower the silent mountain heights; and in hours of anguish he lifts his eyes to them, and to the Great Mother whose ministers they are, and prays to be given something of their calm and strength. At last, dismayed and exhausted, he turns from "the place where passions reign," and from the enchantress who has been his bliss and his torment, and goes his way, leaving her to her fate, whatever that may be.

Are there not a drama and a setting here worthy of a novelist? He would, I admit, need to be something a good deal more (or should we say a good deal less) than a mere realist. One can imagine how such a story would flow from the pen, say, of an English admirer of M. Lion Feuchtwanger. The vision is not pleasant. Far more profitable is it to wonder in what form it would have emerged from such a pen as that which once gave us "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel." For it is the magic of the prose-poet that is wanted here. The mere ironist would spoil everything as surely as the mere realist—and perhaps the mere sentimentalist would make the worst muddle of all. But whereas to-day one hears so often the cry of the novelist, "A story! A story! My kingdom for a story!" one points to this one of Oxford, the Oberland and Marguerite as a donnée worth considering, and for which one day the world of romance readers might be grateful.

A FRENCH POET.*

By Francis Bickley.

In the poems of M. Sully-André Peyre there is none of the militancy or of the experimentalism which characterises so much modern French verse. He writes very simply, in traditional metres and rhyming lines. His prevalent mood is one of melancholy introspection, and one would be inclined to read many of his lyrics as directly personal statements were it not for his own specific warning:

> "Ne cherchez point à tout comprendre,
> Lorsque je m'enchante à chanter.
> J'ai voulu sur ma vie étendre
> Un voile ; il ne faut point l'ôter."

And again:

> "J'ai pris soin de céler dans une ombre voulue > La forme des mes voeux, le spectre de mes jours."

His poetry at any rate is nearly always subjective. Much of it seems as though it had been written in a dream, and it is full of a low-toned and very delicate music. It is in fact lyric at its purest, and in many of his simplest pieces there is an exquisite suggestiveness:

> "J'ai hanté de mon désir
> La ville morte ;
> J'ai vu l'horizon surgir
> A chaque porte.
>
> "Cette ville est de jadis,
> Étroite et close ;
> L'espace est un paradis.
> Mon désir n'ose.
> "Et je contiens, éperdu,
> Mon coeur rebelle,
> Entre le passé perdu
> Et l'heure belle."

M. Peyre has written poems in Provençal, the modern Provençal of which Mistral and the Félibres made a literary language, and others in English, giving in both cases a literal French translation. The English pieces are extremely interesting, and some of them of high poetic quality. There is nothing remarkable in M. Peyre's knowledge of our language; but the way in which he has caught its subtler rhythms is very remarkable indeed:

> "Humble Cinderella, pensive
> In the corner where the fire is,
> In the silence thy desire is
> As its burning core intensive."

And here is a poem which, though there is a touch of foreignness in the actual phrasing, is singularly English both in temper and in music:

> "The lad who sits all day and evening long,
> Among the thorn and the thistle,
> Is not a shepherd, folks,
> And neither flute nor penny whistle
> To his calm dream belong.
>
> "He listens to the silence of the hours,
> And yours is not his computing
> Of time and distance, folks ;
> He hearkens not your futile fluting.
> God alone knows his powers."

The verses written by a poet in a tongue not his own are usually not much more than ingenious exercises. M. Peyre's English poems are true, if not great, poetry.

THE BEAUTIFUL YEARS.

By Henry Williamson. 7s. 6d. (Faber & Faber.)

This is a new and revised edition of Mr. Williamson's first novel, which has been out of print for some years. Since the publication of the original edition the author in his subsequent books, "Tarka the Otter" and "The Pathway," has amply fulfilled the brilliant promise contained in such lines of lyric beauty as "The Seasons had passed with invisible feet across the savannas of infinity." "The Beautiful Years" is the first of the four books making the work called "The Flax of Dream"—the history of William Maddison from childhood through boyhood and youth to early manhood, of which "The Pathway" is the final volume. The present book deals with Maddison's earlier years and with sympathetic understanding Mr. Williamson portrays the mind of a boy unfolding beneath the benign influence of nature and the sharper realities of life. In his description of the country-side, the varied and ever new wonder of the changing seasons, Mr. Williamson holds his own with even such a master as Richard Jefferies. To read this book is to know again the ineffable, transitory loveliness of a world fresh and unspoiled, revealed only to those who have loved nature in the innocence of childhood days.

MR. BIRRELL'S ESSAYS.*

By Richard Flecknoe.

IT is just forty-six years since Mr. Birrell's first book of essays, "Obiter Dicta," made its appearance; and, if one had time, it would be interesting to look up the records and find how many other books published in 1884 are still so alive as this, and destined to go on living. There was a second series of "Obiter Dicta" in 1887; less than a score of essays go to the making of both volumes. We have since had from Mr. Birrell a few biographies—of Charlotte Brontë, Hazlitt, Marvell and Frederick Locker-Lampson—and four other volumes of essays, including "More Obiter Dicta" six years ago. It is not a long list, but many that are longer will not last so long, and more books might have been added to the number only that, to say nothing of his preoccupations as a barrister, for a period of nearly thirty years Mr. Birrell led a Parliamentary life and "to politics gave up what was meant for mankind"—for the kind of man, that is, who would sooner sit at home and read than go out and listen to transitory speeches. However, in a day when most authors write far too much, and no mortal can hope to live long enough to read all the new books that are worth reading, it is no faint praise when you can say of any that he leaves you wishing he had written more.

Mr. Augustine Birrell.
From a drawing by Walter Tittle.

Like all essayists who matter, Mr. Birrell has that distinctive quality which we call personality. When he sits down to write he does not seem to feel under the necessity, as some do, of saying to himself, "Go to! we must be literary!"—he writes as easily and unaffectedly as one would write a letter to an intimate; he is at ease in Zion, at home among books. He does not approach them with the awe or self-importance of the raw student, nor with the cold detachment of the scientist tackling a difficult experiment, but comfortably, as one who knows them and counts them among his friends. When he criticises he does not adopt toward the author the complacently godlike attitude that some schoolmasters adopt toward boys they are trying to educate. He gossips about a book and about its writer from an apparently inexhaustible fund of knowledge, with a shrewdly critical insight and a genial wit and humour and irony that play round writer and book and reveal the best and worst of both more surely than they are ever revealed by the over-solemn who, by pretentiously analytical methods, discover in the character and works of an author fantastic subtleties and significances that often have no existence except in the imagination of the analyst.

Mr. Birrell has never practised that sort of conjuring, and there are no such pseudo-scientific exhibitions in his new book, "Et Cetera." His books are linked each to each by the natural charm of the wise and whimsical, very personal note that runs through all of them. He has always had too keen a sense of humour to be pontifical; he retains in his latest the urbane acuteness of judgment, mellowness of opinion and spontaneity of self-expression that characterised those first essays that made him popular. Some of the papers here are reprinted reviews, but they combine the business of criticism with the pleasantly informal discursiveness of the essay. For example, the review of a new and an old book on Nathaniel Hawthorne starts with a personal recollection:

"Few things mark so relentlessly the flight of Time as it passes unconsciously over our heads as when it is suddenly brought home to old men how long it was since they first learnt to love a favourite author. The dates of publication of the two volumes named at the top of the page, separated as they are from each other by nearly half a century, and yet dealing with affection and real distinction with the same subject-matter, serve to remind me that it is now more than seventy years ago since the day in 1856 when, trying hard to keep step with my Father whilst walking down Castle Street, Liverpool, he bent down to me and whispered in my ear, 'Keep your eye open, for the author of "The Wonder Book" will pass us in a moment.' How hard I stared at Hawthorne as he went by! He was the first author I had ever seen, and though since that happy day I have encountered many of the breed, he still lives in my memory as the handsomest of them all; nor has he lost favour in my sight as an author, though no longer of one wonder-book but of many."

Again, he begins a review of Thomas Love Peacock's works with another casual remembrance:

"We have always counted it one of the happiest chances of our literary life when, one dusky November afternoon in 1869, we captured for the easy equivalent of eighteenpence, in Messrs. Reeves & Turner's second-hand bookshop, then at the west end of Fleet Street, nearly opposite old Temple Bar and close by Groom's coffee-house, where junior members of the legal profession were accustomed to take their milder kinds of refreshment, and Carter's hairdressing establishment, the Fifty-seventh volume of Bentley's 'Standard Novels,' containing 'Headlong Hall,' 'Nightmare Abbey,' 'Maid Marian' and 'Crotchet Castle,' with a wonderful Preface by their then almost unknown author, dated 1837."

* "Et Cetera." By Augustine Birrell. 7s. 6d. (Chatto & Windus.)

I remember Reeves and Turner's, but my conviction is that, though not far from Groom's, their shop was on the other side of the road, and I remember buying there for a shilling Francis Adams's once much discussed but now no longer remembered "Songs of the Army of the Night." Possibly my memory is at fault; it makes no difference anyhow to your enjoyment of the essay on Peacock. Other essays in the book are on Boswell and Lockhart: on Wyclif, Bunyan, Whitefield and Dr. Doddridge; on "Clergymen and Churchwardens in the Eighteenth Century"; on Richardson's first book of Letters, which was "the birthplace of 'Pamela' and 'Clarissa'"; there is one giving "A Few Words of Warning to Would-be Autobiographers"; and one which young reviewers might read with a certain amount of profit on "The Province of the Reviewer Determined."

In this last, after endeavouring to trace reviewing back to its source and discover the father of the gentle art, Mr. Birrell considers the way in which reviewing used to be conducted and the way in which it is conducted to-day, when "the output of new publications can only be compared to a huge tidal wave daily or weekly breaking upon an Editor's Table." He is forbearing with the youthful reviewer who may be clever though not yet sufficiently well informed, but he insists upon honesty:

"If the Reviewer is careful to confine himself to those aspects of the book on which he feels justified in expressing an opinion, and eschews as an atrocious crime the guilt of attributing to himself the knowledge he has only derived from reading the book, he will seldom have any need to blame himself for undertaking a job beyond his capacity. The Youthful Reviewer . . . may be permitted to remember that even a learned man may be benefited by the criticisms of a quicker wit."

He is tolerantly satirical in drawing a distinction between "two classes of Reviewers, those who review without reading and the duller fellows who for want of any other occupation are glad to read through the books they are called upon to review:

"The difference is great, and one that never fails to be noticed by the Authors of the books, who may often be heard complaining first of the Reviewers who do not read the books but write out of their own heads, and secondly of those who read the books but are too dull to understand them."

It is natural for an author to assume that the reviewer who praises him is an able critic, a man of discernment, and that the reviewer who fails to appreciate him is either malicious or incompetent. So it always has been and ever will be. But Mr. Birrell, perhaps because he is a reviewer as well as an author, tempers justice with mercy and remains genially tolerant to the end, saying as his last word on this subject:

"The habitual Reviewer of new books and reprints is not very likely to be endowed with genius; but if he is an honest workman who loves justice, and eschews malice, and has added a dash of humility to his constitution, and possesses, by grace of Heaven, a drop of that precious Acid enabling him to discern by the ring of the coin whether it comes from the Royal Mint or from a den in the East End, he may, after a while, earn a right to be considered a Reviewer 'properly so called.'"

Editors are a long-suffering tribe, yet I doubt whether many of them would, nowadays, open their doors to prentice reviewers of the kind that Mr. Birrell handles so sympathetically; but that does not discount the truth of what he says of them; and from this and the other essays in "Et Cetera" they may learn how to enjoy the books they criticise, and how the best, neat-handed criticism can not only find fault without being offensive, but can be none the less sound, searching and well informed for being also good entertainment.

THE ABBOTSFORD LETTER-BOOKS.*

By Dr. W. S. Crockett.

THE publication of Sir Walter Scott's private Correspondence is an event of outstanding importance in the sphere of literature. As was said in the April issue of THE BOOKMAN, this has been rendered possible through the patriotic spirit of Mr. Hugh Walpole, who purchased the Letters at Sothebys' and thus secured them for preservation in Scott's own country, their ultimate destination being the National Library of Scotland, which already possesses many Scott documents of paramount interest, among them the holographs of "Waverley" and "Redgauntlet" and also that of "Marmion."

Sir Walter's own letters are legion, far exceeding those published by David Douglas in 1894. They are constantly cropping up at literary sales, and very many are still in private hands. The proposal to issue a fresh volume in connexion with the centenary of Scott's death in 1932 is a commendable one, but after even that has been done, only a tithe of his personal correspondence can have been given to the world.

The collection just published is concerned with letters addressed to Scott from all sorts and conditions of people and upon every variety of topic—some of rare, of extraordinary interest, others not so interesting. Sir Walter preserved the best of these, in number about 6,000, and in many ways the most remarkable correspondence to one author in the annals of literature. With the assistance—on the advice indeed—of his amanuensis, George Huntly Gordon (the same for whom he wrote two published Sermons), Scott had this mountainous mass overhauled, assorted, endorsed, annotated, and finally bound together within twenty-three bulging quartos. "They will be one day curious," he wrote in his Journal (August 8th, 1827), "I propose to have them bound up, to save trouble. It is a sad task; how many dead, absent, estranged, and altered! . . . It will be a great job done. But, in the meanwhile, it interrupts my work sadly. Still, however, it might have been long enough ere I got a confidential person like Gordon to arrange these confidential papers. They are all in his hands now."

The present selection, so excellently and discriminately edited and furnished with neat introductory notices by Mr. Wilfred Partington, is almost sure to have its successor. For out of the 6,000, less than 300 are dealt with here, and readers cannot but clamour for more, packed with such good things as is this, let us hope, initial instalment. The letters range in point of time from the French Revolution to the Reform Bill—from Scott's early manhood to the year preceding his death—from his first appearance in print, through the glorious succession of the Waverleys, to the final break-up and the comparative failure of "Count Robert." They came, as has been said, from all sources. It is of course impossible to indicate their several origins, or even to detail the best of them, but each has its value, since everything connected with Sir Walter Scott must be said to have a value. Naturally the great contemporary poets are conspicuous (Gullivers among some Lilliputians)—Wordsworth and Southey, James Hogg and Tom Campbell, and although Byron is represented by a single letter, this is now printed in full, differing slightly perhaps, but importantly, from the published epistle as given by Prothero and Coleridge. Wordsworth writes in playfully reflective mood, recalling his and Dorothy's delightsome days with Scott on the Border. His language breathes a deep affection for the bard of "Marmion." That verse-romance he read "with lively pleasure," while at the same time he wished the end had been more in accord with his own "notions of composition." There is a curious dispute over a supposed visit of all three (Scott and the Wordsworths) to Anna Seward at Lichfield, but only once was Scott a guest of the "Swan"—in 1807, though Miss Wordsworth maintained they had seen her in company with Scott, an impression William had difficulty in convincing her to be entirely wrong. Southey discourses amongst other matters on the Laureateship, for which Scott recommended him, having declined the honour for himself. The Shepherd's letters are, as usual, sui generis. The foolish man sometimes quarrelled with his best friend, but had the sense to eat humble pie in the end. I do not find (bating its brevity) a finer letter to Scott amidst the troubles of 1826 than Hogg then wrote. He was conceited enough to imagine his "Brownie" as on a par with if not better than "Old Mortality," but Scott treated his Ettrick confrère with a constant kindness, although to Lockhart he was a sort of bête noire, the Boar of the Forest, uncouth, ill-mannered, and worse, since Lockhart declared that Hogg had villainously defamed Scott's memory in his "Domestic Manners," a little book which really reveals the laird of Abbotsford at his best, if there are in it things one would rather had left unsaid. It is a matter for regret that while correspondence of less note was found among Hogg's papers after his death, he had not kept Scott's letters. The probability is that in many of them there was wise and generous counsel which Hogg so much needed, however unpalatable for the Shepherd, who did not brook criticism upon his own performances and most of all hated to be "talked to" about his tragically wrecking habits and improvidences.

Sir Walter Scott.
From a painting by Landseer in National Portrait Gallery.

Two sections are devoted to the prose romances—the mystery surrounding their authorship, and suggestions sent as possible grist to the Waverley mills. As some of this correspondence is dated long antecedent to the Avowal of 1827, it is another proof that small doubt existed as to the fons et origo of the great series. Scott's Canadian brother, Tom, was spoken of as either whole or part author. But aside from the supposed few who were "in the know," most of Scott's intimates were well aware of their source. The servants at Abbotsford all knew. In Melrose and Galashiels it was an open secret. To a grand uncle of my own, Scott constantly made requests for provincial words and phrases and local singularities, long prior to the crash of 1826, which circumstance in itself effectively solved the problem, if there was any problem to solve. In 1820, for instance, we find "a shepherd" sending to Scott a long disquisition on the Fairies of Ettrickside, stirred thereto by his perusal of "The Monastery" which had just been published. Mr. Partington may be interested to know that this anonymous shepherd was William Hogg, a brother of James, and a man in some respects quite as remarkable. Another section deals with the disaster of 1826. Here are finely filial letters from Scott's elder son and daughter; heartening sympathy from Joanna Baillie, a supremely touching communication from James Ballantyne (sadly maligned by Lockhart), and amazing monetary proposals by Robert Cadell for new novels.

Almost every page of this Private Letter-Book reads like a fascinating romance. Figures familiar and less familiar appear throughout. Here is the ever facetious Kirkpatrick Sharpe with his spirited quips and sallies, inimitable in word-limning as in pencil caricature. Lady Abercorn amuses with her rich banter. Lockhart of course is here with a plethora of London gossip, and never unmindful of his own temporal advantages, so much so that Scott, who could read his son-in-law like a book, wrote this illuminating commentary by just two strokes of his pen—£ockhart. There is plenty of scandal too, naked and unashamed, marriages made and unmade, mad adventures and liaisons—Buonaparte's and many more. Surely the most impertinent proposition ever made to Sir Walter was by Sir John Sinclair ("empty pate") who suggested that Scott (four months a widower) should wed the Duchess-Dowager of Roxburghe! Lady Anne Barnard merits a section to herself. Her authorship of "Auld Robin Gray" she confessed to Scott in 1823. Of the suppressed "Lays of the Lindsays," contrary to a statement on page 212, Scott, as the editor, did preserve a set of the unbound sheets, and they are still at Abbotsford, another copy being in the National Library at Edinburgh.

And so the diversified procession moves along, rattling in their ranks amidst grave things and gay in this always exhilarating and often surprising record. Tom Moore and Allan Cunningham, George Crabbe and Charles Lamb, G. P. R. James and William Godwin, Joseph Ritson and Samuel Rogers, Francis Jeffrey and Wilson Croker, William Hayley and Fenimore Cooper, Daniel Terry and Stewart Ross, "Bobby" Peel and Robert Chambers, all say their say. There is something about the artists who came into Scott's life, and the bluestockings of his circle—Maria Edgeworth, Lady Louisa Stuart, Mrs. Hughes and others, provide their quota of wit and wisdom. Admirably arranged, with a sprightly "Letter to the Reader" from its sole begetter, Mr. Walpole, attractive illustrations and a copious index, the book may yet be acclaimed as perhaps the most notable of the year. Far and wide it must find its way wherever the name of Scott is known and revered. And that is everywhere. Such a selection cannot fail to convey something of the wide generosity and nobility of one whom Wordsworth called "the whole world's darling."

Morritt of Rokeby was not James (page 18) but John, and his surname, printed as Sa*u*rey, should be Sa*w*rey. Hogg's Highland Journal (page 86) has been reprinted. The mystery of the Shakespeare referred to at page 41, was fully expiscated in an article of mine in THE BOOKMAN for December, 1921.

PONTIFICAL PROSE.

By WILFRID GIBSON.

THE history of this book* is curious and interesting. An old leather-bound volume of manuscript maxims and reflections was found by a dealer, stowed away, so far as he can remember, in a piece of old furniture picked up in the neighbourhood of Twickenham or Teddington. On the title page the words "A Pope. Twikeam" are inscribed in a different hand; and there is no clue to indicate the authorship. The manuscript has been examined by experts, and they will make no more definite pronouncement than to say cautiously that the handwriting of the main manuscript may be that of Pope. So much Lord Gorell explains to us in his foreword (surely the introduction to an eighteenth century book should be labelled a "preface" rather than a "foreword"!), and I suppose that an adequately equipped reviewer should be able to decide the question of authorship out of hand; but I, being neither a literary archæologist nor a sleuth of caligraphy, do not mean to rush in where experts fear to tread. I will only commit myself so far as to say that, if Pope were indeed the author of this work, Pope, even as the rest of us, had his dull moments. Not that the book contains no wise sayings: it is indeed stuffed with worldly wisdom, stodgy with it, I might say; but the style lacks distinction, and even the maxims and reflections of a Pope, written in prose, without the impulse of metre to carry them off and with no rhymes to clinch them, would be comparatively ineffectual.

Perhaps however I ought to admit that I have little taste for a book of aphorisms at any time. The commonplace-book of even a distinguished author yields me little delight. Aphorisms, like proverbs, are apt to be either platitudes or half-truths, and so either bore me or provoke me to contradiction. Pronouncements that might be impressive if they occurred casually in the passages of an essay, when set out pretentiously in separate paragraphs, and with a portentous array of capital letters, are apt to appear foolish and false—daws tricked out in peacocks' feathers. And the aphorisms in this book are even without the peacocks' feathers of wit to dazzle the reader; while they are not epigrammatic enough in expression to startle him to attention with a resonant click. As I read them with mild interest, I found myself murmuring again and again: "How true!" or "True—but . . .", which perhaps sufficiently indicates my lack of interest. But then sermons have always bored me; and sententious literature seems to me to be a contradiction in terms. I always prefer the author who leaves me to draw my own conclusions. Oh, yes! I know well enough that some of the greatest names in literature can be arrayed against me; but does not that prove my case? I too am indulging in aphorisms, which are of necessity half-truths.

Still, it is only just to give some examples of the quality of the book. The manuscript is divided into sections, each dealing with a different theme; and to be fair to the anonymous author I will not pick and choose, but will quote the opening aphorism of the first three sections and the closing aphorism of the last three sections:

"The greatest Perfection of Human Nature is to do Good to others; Reason, without this, wd. but degrade us."

"There is no Law, nor indeed does there need to be one against Ingratitude; because all Nature is point blank against it."

"Praise & Censure tell us what we are in the Opinion of other People, not what we really are in our Selves."

"It is not often considered, but perhaps one of the greatest Misfortunes that attend Mankind is not to Dare to deny: it requires either a good Education or a Superior Fortune to be able to do it."

"A Man may be Good in any State or Condition of Life, & cannot be better in a Greater."

"Who can blame Fortune for bestowing her gifts upon the unworthy when she's blind?"

I can only add the cliché that those who like this sort of thing will like this book very much; and that doubtless the authorship of the manuscript will prove a fine bone of contention for those who love a literary dog-fight.

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

MAY, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 14th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the seven Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope:

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

That they may be available also to Overseas Competitors, Competitions I and II will be the same each month until further notice, but the subjects for all the other Competitions may each month be changed.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS.; the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best drawing illustrating any book title mentioned in this Number.

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best patchwork poem, in twelve lines, to make sense and to rhyme, each line being taken from a different poet, thus:

Why all this toil for triumphs of an hour? (YOUNG)
Life's a short summer, man is but a flower (JOHNSON)
By turns we catch the fatal breath and die (POPE)
The cradle and the tomb, alas, how nigh! (PRIOR)

V.—HALF A GUINEA for the best crossword puzzle (12-square across and 12 down), introducing the names of well-known authors.

VI.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author and Publisher at head of each review.

VII.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR APRIL.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to W. T. Coghlan, 16, Fontenoy Street, Dublin, for the following:

WHEN I AM OLD.

When I am old, and my good days are o'er,
And life and love are less than dreams of dreams,
And my soul sits within the burnt-out core
Of its own ghost, and God Himself but seems:

When, child, you speak, and I know not your name,
And look up dazed, and wonder who you are,
And care no longer if you praise or blame,
Or whether 'twixt us two 'tis peace or war:

Have patience with the unremembering eyes,
Which once their love-thirst from your own did slake;
Think how this heart once thought it Paradise
To burn itself to ashes for your sake!

We also select for printing:

THE CONTEMPLATIVE.

She sits so still you would not guess
The thousand hurrying thoughts that stir
Her silence, in that busy press
Where all pass by, not seeing her.

Her heart is such a crowded place,
Where troubled spirits find a rest,
She sees each wound, she bathes each face,
She holds their sorrows in her breast.

The darkened heart that dare not pray,
The soul whose road is black with pain;
The sister, falling by the way,
Her prayers restore to peace again.

She makes their bitter griefs her own,
She takes their sorrow for her part;
Strange sins that she has never known
Rankle like swords in her pure heart.

Unknowing and uncaring, they Find joy through her most bitter loss;
Waking to light, while day by day
She kneels in shadow by the Cross.

(J. Kilmeny Keith, 69, Marine Parade, Worthing.)

III.—THE PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best note on the Rarest or Oldest Book I Possess and Why I Value It is awarded to Captain William Jaggard, Rose Bank, Stratford-on-Avon, Warwickshire, for the following:

Owning four early printed books, equally rare (inasmuch as merely one of each occurs in Pollard & Redgrave's "Short-title Catalogue," I choose these Elizabethan essays as of widest appeal:

> "Two guides to good life; Genealogy of vertue and anthomy of sinne. Liuely displaying the worth of one and vanity of the other. Printed by W. Iaggard, 1604." 8vo.

This anonymous little tome may be the pen-work of Sir Francis Bacon, because of its style, brief crisp sentences, concentrated sapience and quaint conceits. Failing Verulam, its most likely author is Bishop Joseph Hall, an unfairly neglected author, of vigorous pith and expression.

> Preface begins: "There is no mettal so pure but hath some drosse, and therefore, gentle reader, I will not excuse this booke of faults; such as it is, I lay it open . . . wishing thee rather with the bee to gather hounye, then with the spider poyson; not that the flowers of this poore garden include any such danger, but that the mind of the beholder, if not rightly tempered, may, like the spider, turne that to poison, which a better disposition digests for honny.'

I value it for originality, rarity and ancestral production.

We also select for printing:

The rarest and perhaps the most important book in my small collection of rare books is a proof copy of Robert Browning's "Men and Women" in one cloth-bound volume, and printed on thinner paper than the first edition, which was issued in two volumes. Both the proof copy and the published volumes bear the same date, 1855; but comparison discloses extensive variations in the two texts. By actual count there are more than five hundred verbal alterations from the proof copy. It happened a few years ago, when I obtained the little book from an auction in a remote country house, that I showed it to a well-known English bibliographer. He was so interested in the volume that I let him have it for careful examination. In a few weeks he brought it to me, together with a copy of the first edition, in which he had noted not only all the textual differences, but literally thousands of differences in punctuation. To-day this slim volume should fetch any price in the book mart. But I should be very reluctant to part with it. Of all nineteenth century poets Browning is, I think, the one who excites most interest; and nowadays his earlier books and first editions are much sought after. Therefore my copy of "Men and Women" has a double interest for me as for all bibliophiles and book-collectors.

(M. T. Coghlan, 16, Fontenoy Street, Dublin.)

The oldest, as it is also the rarest book I possess is a "Breeches" Bible, bound with prayer book and dated 1609. The prayer book has been so well used that the margins are almost negligible, and the print nearly unreadable, and some pages are torn; but I can still decipher the prayers for "King James, Queene Anne, Prince Henry, and all their Royall Progenie." However it was the Apocrypha that most enthralled me, its quaint old tales, and the horrors of the martyrdom of the Maccabees had a fearful interest for me when I first read them. I can visualise the wonderful scenes through which this old book has passed. Plague, and Fire—indeed there is a tiny burn on one of its pages, which I have always felt convinced was caused by a spark from the burning of London! It has some quaint little engravings, the "Vision of Ezekiel" is quite marvellous, and there is a Map of the Garden of Eden. It has Family Prayers, and the Psalms "collected into English Meetre" with music; in fact a most comprehensive volume. Not intrinsically valuable, although I value it, because it seems to bring me nearer to those bygone folk.

Mr. William Hallatt, author of "Suppression" (Skeffington).

(Ada F. Strike, 38, Harrow Road, West Worthing.)

One of the rarest books I possess is an old-fashioned three-volume novel, published in 1818. The authoress is Ann Riley, whose husband, S. W. Riley, was a travelling actor very famous in his day, and whose experiences, real and imaginary, are set forth in his book, "The Itinerant." This three-volume novel deals with the love story of "Fanny Fitz-York, Heiress of Tremorne." It is of no particular value, I suppose, and is the usual kind of story popular in the early nineteenth century; a beautiful young heroine, a manly hero and a deeply-dyed villain. There are gay scenes at balls and assemblies and, to add excitement, a highway robbery, but the charm of the book lies in its quaint diction and its amusingly stilted conversation. The volumes belonged to my grandfather, who evidently found the 'Itinerant" and his wife very interesting personalities, for I find innumerable references to them in his own private journals. So perhaps for me the chief value of the book is in its family associations.

(Mabel Dronsfield, 17, Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square, London, W.1.)

The rarest, though not by any means the oldest book I have in my possession is a copy of "Poems by Two Brothers," which is the earliest book containing verses by Alfred Tennyson. Alfred was eighteen and Charles was twenty when J. & J. Jackson, printers, of Louth, the market town nearest to the Lincolnshire home of the Tennysons, arranged with the brothers to publish a selection of their poems, and actually paid them, in cash and books, the equivalent of twenty pounds for the doubtful privilege! A few poems of the eldest brother, Frederick, were included. What induced the Jacksons to enter into this unbusinesslike engagement does not appear. The book was published in two sizes—an ordinary edition, priced at 5s., and a large paper edition at 7s. There was no high degree of merit in any of the poems, and none of them has been included in the authorised editions of the writings of the poets. In later years Tennyson spoke of his large share in the book as "early rot." Alfred and Charles (Frederick was at Cambridge) celebrated the day of publication by hiring a carriage and driving to the seashore, fourteen miles away, where they "shared their triumph with the winds and the waves."

(John P. Coghlan, 16, Fontenoy Street, Dublin.)

The oldest book I possess is "The Queen's Closet Opened, or The Pearle of Practice," printed by J. C. for Nath. Brook, at the Angel in Cornhill, 1665. This little book contains two hundred and fifty prescriptions by all sorts of eminent people. I value it because, living in a modern doctor's house, the prescriptions of three hundred years ago amuse me greatly. They are so extravagant and grotesque that it seems strange that anyone should have attempted to concoct them. Here is one: "Take the black tips of crabs claws when the Sun enters Cancer, which is every year on the eleventh day of June. Add the loines and legs of an old Coney, a fleshy running Capon, the flesh of a leg of mutton, four young chickens, twelve larks, the yolks of twelve eggs, and as much Treacle and Muscadine to cover them all. Distil over a moderate fire. Take two or three spoonfuls when need is, by itself, or with Ale, Beer, or Wine mingled with Sugar, and by the Grace of God you will find it good against Dropsie, Palsie, Ague and Spleen."

Mr. Charles Hand, author of "Denis Delivers the Goods" (Cecil Palmer).

(Eva Hope Wallace, Breadalbane, Castleford, Yorks.)

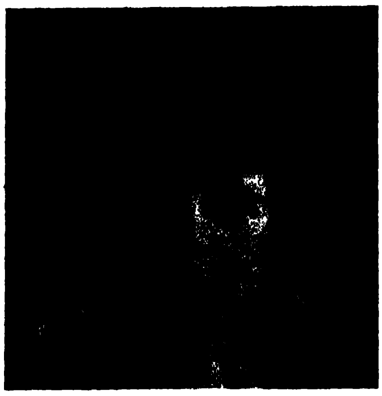
There are several other notes we would like to print, if space permitted. We select for special commendation the replies by Violet Carrall (Rotherham), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), E. Sweatman (Reading), John E. Woods (Coventry), Mrs. E. G. Elton (London, S.W.), Mrs. Annie M. Severs (Scarborough), Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport), L. Bruce (Ashford), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), M. K. Whitfield (Cirencester), Eleanor L. Sinclair (Belfast), Alfred O. George (Minehead), M. Luckham (Poole), B. A. Billings (Manchester), Fred W. Flear (Harpenden), Margaret A. B. Jones (Loughton), Edith M. Walker (Bournemouth), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), W. Mockford (Biggleswade), Aileen M. J. Parker (Mitcham).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best humorous prose paraphrase of any well-known poem is awarded to C. C. Fraser, 19, Falkner Square, Liverpool, for the following:

LA BELLE DAMS SANS MERCI. (KEATS).

(Scots Version.)

"Whit wye are ye hangin' roon' sae disjaskit-like? Ye're no lookin' weel ava, ava. Ye're sweatin', an' ye've lost a' yer fine colour—kin' o' peely-wally." "I met a bonnie wumman, wi' lang hair, doonby, an' I gied her a lift on my powny, an' she sang tae me—aye, 'twas gran'!—an' I gied her a puckle gowans, an' she gied me some sweeties, an' telt me in a kin' o' foreign tongue that she lo'ed me weel, in fac' that she was doonricht silly aboot me. An' she kept on pechin'. An' efter yon we had a wee bit nap, an' I had a bad dream—a rael nichtmare aboot kings an' sodgers. They was skraighin' wi' their big mooths wide open, an' tellin' me' that the bonnie wumman had gotten a haud o' me, an' wudna let me gang lowse. An' noo here am I hauf starvit, daun'erin' roon' in the bitter cauld. It's rael depressin' weather, guid kens, an' there's no even a bluidy craw aboot. But I'm waitin' on the wumman a' the time. Aye, it's gay dreich waitin'."



We also select for printing:

LOCKSLEY HALL. (TENNYSON).

"Comrades, I want to meditate upon the grandeur that once was Locksley Hall, but if you get bored and want to push on before I've finished meditating you can blow a peal, or whatever it is you do blow, upon the bugle horn. I want to think about the owner of the Hall who married my cousin Amy. She was once engaged to me, or if we weren't actually engaged, at any rate we were walking out together; then that rich young nincompoop came along and proposed to Amy, and she accepted him merely because he was rich and because her papa told her to. She couldn't possibly have loved him after loving me! Then as the man is such a clown, Amy is certain to become a female clown before long. Well, as I can't have Amy I'll marry some savage woman! happy notion! and we'll have lots of pretty, dusky children! they'll dive and run and play with goats, and hurl their lances in the sun! I jolly well hope a thunderbolt will fall on Locksley Hall and blot out all its inhabitants, and anyhow I'm off!"

(Alfred O. George, "Ingmire," Warden Road, Minehead, Som.)

Miss Myrtle Johnston, author of "Relentless" (John Murray).

Longfellow's "Excelsior," "Village Blacksmith" and "Wreck of the Hesperus"; Tennyson's "Brook"; Wordsworth's "We Are Seven," and Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner" had the largest popularity with competitors, and we highly commend the humorous paraphrases by Emily Davis (Dublin), G. Pitt (London, N.), Marie Joyce (London, N.W.), M. K. Whitfield (Cirencester), Margaret A. B. Kones (Loughton), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), John A. Bellchambers (Highgate), J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), Mrs. E. M. Hakim (Edgware), John P. Coghlan (Dublin), W. R. Dunstan (Lewes), L. Bruce (Ashford), Sydney J. Spedding (Bolton), Violet Carrall (Rotherham), S. Barrington McClean (Glasgow), John E. Woods (Coventry), B. A. Billings (Manchester), E. Sweatman (Reading), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), Ada F. Strike (West Worthing), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.).

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best twenty-four lines of verse intelligibly introducing the largest number of book titles is awarded to Mary R. Taylor, "Zayat," Cawdor Crescent, Dunblane, Perthshire, for the following:

The Full Moon and The Magic of the Stars above her Gave The Romantic Lustre which was shed
Upon The Mill where sweet Pat met her lover.
Out of the Depths they sighed—few words were said;
The Strength of Lovers speech can not discover;
The Secret Pearls of silence stand in better stead.

Turn Back the Leaves and look upon what went before—Encumbrances to Falkland's Choice there were;
But love's White Flame at last them all outwore.
The Nymph at Bay, The Fighting Spirits share
Of Dominance soon failed, her heart was sore.
Fire Kindleth Fire, a Retribution just and fair.

"O Ladybird, sweet Honey-Pot," he murmured low,
"These Thieves' Nigh. cannot last; O marry me!
Let us not be but Ships That Pass, and so Lost in Grey Seas ever apart to be,
Bidding Farewell to Paradise below."
She said: "Housewifery I must try, and then we'll see—

Towards a New Education I must make my way;
The School for Wives will teach what I would learn.
Wind From the West brings Dawn; I cannot stay."
Chapter the Last of A True Story you discuss?
A Special Providence upon them lay;
Gamblers in Happiness, they wed; nor was Fate stern.
(32 titles).

We also select for printing.

DEADMAN'S BAY.

As Ships That Pass with Painted Veils
Out of the Depths* of Deadman's Bay,
The Ship of Truth* unfurls white sails
And for Grey Seas doth sail away.

The Full Moon rises bright and clear
Amidst The Magic of the Stars,
And like Apollo, The Charioteer,
Scatters afar her golden bars.

The Doomed Five* within the hold
Turn Back the Leaves* of their despair;
The Mystery Man* did us withhold
From ent'ring into Providence Square!

The Secret Pearls, The Golden Goat*—
It Walks By Night*, so we've been told—
We might have had upon this boat
Had not the Dawn appeared so bold.

Thieves' Nights so oft abruptly end,
Like Alpine Flowers in summer snow;
Farewell to Paradise! they send,
For never there can now they go!

The Woman of Andros smiles again;
The Wind From the West arises high;
And Retribution comes to men—
The Sting of the Whip is theirs for aye!
(24 titles).

(B. A. Billings, 16, Brixton Avenue, Withington, Manchester.)

The announcement of this Competition stipulated that the titles should be taken from the advertisement columns. Nearly half the Competitors (including one to whom the prize would otherwise have been awarded) have taken titles also from the reviews and from the list of Books of the Month, and so had to be disqualified. We specially commend the replies by Lorna Collard (Bath), E. Noble (Long Melford), L. F. Goldsmid (London, S.W.), Sir Duncan Grey (Weston-super-Mare), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton).

VI.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best review is awarded to J. Kilmeny Keith, 69, Marine Parade, Worthing, for the following:

THREE DAUGHTERS. BY JANE DASHWOOD. (Murray.)

Here is a book that would have delighted Jane Austen and will bring unspeakable pleasure to thousands of her admirers. Miss Dashwood's story of the three sisters, each sketched in with so light a pen but so brilliant an assurance, is delicious from the moment when they go for a ride on the top of a horse-omnibus, "where the driver sat under an umbrella and you could get from Baker Street to Piccadilly for a penny," to the witty and penetrating close. Far-seeing, shrewd, subtle, exquisitely humorous, this book is a thing of joy in a crusty day.

We also select for printing:

THE RELIGION OF JESUS. BY WALTER E. BUNDY. (Cassell.)

Recent years have seen the "rediscovery" of the human Jesus. This book is a beautiful and careful study of His personal religion, written with the conviction that men must come, not only to believe in Him, but to believe with Him. Dr. Bundy, examining the religious consciousness of Jesus, shows that the intensity of His prayer-life gave Him the power and mastery over circumstances such as the modern world is needing. Yet the writer shows also that first we must adopt His scale of values before we can make His intense personal faith our own.

(K. G. Budd, 50, Waldegrave Park, Twickenham.)

We also select for honourable mention the reviews by R. K. Spedding (Liverpool), James E. N. Brown (Great Yarmouth), Clifford Bower-Shore (Stockport), Mannington Sayers (Monmouth), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Dallas Kenmare (Barnt Green), Mrs. Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), S. R. Fuller (Streatham).

VII.—THE PRIZE OF ONE YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION TO THE BOOKMAN is awarded to M. T. Coghlan, 16, Fontenoy Street, Dublin, and to Muriel Bending, "The Dovecot," Wickham Avenue, Bexhill-on-Sea, Sussex.

WHAT IS WRONG WITH THE NOVEL?

BY ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

EVERYTHING is wrong with some novels and something with all of them. The perfect novel has not yet been written, though there are too-ecstatic reviewers who occasionally seem to think otherwise. An editorial note in the last issue of that admirable little Australian quarterly, Desiderata, protests against the lack of a sense of proportion in the reviews of certain English periodicals. " On the one hand," it says, " is the coterie which glibly acclaims a new masterpiece almost weekly. . . . On the other hand, we discover the dour and disillusioned gentlemen whose comments on books, if perused with regularity, would drive their readers to the very depths of despair." There is some truth in this ; but worse than this, there are fortunate contemporary authors who seem to arrive at a state of beatification while they are still in the flesh. They publish two or three excellent books that are highly and justly praised, and every book they publish afterwards, though it may fall short of excellence, is accepted by their unleavened admirers with undiminishing eulogy. This is so with chosen poets as well as with chosen novelists.

Two or three of D. H. Lawrence's books rank him beyond question among the first novelists of our generation. But his automatic adorers are not satisfied with this ; they have hypnotised themselves into a belief that he is also a great poet and, whatever merits of thought and cleverness his verse may have, no impartial person can say it reaches the heights of great poetry. One eminent critic making the best, the other day, of Lawrence's last book of verse, " Nettles," granted that there was nothing in it like his

> " So many fruits come from roses,
> From the rose of all roses,
> From the unfolded rose,
> Rose of all the world."

which he so evidently expects us to admire that I am thankful Lawrence did not write the pleasant drawing-room ditty—

> " No rose in all the world," or his worshippers, who do not at present admire that sort of thing, would, I am afraid, have tried to urge it upon us as supreme poetry. Mr. T. F. Powys is another novelist who is in danger of being beatified by emotional enthusiasts. " Black Bryony " and " Mark Only " were beautifully written and true to the life and character with which they were concerned, whether you liked that sort of life and character or not. His latest book, " Kindness in a Corner," is also beautifully written, but is otherwise nothing more than cheap and occasionally nasty musical comedy.* It is presumably a satire on the recent tendency of rural parsons to get involved in village scandals, but it runs to such nonsensical burlesque that the satire has no bite in it. His Reverend Silas Dottery begins as a charmingly simple clergyman of the Parson Adams type, but is soon translated into a pantomime figure and becomes as inanely simple as any pantaloon. This will not do from Mr. Powys ; it will do for him if he does it too often ; yet his select circle of habitual adorers will probably overburden it with the same praise they give to the best of his work. It is unsettling but very much more satisfactory to see a book belauded by one critic and damned by another, because then at least you know that each has formed his own opinion about it, according to his lights, and is not merely singing by rote in a choir.

That it is beautifully written, too, is about all you can say of Mr. Joseph Hergesheimer's " The Party Dress."† You would have to be as simple as Powys's Rev. Silas Dottery to believe that Nina Henry, turned forty and with grown-up children, developed a fatal sex complex and went wrong because, for the first time in her life, she wore a marvellous party dress made in Paris, which fitted her too tightly, showed too much of her figure and made her look and feel younger than she was. She would have gone wrong in any dress. She is tired of her husband ; he is devoting himself to another lady ; Nina is kissed fiercely by Francis Ambler, but though he stirs her she decides at length that she does not love him ; she is kissed also by Roderick Wade, who smells strongly of gin and cigarettes, but she does not love him either. She moves in a smart set that is not troubled with any morals, and drinks more frequently and copiously than you would think possible under Prohibition. She meets Chalke Ewing, who has lived a lurid life in Cuba, knows all about women, and steadily soaks himself in drink. Nina loves him ; he loves her, but is nobly resolved that, beyond passionate kisses, their relations shall be innocent until she has divorced her husband and they can marry. She is not so particular, and when he has been tempted and fallen, Nina is heartbroken next day to learn that he has suddenly returned to Cuba, and is so overwhelmed by his lapse that presently they hear he has shot himself. Nina feels so deeply the reproof of "his honourable death" that she tears up the dangerous dress, and you leave her resigned to making the best of her husband. With about two exceptions, her crowd of friends in the American smart set are as futile and dissipated as herself. Were such people worth studying and such a story of them worth telling? Not, I think, by an artist so greatly gifted as Mr. Hergesheimer.

I have read this month three good first novels. "Dixon's Cubs"* takes you out through the War for some of its scenes, but is in the main a story of English country life, of a family living, at the outset, at Brockeridge Farm above the valley of the Wye on the Welsh border. Dixon is a sturdy, hard-working, clean-living fellow, dominated by love of his ancestral acres and of his five children, Ralph, Martin, John, Marjorie and Joan; the mother is dead. The widely differing characters of Dixon and his "cubs" are drawn very skilfully and with insight. Ralph is likest the father, and fills his place when he is killed by a fall from his horse, leaving the farm hopelessly mortgaged and his family unprovided for. It is not a story to be outlined; the ruthless old uncle Myron and his detestable son Percival may bring a touch of melodrama into it, but it is the sort of melodrama that colours actual life; Ralph is the only son who survives the War and, except for the War interval, the interest of the whole thing grows out of Ralph's struggle against circumstance, the progress of Marjorie, as sensible as she is lovable, and the shrapnel-blinded man she marries, the puritanical Joan and her irresponsible husband, and the quiet realism of everyday happenings that influence or are influenced by them. The hunting scenes and the sketches of rural life and folk are excellent.

There is considerable promise in "Embryo."† Miss Sibyl Phillpotts knows how to tell a story, but her characters are not alive enough to reach our sympathies. The clever little Muguet is an irritating child and I wish she could have grown up in fewer pages. When her elegant mother reclaims her from her guardian and is taking her out to France to marry a rich, half-witted young Marquis, John who had been her playmate, tells her he loves her; she accepts his embraces, promises never to forget him, but, despite his plea, says she must still go and marry the Marquis, for John's love makes it all easy, "I don't care what happens now." Which is nice for her, but not much good to John. She wearies of the fatuous young Marquis and runs away, and when she is free marries Patrick, who cheats her into believing John is dead, and finds she has made another mistake. Patrick runs away from her, and then her thoughts turn rapturously to the faithful John, and one only hopes John is going to be contented. But Miss Phillpotts has real ability.

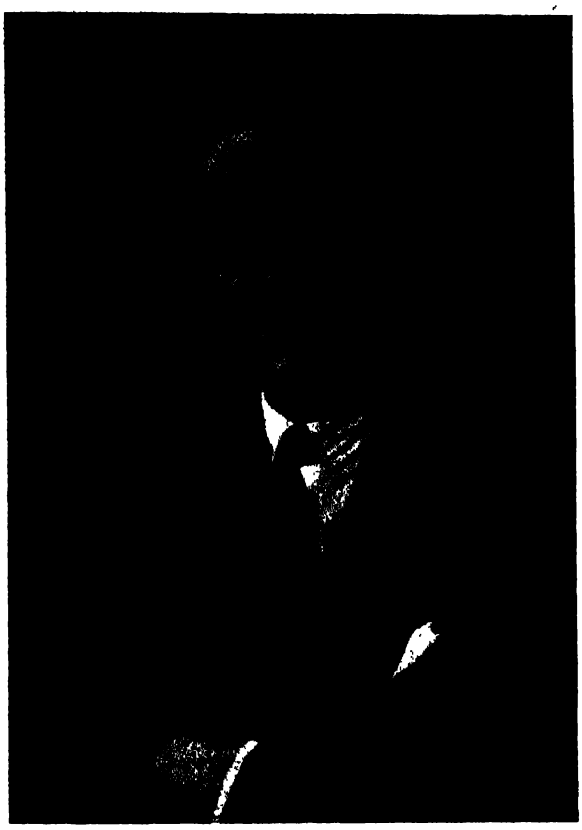
Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Miss Iris Barry, author of "Here is Thy Victory" (Elkin Mathews & Marrot).



"Giant's Bread"‡ is, for a first novel, remarkably mature in style and in its characterisation. The prologue is a brilliant bit of work, with its vision of the small figure of man as the spiritual giant who has survived the death of civilisations and is fighting his way through "to rise in a new civilisation of which we do not dream." I could wish there had been less about Vernon Dayre's childhood, but the study of it is penetrating as well as extensive, and you are made to realise how much he inherits from his hysterical mother and his kindly, amoral father. Vernon, a lonely, imaginative child, who hates and fears music in his youth, develops into a great original musical genius; but the story is much less of his triumphs in music than of the vicissitudes, the suffering, the conflicting influences that hammered and moulded his character and drove him at last to a realisation of his powers. I have never been persuaded that free love is a necessary concomitant of genius. After all, the majority of those who make a business of sex indulgence are the successors of those chinless, brainless dudes and johnnies who once made Regent Street notorious, and when men of genius exercise no self-control in these matters it does not indicate that they are more wonderful, but that, to this extent, they are as weak and commonplace as their uninspired fellows. Therefore it would seem as if in a picture of a man of genius it would be truer if the animal side of him were quietly taken for granted and not stressed as if it were an important and inevitable part of his make-up. This merely by the way, for Vernon's conventional unconventionality detracts nothing from the fact that "Giant's Bread" is a novel of exceptional power and interest.

If this were an ideal world and every author received his and her due earnings, "John Presland" would rank much higher than she does, as poet, dramatist and as novelist. "The Charioteer"* may not mark any advance on that extraordinarily fine novel of hers, "Escape Me—Never!" but it reaches the same level in narrative art and in its knowledge of and intense sympathy with all kinds of humanity. The squalor in which Mohun's drinking habits involve him is transfigured to pathos by the despairing fight he makes against his hereditary weakness. "None of the virtuous," he said, "none of those, that is, who are fortunate enough to be born with a nature that accords with the requirements of civilised society, know what we pay for a vice; the sense of isolation, the sense of differentness which is with us always. We are cut off from the world at large, we are like foreigners living in a country whose habits we cannot understand, whose language we cannot learn." The interest centres on the two sisters, Shirley and Fredegonde. They are musical prodigies, and their wily mother, Mrs. Bellairs, contrives to get them taken up by the wealthy, eccentric Mrs. Fortescue, who is a figure in Brighton society, and by sponging on that lady she secures for the girls the tuition that starts them on a successful musical carrer. Shirley has charm as well as talent; Fredegonde has talent, but is a cold little wretch with no thought for any but herself. There is all along a fret of rivalry between them, which culminates when the passionate, masterful Russian, Stanislas, who is Shirley's lover, includes the willing Fredegonde in his affections. The end is tragedy, in that it leaves Shirley with her wrist broken and her violin-playing over, but it opens a door to what may prove a greater happiness than any she has known. The characters, major and minor, are drawn vividly, with sympathy and humour. The sketch of the friendly, harassed pierrot troupe at Brighton is a little masterpiece. "The Charioteer" is emphatically a book to buy, otherwise you will be sorry you only borrowed it when there is, as there will be before long, a run on John Presland's first editions.

"Jeffery E. Jeffery," author of "Miss Vell Intervenes" (Chapman & Hall).

Talking of the lapses of genius, Mr. J. A. Steuart has followed his Stevensonian romance, "The Cap of Youth," with "The Immortal Lover,"* which retells, with the freedom allowable in fiction, the life of Burns. He has given his own interpretation of obscure and disputed episodes, has imaginatively filled in a few gaps, but claims that he has introduced nothing that is not "true in spirit." The result is an interesting, ably written story which reveals the Burns that Byron drew (unintentionally no doubt) in his own image, when he wrote, "What an antithetical mind!—tenderness, roughness—delicacy, coarseness—sentiment, sensuality—soaring and grovelling—dirt and deity—all mixed up in that one compound of inspired clay."

The watchful figure of the reputed witch, the eerie, implacably malevolent Mrs. Turlit, dominates "The Crochet Woman"† and casts a baleful shadow over the lives of those who fall under her displeasure. She has put her curse upon Jan the tinker, grandson of the woman who, long years before, had stolen her husband from her, and the curse involves little Betty Stogs, the village girl, who falls in love with Jan and, in defiance of warnings, marries him. By her cunning double-dealing the crochet woman sows dissension between Betty and her man, and sends each to other lovers; but in the end her tortuous machinations only serve to bring Betty and Jan back to each other, and you can feel half sorry for the bitter old woman in the hour of her defeat. The pictures of Cornish village and town life are graphically realised, and Mrs. Manning-Sanders's rough, simple, earthy, superstitious Cornish men and women are wonderfully natural, perfectly human in their imperfections. The sensitive delicacy and vigour of her style were never more effective than in this poignantly realistic romance.

I am greatly taken with Miss Iris Barry's "Here is Thy Victory."* It is fresh in idea, written imaginatively and with a sure feeling for the dramatic suspense of an exceptional situation. Mr. Griffiths, registrar of births and deaths, begins to be vaguely alarmed because for a week, against all precedent, he has not registered a single death, and none has been registered in the other villages and towns of Southern England. As days pass, and rumours spread, a conviction grows that death has passed from the world and life here will go on for ever. The story is of the effect this belief has on the hopes and minds of people. The papers take the question up and argue that eternal life on earth would be too heavy a burden. The prospect of it is bewildering and terrifying. A parson expresses the general feeling when he says that we need God's gift of death "to make our life on earth bearable. . . . I am an old man, and I am afraid not to die." Whether such dread, such alarm would have been created so soon, and because no death had been registered for just over a fortnight—I am not sure, but the story puts its spell upon you and you only think of that afterwards; the group of vivid, vital characters, Griffiths and his wife; the delightful little Susy, her grim, bedridden old grandfather and her troubled, anxious love affair; Nurse Leyland and her too-vivacious child; the kindly, faulty Dr. Rowe, and other of the villagers, are so intimately and understandingly brought into being that your interest in them and their reactions to the problem of the hour, like Aaron's serpent, swallows up the rest. A story that really gets hold of you, and is uncommonly well written.

I have no space to do more than advise you to read Miss Joan Kennedy's pleasant, homely tale of country life and a childless woman's groundless jealousy of her husband in "The Red Soil"†; and Mr. Jeffery E. Jeffery's lively comedy, with its strains of sentiment, intrigue and excitement, "Miss Vell Intervenes."‡ "The White Coat"§ is a propaganda novel, revealing the evils of Bolshevism and finding the salvation of Russia in the restoration of the Tsars. It is cleverly done. The opening scenes in the German sanitorium are minutely, finely realistic. It is exciting enough, though I will not answer for its teachings. And, for a change, here are two of the best novels of murder, mystery and sensation I have read for some while—"It Walks by Night"* and "The Fifth Victim."† The concluding chapters of both are sealed up, and if your curiosity is not roused and you don't want to know how they end, you can return the books with seals unbroken and have your money back. If you guess how either ends without breaking the seal, you can do more than I could. Each is in its kind first rate. Not good as literature, perhaps, but much can be forgiven, for whatever else may be wrong with them they are good reading.

THE DREAM.

(Paraphrased from "People" by Edgar Wallace.)

BY M. E. S.

I walked along the parapet of Heaven ;
A broad white highway stretched upon my left,
And then, a mottled pavement, gold and pearl,
With balustrade of greyish porphyry.
I leant upon the wall and looked below
Into the purple void, and saw beneath—
A million miles or so—a pale green world
Which turned and turned in revolutions slow.
Beside me, gazed a number of old men,
Old earth-worn saints, with faces calm and mild,
Their robes, not spotless white, but grey and worn,
Tattered and torn like ancient College gowns,
(For what we love the best is Heaven's attire) ;
These leant their elbows on the parapet,
Gazing abstracted on the earth below,
And most of them were smoking short clay pipes
Which, as they talked, wafted along to me
The penetrating aroma of shag !
(To have what we like best is Heaven's rule).
After a while, another older saint
Came shuffling in his sandalled feet across
The white smooth road, holding beneath one arm
A marble mortar, large and ponderous,
A heavy pestle in his thin left hand.
Intent on gazing still, the other saints
Scarce marked his coming, till they saw him sit Upon the kerb, the mortar 'twixt his feet.
With care meticulous, he filled his pipe
And lighting it, took several vigorous pulls ;
Next, from his robes, a dazzling sapphire drew,
A wondrous stone, which sparkled in the sun ;
This, at the bottom of his mortar placed
And hammered at it till it broke to bits
And lay all crushed in tiny grains, like sand.
But still he ground and ground, hour after hour
Until the beauteous gem was changed to powder white.
From time to time, the saints turned from their gaze
Upon the parapet and watched his work.
When all was finely ground, he laid his pestle down
And, picking up the mortar, set it safe
Upon the flat top of the parapet.
Then the old saints approached, and each one took
A handful of the dust, and threw it into space.
As I still leant and watched, I saw it like a cloud
Of iridescent vapours, sinking out of sight.
Then, as I looked, the world loomed near and large,
I saw the dust settling upon its face ;
I saw, too, humans searching, just as plain
As if I, too, were searching by their side.
And presently, one human found a speck ;
His frenzied shouts brought other humans there
In hundreds and in thousands, wild with joy
They took the speck and placed it in a box
Of gold, and o'er it built a mighty fane,
A vast cathedral reaching to the clouds.
And in another region of the earth was found
Another precious speck of sapphire dust.
Those who discovered it were moved to build
A university with spires and domes,
Masses of red-brick buildings all around,
In celebration of their wondrous find.
Then, in some distant spot, another speck
Was found by eager searchers, and again
Was reared a fine and princely edifice—
A hospital, or yet another church
So thus it was, as year succeeded year
And centuries and æons of Time went by,
For time immeasurable it must have seemed
To those poor Time-and-Earth-bound souls below,
Although to me 'twas but a passing flash—
Still they built on, where'er a speck was found,
And gave their skill to worship or to science ;
And every time, enchanted with their find,
They hailed another speck with frenzied shouts
The old saints, gazing, laughed, and rocked in mirth
Till down their worn, lined faces rolled the tears.
"What is the joke ? What do you see ?" said I,
"In that poor, vain and fruitless human toil,
That moves you thus to laughter and to jest ?"
"I will explain," replied a saintly man
Who wiped his eyes and checked his merriment,
"You saw the sapphire which old Harry ground,
One little grain from Heaven's foundations chipped ?
—That sapphire is the Truth—the only Truth ;
You saw him grind it fine, as fine as dust ?"
"I saw that," I replied, "but where's the joke ?"
"The joke !"—he held his sides and rocked with mirth,
"The joke ?"—and for a time he could not speak,
"This is the joke ; each poor deluded mortal
On the earth, who finds one tiny speck,
One fragment of the Truth, thinks it the Whole !"

None of the lesser Victorian poets has a more distinctive note or a surer place on the lower slopes of Parnassus than Thomas Edward Brown, the centenary of whose birth will be commemorated on May 5th. He was born at Douglas, in the Isle of Man, where his father held the living of a small church in a poor district. Two years after the birth of his son (the sixth of his children) the Rev. Robert Brown was made vicar of Kirk Bradden, near Douglas, and T. E. B. has put memories of that place and of his boyhood there into "Braddon Vicarage" and other of his poems:

> "I wonder if in that far isle,
> Some child is growing now, like me
> When I was child; care-pricked, yet healed the while
> With balm of rock and sea" . . .

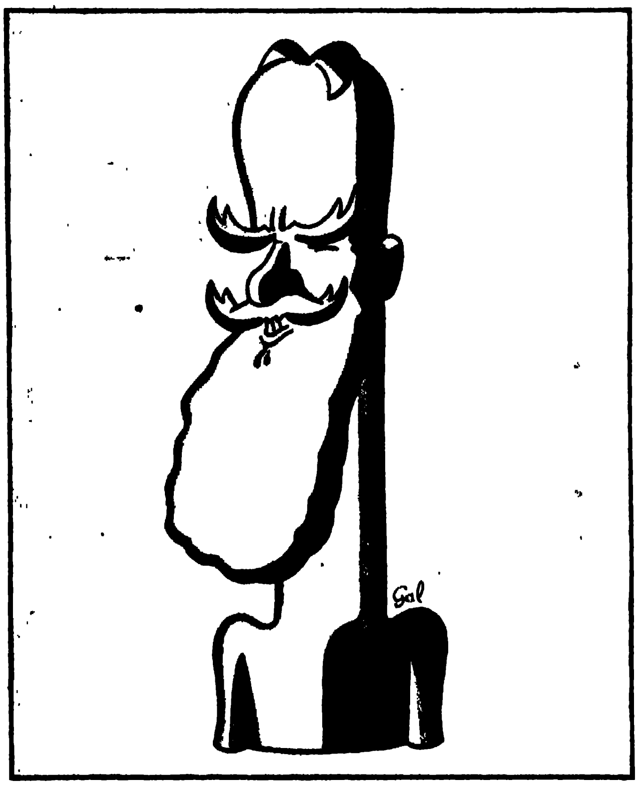
T. E. Brown.

An early portrait.

From "Poems of T. E. Brown." Selected and arranged with introduction and notes by H. F. B. and H. G. D. Golden Treasury Series (Macmillan).

After a brilliant career at Oxford, he was elected a Fellow of Oriel, "but never took kindly to the life of an Oxford Fellow," and, writes Mr. H. F. Brown, in an introduction to Messrs. Macmillan's Golden Treasury edition of the poems, "after a few years of private tuition he returned to the Isle of Man as Vice-Principal of King William's College." He married his cousin, Miss Stowell, in 1857, and in 1864 accepted an appointment as master at Clifton College, where he remained for thirty years. During those years most of his poetry was written, and, though he won the affection alike of boys and masters and was an inspiring influence with his pupils, his chief interest was not in school affairs, and toward the end of that period, when his health was failing, he was yearning more and more for leisure to live his own life and give himself wholly to his own work:

> "I'm here at Clifton, grinding at the mill
> My feet for thrice nine barren years have trod;
> But there are rocks and waves at Scarlett still,
> And gorse runs riot in Glen Chass—thank God!"



In 1892 he resigned from Clifton and went back to the Isle of Man, to whose scenes and people he had given his heart, as Lamb gave his to London, "with usury," and wrote to his friends of the joy he had in his new-found freedom: "This is at last life . . . All life hitherto has detained me from my true life." After five years of that happiness, he died on October 29th, 1897.

His first book, "Betsey Lee: A Fo'c's'le Yarn" (1873) was, in 1881, included in a collection of his "Fo'c's'le Yarns" which obtained wide popularity. They are stories of the tragedy and comedy of love, told by a fisherman in a racy dialect that lends naturalness and often an added poignance to their humour and pathos. But dialect, whatever its virtues, is too earthy a leaven in poetry, and it is chiefly by the narrative and lyrical poems he wrote in literary English that T. E. B. will be remembered. Here, in his spiritual moods, as Mr. H. F. Brown says, he is "constantly reminding us of George Herbert, Sir Thomas Browne, Wordsworth, Blake, yet it is one of the signatures of his genuineness as a poet that the note is never identical; it is always the note of Brown himself, in harmony—yes, but not in unison." He comes near to Wordsworth, perhaps, in the simplicity and tender fancifulness of such things as "The Intercepted Salute" and "The Prayers"; he is all himself in the beauty and mystic significance of "Indwelling," and that loveliest, most realistic, most mystical of all his lyrics, "The Schooner." His Collected Poems, with an introduction by Henley, were published by Messrs. Macmillan in 1901. Though he was not given to talking much of his poems, in one of his letters he wrote of them, "It is odd, but, do you know, I have a perfectly serene confidence in their future," and of that confidence he was justified.

A biography of Rudyard Kipling, by R. Thurston

Hopkins, is to be published shortly by Mr. Cecil Palmer.

An introduction by Liam O'Flaherty and a foreword by Gilbert Fabes to "Six Cartoons by Alfred Lowe" (Foyles) tell you something of the artist's story and the chance that led to his "discovery," He began life as a miner "at the age of thirteen, in his native town of Eastwood, Nottinghamshire." The only school of art he ever went to, says Mr. O'Flaherty, "was the mine. There he began to paint with a whitewashing brush, using the walls as a canvas." After being sacked for making a caricature of the pit manager, he saved every penny he could, bent on getting to London and living by his art. At twenty-four he came to London, and became a pavement artist, selling his drawings when he could, and sleeping in doss-houses. One day Mr. Fabes happened to see him working on the pavement, bought two of his drawings, went back to talk with him, and the publication of this book of six cartoons is the outcome of their talks. Mr. Lowe is an artist of brilliant and original gifts. His style is his own and he hits off the characteristics of his sitters with shrewd intuition and a genial humour. Barrie, Shaw and Chesterton are perhaps the cleverest of the six, but I can believe that others would say the same of the other three, Kipling, Wells and Bennett. The edition of the book containing them is limited to seven hundred and fifty copies and the demand will soon exceed that supply, if it has not done so already.

George Bernard Shaw.
From "Six Cartoons," by Alfred Lowe (Foyles).

A book by Mr. S. M. Ellis on Michael Kelly, the opera singer and composer (1763–1826), will be published this spring by Messrs. Victor Gollancz. Kelly began his eventful career by going to Italy as a musical prodigy, and as the protégé of Sir William Hamilton. Later, in Vienna, he was the friend of Mozart, Haydn and Gluck; and for nearly forty years, closely associated with Drury Lane and the Opera House, he was a favourite singer with London audiences, and numbered Sheridan, Mrs. Siddons, Kemble, and many other celebrities among his friends. Mr. Ellis's aim has been to present a survey of theatrical life for a period of sixty years in the reign of George III.

A new novel of East Anglian life by Miss Marian Bower, "Glory Place," will be published this month by Messrs. Mills & Boon.

There has been some delay in publishing "The Village Book," by Mr. Henry Williamson—he is a careful author and not easily satisfied with his work; but he has finished revising and re-revising it at last, and Mr. Jonathan Cape hopes to publish before the end of May.

Mr. Martin Secker has published a new and cheaper edition (7s. 6d.) of Mr. R. A. Scott-James's admirable book, "The Making of Literature," in which he studies inductively "the central problems of the art of literature as they have presented themselves to men experienced in the arts," from Homer to Hardy, from Aristotle to the modern critics. The Note to the new edition, in which Mr. Scott-James discusses the function and proper qualification of the critic and replies to some of his reviewers, is in the best, most urbanely critical spirit.

Miss Marjorie Bowen has nearly finished a new historical romance with the Black Prince for its leading character. She is calling it "The English Paragon," and it will probably be ready for publishing this autumn.

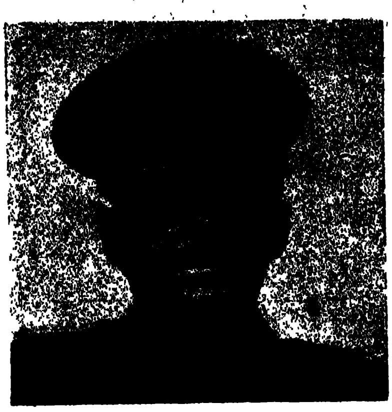
John O' London's Weekly is offering a first prize of fifty guineas, a second of thirty, a third of ten, and five consolation prizes of two guineas each for the best one-act play. The closing date for sending in manuscripts is May 23rd. Full particulars may be had on application to the Editor of John O' London's Weekly, Southampton Street, W.C.2.

Mr. Frederick Watson, who has for some time past been editing that admirable quarterly, The Cripple, has completed a book on "Civilisation and the Cripple," which will be published this month by Messrs. Bale, Sons & Danielsson.

Mr. George Moore's "Conversations in Ebury Street" has now been added to the collected edition of his works (10s. 6d.; Heinemann). Hitherto this has been published only in a limited edition, and the reissue contains new material—a talk with a lady, the only lady who takes part in what Mr. Moore describes to her as "a book of conversations with my literary friends, broken with portraits of my painting friends, those with whom I spend my evenings." And what witty, whimsical, shrewdly critical, lively and sometimes irresponsible, occasionally trivial but never dull conversations they are! You may not endorse all Mr. Moore's devastating remarks to John Freeman on Thomas Hardy, but how are you going to answer him when he says, "Pessimism as a theory is as old as the world. To go no farther back than Ecclesiastes, we find not a few admirable phrases depicting the worthlessness of life; and in Shakespeare we find phrases even more beautiful. If you had said that Mr. Hardy popularised pessimism and coaxed his readers into drinking from an old tin pot a beverage that had hitherto only been offered to them in golden and jewelled goblets, I should have agreed with you." At the other extreme in poetry he can admire Coleridge, but finds nothing that attracts him in Keats; and he does not share the current high opinion of Conrad. But his opinions are his own; he expresses them with an engaging candour, and however unorthodox some of them are they are not idly perverse. "Conversations in Ebury Street" is one of the most entertaining and delightfully personal of his books.

Miss Ethel Mannin.

From a drawing by H. A. Perry.



"Twentieth Century Sculptors," by Stanley Casson, which the Oxford Press is publishing this month, deals with the work of six contemporary sculptors of England, America, Sweden, Germany and Russia, who were not included in Mr. Casson's former book, "Some Modern Sculptors."

"Fifty Miles Round Sulgrave," by the Rev. W. S. Pakenham-Walsh (Banbury Advertiser Press: 2s. 6d.), is a series of twelve sketches of famous men and women who lived within a fifty-mile radius of the ancient village of Sulgrave, the ancestral home of the Washingtons. No such small area in any part of England can be richer in historical associations. The twelve sketches include accounts of Shakespeare and Stratford, Cowper and Olney, Bedford and Bunyan, Kenilworth and Simon de Montfort, Lutterworth and Wycliffe, Leicester and Lady Jane Gray, Oxford and Bishop Ridley the Martyr, Wantage and King Alfred, Grafton Regis and Elizabeth Woodville, mother of the little Princes who were murdered in the Tower. It is a well informed, well written and very interesting little book, and the holiday pilgrim tramping or motoring through the storied district it covers will find Mr. Pakenham-Walsh, who is Vicar of Sulgrave, an invaluable guide.

"Cimarron," Miss Edna Ferber's new novel, which Messrs. Heinemann have just published, is a story of pioneer days when the Red Indian was a menace to be reckoned with. The film rights have been sold for the record price of £25,000.

There is an interesting interview in a recent issue of the Boston Transcript with Mrs. Sophia Cleugh, whose new novel, "Song Bird" (Hodder & Stoughton), was reviewed in last month's BOOKMAN. Mrs. Cleugh is by birth English, but in 1911 she went to America. "I went on a visit," she says, "got married there, and have lived there more or less ever since." During the War she was back in England engaged on Government service, and after the War she wrote her first novel, "Matilda," which was one of the most successful books of 1924. She took to writing because "writing was in the family. My mother wrote lots of books, mainly on education and children's bringing up, and, later in life, novels." The interviewer mentions that when he was having tea with Mrs. Cleugh a year or so ago she suddenly exclaimed, "You know, my idea of heaven would be to go to jail with a typewriter and a box of paper." "The six novels which bear her name," he adds, "are a striking testimony to the sincerity with which those words were uttered. 'Matilda,' 'Ernestine Sophie,' 'Jeanne Margot,' 'A Common Cheat,' 'Spring,' 'Song Bird'—not one of these could have been written byone who had reluctantly to drive herself day by day to an ungrateful task. Each and all they bespeak the author's joy in their creation." "Song Bird" is the story of a beautiful Spanish girl, Nina, who begins as a child of the circus, falls in love with the son of a noble Spanish family, and is pursued by the ruthlessly active hatred of his mother through a dazzling career as an opera singer. It is a story of strong dramatic interest, told, as the interviewer has it, "with a crisp lightness that gives brilliance to her characterisations, and nowhere is this dexterity so apparent as in her interpretation of Nina. The change from the impetuous girl to the poised, resourceful yet vulnerable woman is drawn with deft precision." Mrs. Cleugh is at present staying on holiday in the Isle of Wight, in a small cottage next door to Thackeray's granddaughter, and is working on a new novel to be called "Enchanting Clementina." She is arranging to return to America some time this month.

Brigadier-General F. P. Crozier, whose war book, "A Brass Hat in No-Man's Land," has just been published by Mr. Jonathan Cape.

The young beginner who wants to become a journalist and would like to know what lies ahead of him if he does, and how to go about making a start, cannot do better than read Mr. F. L. Stevens's "On Going to Press" (Methuen: 3s. 6d.). Mr. Stevens writes with an abounding sense of humour and a genial cynicism, and his lively, graphic sketches of life in a newspaper office, of the duties of editors, sub-editors and reporters and how they do them may be read with profit, as well as with amusement, not only by budding journalists, but by old hands, who will find themselves and some of their doings shrewdly satirised, and by readers at large. But though he is too experienced to take the newsman's business too seriously, and is tolerant of the journalist who writes the opinions required of him and suppresses his own, Mr. Stevens rightly lays it down that "it is he who is able to write what he thinks who achieves," and that without sincerity a man never becomes influential in journalism. His chapter on newspaper reviewing may disillusion the idealist, for he declares that reviewing "transforms the book-lover into the book-hater," and what he says of how reviews are written will horrify trusting authors, but he puts his foot down on the critic who merely tries to show off his cleverness at the author's expense, and speaks with knowledge when he holds that "adverse criticism is easier than intelligent appreciation." A sound, practical guide and a delightfully entertaining one.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS.

Those who would know something of the truth concerning religious persecution under Bolshevism should read Mr. F. A. Mackenzie's THE RUSSIAN CRUCIFIXION (2s.; Jarrolds). Mr. Mackenzie lived in the Soviet State from the autumn of 1921 till the end of 1924; for the next two years, being debarred from returning to Russia, he lived at Stockholm, making frequent visits to the border cities of Finland, Estonia and Latvia; and since then he has used special means to keep in touch with Russian affairs. From personal knowledge down to six years ago, and through divers agents down to date, he is able to present a full and terrible account of the tyrannical harshness with which the Bolshevists imprison, exile and persecute people because of their faith and seem systematically bent on the destruction of all religion. Mr. Mackenzie says rightly that this persecution has "affronted the conscience of the civilised world," yet one feels that the civilised world must make its protest with some diffidence. Under the Tsars there were many ruthless pogroms in which the Jews were slaughtered; the Russian people lived in misery and ignorance and endured imprisonment, exile and the gallows in the cause of that freedom we enjoy, but the civilised world made no protest then. If the Russian revolutionists have looked back on all the horrors they suffered under a presumably Christian regime and doubt whether the Christianity that resulted in such a shameful state of things was worth perpetuating, who can honestly wonder? If our conscience had taken affront sooner, before the downtrodden and desperate had been goaded into revolt, we could speak out now firmly and without blushing. As it is, we must make our protest, for nothing can justify such tyranny as Mr. Mackenzie reveals, but we must make it apologetically, and not be indignant if, in view of the political changes the country has undergone, our motives are suspect. We are offering to the gander what we did not think was sauce for the goose, and are hampered by our own proverbial philosophy.

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Mr. Wilfred Partington,

Editor of The Bookman's Journal, whose "The Private Letter-Books of Sir Walter Scott" (Hodder & Stoughton) is reviewed in this Number.

Miss Naomi Jacob has chosen a somewhat difficult subject, or rather has surrounded herself by many pitfalls in the choice of her principal characters in THE BELOVED PHYSICIAN (7s. 6d.; Thornton Butterworth), these being a coterie of medical people of both sexes. But she walks warily and bids us take her word for it that Walter Keller is a brilliant surgeon, Deborah his wife an excellent physician, and George Dawson an incapable one—practically a fraudulent one. These being the outstanding figures the remainder stand in still dimmer perspective. But this surface-riding does not apply in any other direction. There is no glossing over the human frailties. The reversion of Walter from his devotion to Deborah comes rather abruptly, it finds the reader as unprepared as his wife; but pitiful though his futile struggle is, it is handled with sincerity and delicacy, while the calculated and persistent persecution of Dawson is at least consistent. Miss Jacob's keenly sensitive handling turns much that is sordid into something closely akin to beauty.

Portrait by Vaughan & Freeman. Miss Edith Arundel,

Author of "Son of John" (Cassell).

THE LADY JEAN, by Frank Dilnot (7s. 6d.; Brentano), is an historical romance set in the England of 1624, at the time when Buckingham was attempting to arrange a Spanish alliance for Prince Charles. According to Mr. Dilnot it was the Lady Jean Bevill who upset the Duke's calculations by captivating the Prince for his own good. During the dangers and hardships to which she was subjected by the Duke and his creatures, Lady Jean had in John Tarver, who had been sent to kidnap her, a most gallant cavalier; and a romantic love story comes to a happy end with an unexpected discovery. Mr. Dilnot has handled his exciting situations skilfully, and produced a very readable tale suitably equipped as to costume and language, and with pleasant quotations from Mr. Benjamin Jonson.

To accompany the Princess Olga Borisovna in PILGRIM TO THE ABYSS, by Axel Eggebrecht (7s. 6d.; Methuen), on her pilgrimage to the abyss of Nothingness is not the pleasantest of journeys. Miserable and repressed in childhood; tortured by her vicious husband and his yet more vicious brother-in-law; hardened and embittered by her sojourn in an asylum; hysterically unsatisfied in her middle-age of unlimited wealth and power; cast to the depths of poverty and hardship by the Bolshevist Revolution—the career of this strange inhuman personality inspires more horror than pity. Even the final picture of the majestic old lady ruthlessly expounding her views on the meaninglessness of the Universe, mistress of her fate, and untouched by any passion or illusion, has something utterly repellent in its icy coldness. Yet the narrative, painful, and at times unnecessarily brutal as it may appear, is founded on facts which are written in history. It sheds a revealing light on the events leading to the cataclysm which has destroyed the very foundations of pre-revolutionary Russia, and has led her to the brink of that Great Void, where "the refuge of hope, and the illusion of mutual responsibility no longer exist."

New Novels.

ELDEST MISS COLLINGWOOD.[1]

Those who are sufficiently mature can remember when Mr. Pett Ridge was hailed as a new writer, and praised as one whose stories of modern London, steeped in the humour and human weaknesses and kindness of the modern Londoner, leavened the fiction of the time with a fresh and individual note. In the years between then and now other new writers have arisen, tastes have changed, and so many latter-day novels are so much alike in their highly coloured sophistications that to come, after a longish interval, upon a new Pett Ridge novel is to be struck again with its freshness and the breezy air of healthful, sensible, decent humanity it brings into a somewhat sultry atmosphere. Mrs. Collingwood, weary of being nothing but a household drudge under a close-fisted husband, runs away from him and her children to find freedom and live a life of her own. Ellen, the eldest Miss Collingwood, reluctantly gives up her work in a city office to be her father's housekeeper and looks like sacrificing herself and degenerating into the drudge her mother had been ; but she has intervals of rebellion ; she stumbles on romance and, without being disloyal to her father, at long last finds a way out into happiness. The various members of the Collingwood family, and a wide variety of men and women who play major or minor parts in helping to shape their destinies, are drawn with the quiet understanding, the shrewd, dry humour and sympathy that are Mr. Pett Ridge's unfailing gifts. You are interested at least as much in the people themselves as in their story, and story and people together make " Eldest Miss Collingwood " a book that should be read by all who are looking for good entertainment.

PAINTED VEILS.[2]

Half-way through this posthumously published volume the reader will light upon the author's own characterisation. " Fiction or criticism, or both ? The novel as a literary form is stale. I should like to write a story not all empty incident, nor yet all barren analysis. . . . One in which the idealogies of Barrès and the concrete narrative of De Maupassant would be merged. . . . Too much cluttered up with futile things, our novel reminds me of a drawing-room which you can't see because of the furniture or the bric-à-brac, so crowded is it with everything." The result is not quite so novel as Mr. Huneker seems to have imagined. For it belongs unmistakably to the Vie de Bohème type, with the difference, of course, that the background is New York instead of Paris. That is not a gain. While Murger's scenes suggested an environment of cultured civilisation, Mr. Huneker's are almost barbaric. But the actors are similar ; the amours and fortunes and misfortunes and studies and amusements of artists and writers and singers and players. The difference is that this " parable," as the author described it, is more frankly concerned with those " charming morganatic ladies, les belles impures, who make pleasanter this vale of tears for virile men." Hence the sins of the flesh are described with an unreserve Murger never attempted. Yet the unsavoury quality of the book is relieved by many incisive epigrams, faithful studies of American tendencies, and vignettes of sane criticism.

SECRET PLACES.[3]

Be it noted at once that this is an especially excellent and well-planned bit of work. The latter half of the book is the stronger and more thrilling of the two, which is as it ought to be. Yet the opening chapters carry their own sure interest, perhaps just because Miss Sutherland has taken pains to make the figure of Toni, her heroine, a little more attractive, a shade more lifelike than that of most heroines. Toni, who reads to a tired old lady, reproves the mistress of a dog who lets it almost get run over without any attempt to save it, is a bewitchingly modern yet sensitive product. Féodor Staire, her ironclad lover, so reluctant to lose his heart, is also very well put on paper, The murder, the suspicion, the cloud ; all are painted into the canvas with the sure hand of an artist. We shall not easily forget this strong, moving and likeable story.

THE THREE MARYS.[4]

There are at least three Frederick Nivens. One who writes such glamorous Wild West tales as " Lost Cabin Mine " and " Hands Up ! ", one who writes such no less glamorous Stevensonian romances as " Dead Men's Bells " and " An Island Providence," and yet another who wrote those strongly dramatic, realistic novels of modern Scottish town life, " Ellen Adair " and " Justice of the Peace." The general reader does not approve of this versatility ; he prefers the novelist who persistently writes only one kind of story, then he knows that if the last was of a sort that suited him the next will suit him too, for it is sure to be of the same sort. But however varied their theme, Mr. Niven's novels are linked each to each by the personality that pervades them and by a distinctive skill and grace of literary style. His new novel, " The Three Marys," is in the realistic vein of those Scottish novels that rank not only as the best of his own work, but as among the best work of the kind in recent fiction. It is the story of Robert Barclay and his rise to fame as a portrait painter. At the outset he is a small boy in South America. His erratic father is in hospital with delirium tremens ; his mother, on her death-bed, anxious for the boy's future, sends him " home " to Glasgow, with a small sum of money settled on him and a letter of appeal to Mrs. Cameron, who had in better days been her housemaid. That lonely sea voyage, and the child's reception and upbringing by the kindly Camerons, who keep a baker's shop, are poignant and beautiful in the telling. His mother's father had been an artist, and Robert shows early indications of having inherited his gift. His schooldays over, he elects to become a sheep-farmer, and on the farm to which he is sent he meets the first of the three Marys who are to influence his career. She is a raw, hearty, good-natured country girl. Broughton, an artist who comes to paint on the moors, sees some of Robert's drawings and recognises their quality, and it is when, encouraged by Broughton, he is back in Glasgow attending an art class, he meets and has passing relations with the second Mary, a highly sophisticated girl whose charm and sweetness, for all her lawless living, the reader is made to realise. He meets the third Mary when he is beginning to become successful ; they marry for love, and for a while are happy. But she cares nothing for art; she has great social ambitions and more and more urges him to take the popular, profitable line in painting that they may cut a figure in society. Dissension grows between them; she is disappointed in him, and finds consolation, and he divorces her. Then his thoughts turn to the second Mary who, beyond the pale as she was, had taken a strange hold on his heart, and he is on the verge of finding her, when the story abruptly ends in tragedy. Admirably written and with a subtle knowledge of human character, "The Three Marys" shows that Mr. Niven's hand has lost none of its cunning and should help to give him that "proper place" which Mr. Hugh Walpole says "has not yet been accorded to him either in America or England." THE TOWN OF TOMBAREL.[5]

Mr. Locke here shows all his customary felicity of style, his gentleness and suavity and his tenderness for romance. The hero of these short stories, so cunningly linked that they seem all to be as one, is the Mayor of Creille, that high mediæval town up on the crags behind the Riviera coast. Tombarel, with his massive Provençal head, his grand manners, his soft heart, is a fit subject for Mr. Locke's brush. His first story, of the father who threw the man who slandered his son down the hill-side into a vast abyss, is one of the most striking of the series, though the sentimentally inclined will prefer "A Snowflake from Picardy," which tells the tale of one of Tombarel's early loves. "Man is a very human being," says the old man to his friend, the English artist. "If you can suggest anything more human than man except perhaps a woman—as a philosopher, I shall be obliged." All sorts of little loves, of necessity, flutter through his life, some with fragrance, some leaving a taint behind. The Swedish widow's romance with him in their early days in Paris left the scent of potpourri behind it; a most delicate essence. An idyll was an idyll in those days among the lilies of the valley at St. Cloud! Hundreds of readers will delight in this very characteristic Locke, so subtle, so urbane, and withal so downright interesting. M. R.

TRAVELLER'S REST.[6]

Most of the people in Mrs. Henry Dudeney's new novel have admittedly a streak of madness in them, or at all events may be classed as mentally abnormal, which gives rather a nightmarish quality to her story oddly at variance with its calm English setting of southern downland. Clara Fountain, to be sure, is meant to represent a rock of sanity in a turbulent sea, yet even she, despite her inherent coolness and craving for peace, thinks and acts in a manner not free from eccentricity—a circumstance hardly surprising, considering her convent unbringing, her sudden transition to the household of a clergyman-brother addicted to drink, and her eventual absorption into the mad Flattery family as wife of the handsome, magnetic, vain, cruel, brilliant Simon Flattery. Simon's mother frankly told her what to expect—all the characters in the book have a tendency to brutal frankness; Flattery wives were, she said, doomed to suffer. Clara suffered accordingly, but could have endured it if she had had children. Realising the curse of his race, Simon refused to have children, so she finds her own way out and goes groping after peace and a normal life instead of tolerating the exquisite torture of loving. Mrs. Dudeney, as usual, writes glowingly and compellingly. You feel that her people belong to a world of their own—a world of vivid colour and passionate emotion, set in the midst of the Sussex we know so well. A. A.

GAMBLER'S HOPE.[7]

When Luis de Lara first met Flora Ballantyre he was a small boy staying among strangers in an hotel and stricken by the sudden death of his mother. Flora, a bride of three days' standing, took the sobbing child in her arms and soothed him to sleep. He told her in later years that he fell in love with her blue eyes straight away; and the Flora of later years certainly put his love to a severe test. Lovable and gracious, she always was, even when verging on middle-age, a widow with a grown-up son of her own. But in those days she carried about with her the dread secret of her gamblings on the Stock Exchange, which, unknown to her son, had involved his fortune as well as her own and brought them to the brink of ruin. It was Luis who came to her rescue, and ancient treasure buried off the coast of Scotland seemed to promise complete deliverance. Luis possessed the clue to it—for in the time of the Spanish Armada an ancestor of his, and—strangely enough—one of hers also, had been mixed up in the hiding of the treasure. In his heart Luis felt that the jewels, if discovered, should be restored to the Roman Catholic Church, but principle was overridden by his distress at Lady Ballantyre's misfortunes, and it was for her sake that he agreed to the search being organised. How the jewels were found and lost again, and the sacrifice he paid for love of his lady, Mr. J. J. Bell tells in a pleasing romance. The characters are drawn with delicacy and understanding, Luis de Lara in particular being a gallant and convincing study. A. A.

MEADOWS OF YOUTH.[8]

"He is not keen on modern novels; he says most of them are such tosh, and the rest rottenly written." This is what Tonia, the heroine, remarks of the hero, her twin brother Dandy, in "Meadows of Youth," which is itself the most "modern" of novels—marital infidelity and the relations between the sexes being discussed with frankness. The charge that this novel is "tosh" or is "rottenly written" cannot however be made, for Mr. Tobias King writes with capability, sprightliness and with amazing, if sometimes cruel cleverness. The opening chapters might with advantage have been "cut," for a grim, gaunt and very Victorian maiden aunt who combines prayer and piety with severity in her treatment of children is so stereotyped a figure in novels that to attempt to satirise the type to-day is unnecessary. As in "The Mill On the Floss," the book opens by picturing the life together, in their childhood's home, of a brother and sister. Their mother is dead, and their father, a naval officer, seldom in England, so Dandy and Tonia live with the very Victorian and tiresome maiden aunt aforesaid.

Once however Aunt Ursala drops out, "Meadows of Youth" becomes a strikingly original story, both in subject and in characterisation. Thereafter the characters are drawn with unusual skill. Tonia and Dandy tingle with life and the joy of youth. Mr. and Mrs. Jorrell would not greatly surprise us were they to walk out of the pages of the book and into our own room, so real are they, while Nicholas Andersen, the artist; Rosie, his sensual, slatternly "model" and mistress, but most of all Christopher Crout who, though he keeps a shop and deals in antiques, is of "blue" blood, if on the wrong side of the blanket, are as admirable in characterisation as they are original.

Several instances of the strange soul-bond that sometimes exists between twins have been recorded in the newspapers lately, notably the case of two brothers, both doctors; and, quite lately, of twin sisters who suffer from the same complaints at the same time. But neither in real life, nor in any novel known to him, can the present reviewer recall an instance in which the twins were of different sex. The motif of "Meadows of Youth" is to show how this soul-bond between a brother and sister who are twins reacts, especially under sex impulse and sex temptation, when they are no longer boy and girl but youth and maiden, each eager to set lips to the cup of passion.

Some readers may think the ending inconclusive, for we bid farewell to Tonia and Dandy while each is still on the threshold of adult life, and while the problems of Dandy's sex-complication and Tonia's sex-renunciation are unsolved. Other readers may hold that in this very inconclusiveness lies not a little of the novel's provocative charm, for Tonia and Dandy decide to cut themselves from the mesh in which each is involved, and to content themselves with the old brother and sister twin-love. The last scene in which they return in each other's company to the Meadows of Youth in which they had wandered together as children, and in which as man and woman they elect to wander, hand in hand again, has real idyllic beauty. If, as one assumes, "Meadows of Youth" is a first novel, it is a first novel of no small promise, and the publishers are to be congratulated on their "find." The next novel by Mr. King will be awaited with interest by both readers and reviewers.

The Bookshelf.

IN OMNE VOLUBILIS ÆVUM.

BY LIEUTENANT-COLONEL F. E. WHITTON, C.M.G.

Thinking of rivers and spates and floods induced us to try to ascertain what happened to the simple-minded yokel in Horace who waited for the stream to dry up. We were horrified to find that the poet cynically remarks that the stream will go on flowing for all time. Will War books really never cease? Usquequo tandem?—as a lady whose book is here reviewed artlessly asks upon another subject with a Latin which is, we confess, "to us unknowe."

"Woman Under Fire"[1] is a woman's diary and experiences of revolutionary Russia. Rightly is it called on the "flap" a "very remarkable human document." The author was "illegally"—this seems open to question—taken into the ranks of the Bolshevik army in the early days of the Revolution, and she recounts conditions in the army and in Petrograd at the time. We must here state that, in writing about such a contentious matter as Russian conditions, an author should, unless there are strong reasons to the contrary, invariably give his or her name as a touchstone of authenticity. Why, in the case of this book, the name of the authoress has been withheld we are at a loss to determine. The very precise and detailed information revealed in the diary must of course make her identity diamond-clear to the authorities in Russia; while for the benefit of the ordinary reader in this country—who happens to have a good deal of time on his hands—sufficient ancestral and parental clues are given in the Foreword to make the discovery of the lady's name an interesting genealogical treasure-hunt, with odds on a successful result. That there is some mystery about the lady is clear. Her father was a university professor in St. Petersburg (p. 8), an honourable though, according to Soviet ideals, probably a "bourgeois" position; but on p. 16—and elsewhere—the authoress prides herself on being an aristo, and on p. 170 it is clear that she must be a princess. The number of princesses who served in the Red Army must be small, and we wonder if anything is to be gained by withholding the lady's name.

One thing however is certain. The lady must have been the most indomitable member of her sex since Joan of Arc. To take but one example, on July 16th, 1917, at 11 p.m. (p. 44) she sat herself down in barracks to her diary and wrote up some 1,800 words—more than are in the whole of this article—and the whole of it in cipher. The cipher was by no means a simple one, consisting apparently (p. 67) of ideographs akin to Chinese letters, and this hypothesis is substantiated on p. 148. She finished the long entry that same night (p. 52). This was a fine piece of work to be carried out by a girl of nineteen amid the squalor, the debauchery, the drunkenness and obscenity of a Red barracks even though the writer had a small room of her own. We are distinctly told in the Foreword that the diary, as now given, is set out just as the author transcribed it from the cipher in which it was kept. The diary reveals a condition of affairs which simply defies description. The "under fire" part is however rather disappointing and in tactical narrative the author is not at her best. The second part of the book consists of a few articles dealing with aspects and results of the Revolution, including the procedure of the dreaded Ogpu. This is certainly a remarkable book.

"A Generation Missing"[2] is one of those books in which the "blurb" man has gone off the rails a bit. He tells us that "the author came from America to serve in the British army in the early days of 1914," but actually the author was in France when the War broke out and his father was living in London. After a very brief tour of service in a scratch corps "which had received an all too hasty recognition from the War Office," he obtained a commission in the gunners "after writing on a form that I was born in Canada," Later he was transferred to the Grenadier Guards, and it is of his service in the Guards Division that the book mainly treats. The discipline and devotion to duty of the Guards receive the eulogy they deserve, and one welcomes these sketches if for no other reason than that it is made clear in them that the discipline and devotion were not based on alcohol. We have had books of the Latrine School and of the Whisky Bottle School: here is a volume of the English Gentleman School to show that officers who gallantly led, and men who gallantly followed, were not kept going by dope or drink. Not that there was not desipere in loco—the locus being Paris, and Paris with no bones (but a good deal of flesh) about it. But in the line it was different. There is a general airiness and looseness about this book, reminding one of the Irishman's definition of a net: "a lot of holes tied together with string," but it makes capital reading. Mr. Osbert Sitwell contributes an interesting and characteristic foreword.

[1] "Woman Under Fire." Anon. 12s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)—[2] "A Generation Missing." By Carroll Carstairs. 5s. (Heinemann.)—[3] "Unknown Warriors." By K. E. Luard. 7s. 6d. (Werner Laurie.)—[7] "Toes Up." By Paolo Monelli. Translated by Orlo Williams. 10s. 6d. (Duckworth.)

We approached Miss Luard's book with just the least little touch of spleen, for it has a yellow band upon it—like the marking of a gas shell—telling us that Lord Allenby considers it "unsurpassed by any war novel yet written." We never care much for this damning with robust praise, but a perusal of the book led us to believe that after all what the field-marshal said might be evidence. Miss Luard spent the best part of four years as a nursing sister in France, and for much of that time was in charge of advanced Casualty Clearing Stations within a few miles of the front. She pays a fine tribute to the British and Dominion soldiers and incidentally conveys the impression that the moral of the Fifth Army was considerably higher than is sometimes believed. At the same time it must not be forgotten that a Casualty Clearing Station often engendered optimism, except indeed amongst those too far gone to have any feelings at all. The sense of unspeakable relief at finding oneself in an asylum, honourably won, after the horrors of the front, and the practical certainty of a period of rest at home had a very tonic effect. "A Blighty one" was something more than a mere phrase.

"Copse 125"[4] (i.e. Rossignol Wood) is by the author of "The Storm of Steel," said to stand alone among German war books as the work of a man who enjoyed fighting for its own sake. Here Herr Jünger gives us his reflections of a few weeks in the front line in 1918. He is a philosopher, moralising and commenting on questions political, ethical and tactical, jotting them down in his notebook and interspersing his comments with vivid descriptions of trench life and trench episodes. He tells us what he thinks of the Foreign Legion, of the place of the cinematograph in human affairs, of patriotism, and of the possible evolution of war. There are some extremely interesting reveries on mechanisation, and the author foresees the introduction of flying tanks. Of war itself he says "with its test and strain it is the only proof of a country's sound condition." There are a vigour and virility in this book not unwelcome at a moment when the pendulum of thought is swinging high in the opposite direction. Unfortunately from the artistic point of view the last entry is dated August 10th, 1918, a mere forty-eight hours after Germany's "Black Day," and we are thus robbed of the opportunity of seeing how Herr Jünger's philosophy stood the test. This book badly wants an index.

The Rev. Henry Day is a member of the Society of Jesus. He is a man with whom Brebœuf would have liked to go out tiger shooting. And he is a man whom we should like to hear, over the wireless, engaged in discussion with the Rev. Eliot Warne—if that unfortunate cleric were alive—upon the ethics of war. Mr. Day frankly states that war is an outcome of the law of strife and progress impressed on our nature by its Creator and permitted in certain circumstances for the achievement of beneficent ends. This reassuring philosophy enabled the author to avoid any doleful reflections while in the Salonika campaign and later in France in 1918. There is a breeziness about "Macedonian Memories"[5] which makes it capital reading and incidentally the book gives a clear account of the military operations in Macedonia, so much so that the priest seems sometimes submerged in the soldier. But Loyola will count that venial.

"WAAC" is a "Woman's Story of the War,"[6] by an anonymous writer who is "Compelled for Obvious Reasons to Cloak her Identity." She also cloaks dates with a squid-like determination, for reasons which do not seem obvious at all. The book is written round the aphorism—or rather the petitio principii—that in the war "self-control, resistance to natural impulses and desires went by the board." Very early, on p. 21 to be exact, on her first arrival at a Base Hospital the authoress is asked a sensational question by a fellow worker of her sex: and later, on p. 127, the writer "got a shock"—as indeed she well might—from what Gwen said to her. This book is thus hall-marked for an instant "best seller," and people who like this kind of thing will find in it just the kind of thing they like. Meanwhile the writer has had her own romance; but candidly we will say that nothing bores us to tears so much as a description of someone else's "honeymoon" (in inverted commas) even when the narrative is decked out by triads of full stops, and is reinforced with the word "paradise" conscripted as a kind of narratory camp-follower. We would however be doing this book an injustice were we to omit to state that there is much powerful writing in it; the writer has a sense of the dramatic and her descriptive ability is high. But her sense of humour is poor. There is (pp. 164 et seq.) an account of a spy mission with her lover into Germany which frankly arouses our curiosity and not least upon the question of language. Could a lady who has learned German from an English father in an English parsonage (p. 168) "speak German very fluently and several of its dialects"? (p. 170). It is certainly a remarkable achievement. On the whole an unpleasant book. Someone—we forget who—after the perusal of a book leaving a bad taste in the mouth used to shout out "Bring me Guy Mannering." Hand us "Persuasion." Get down "Framley Parsonage."

We do not however need them at the moment for "Toes Up"[7] gives us the change required. To read this book after "WAAC" is to experience the feeling, after having left London in November gloom, of waking at a Riviera station, of seeing the Mediterranean blue and sunny, and of hearing the inevitable guitar somewhere playing Funiculì, Funiculà. "Toes Up" is the translation of "scarpe al sole" spoken of those who die in battle, but the rather gloomy title is belied by this cheery book—although there are tragic things too, including a double execution. It is an account of experiences in the Alpini—tough soldiers fighting on a tough front. We wish that the author would remember that, in giving dates, the year is often a useful complement to day and month.

DIPLOMACY FOR GENTLEMEN.*

There are two methods by which this book can be adequately reviewed. There is the one-line advice to the public: Read every word of this book—twice. Or there is the other way of emphasising the worth of this volume by the length of the criticism—in which case this review would continue to fifty thousand words.

Mr. Harold Nicolson.

There have been many books which have discussed the diplomacy which led up to the recent Great War. We have been given the English, the German, the French, and every other racial apology for that international catastrophe. Most of the apologies have been exceedingly ineffective. Now, at last—it is amazing how long delayed it has been—someone has discussed the whole matter from the standpoint of a civilised gentleman. It is clear that Mr. Harold Nicolson considers that there are moral and intellectual and cultural principles involved which are of more fundamental importance than the trivial national hopes and fears which lie on the surface of the case.

The eight introductory pages of this book should be reprinted, in the chief languages of the world, and circulated as a code of ethics which should be applied in all international diplomacy. Of course there have been thousands of perfectly educated persons throughout the ages who have refused to believe that a man or a nation had the right to seize anything they can lay their hands on. But such well-mannered people have not often had any position in or near official circles. But here we have a book, written by the son of a great diplomatist, which lays down as an elementary principle that there is something disgraceful in trying to conquer the world, in founding an empire by force. It suggests that what overfed persons sometimes call virility is something nearer crime. At least that is the impression one gets from reading Mr. Nicolson's charmingly clear and lucid prose.

He admits that Germany may have been immediately responsible for the Great War, by her actions during the years 1900–1914; "though even then less at fault than Austria or Russia." But then he goes on, "As regards the causes (1500–1900) I consider the main onus falls on England." In other words his case is that we cannot blame Germany for her brutal bid for an empire between 1900–1914, without, at the same time, accusing ourselves for the four centuries of British empire-building.

"Before we blame Germany, we must first blame our own Elizabethans. The spirit was exactly the same: the Germans however, owing to a higher state of culture and rectitude, behaved less blatantly: they were less successful. . . . The Germans, during the period which I cover, were fired by exactly the same motives and engeries which illumine what we still regard as one of the most noble passages in our early history."

Yet this writer can make out a very good case for his father, Lord Carnock's, determination (when, as Sir Arthur Nicolson, he was a diplomatist and permanent head of our Foreign Office) to take every possible means of opposing to the force of Germany's attack a superior force which would successfully resist it. Mr. Harold Nicolson, like all great artists, has a realist mind which can look on facts without sentimentality. That is why this account of the inevitable catastrophe of recent diplomacy makes such a gripping story.

One uses the term "inevitable" because the realist must assume that the human factors were stupid and clumsy. Even the charming and perfectly honest Sir Arthur Nicolson should, with more intellectual energy, have discovered a way out of the traps into which Russian intrigues were continually dragging us. There is much evidence in this candid statement that if we had not been friendly disposed to Russian bureaucracy there might have been no War. For example we tolerated Russian brutality in Persia (see page 354). When we did half protest, the Russian agent was "transferred to Belgrade, where his abundant energy was devoted to encouraging Serbia to intrigue against Austria-Hungary." But in this place it is impossible to discuss in detail the important facts of this volume. One can only repeat every word of it should be read; for its intellectual, its ethical, and its literary qualities alike.

G. R. STIRLING TAYLOR.

LESSER VICTORIANS.*

It was Mr. Chesterton who noticed, in his brilliant essay on Victorian literature, that there was something provincial about the greatest of the Victorians—about Dickens, and even Browning. What was true of the great men was far truer of the lesser; it is not a question of religion—Patmore exhibits it as clearly as Kinglake—and it may be that it sprang, a late and rather futile flower, from the hard and bloody soil of the struggle with Napoleon. For though, after Waterloo, the English rushed to the Continent, they went, as they put it, "abroad," an expression which could not have been used by any Englishman before Tudor times, and would not, I think, have been used at all until the arrival of the Hanoverians completed our severance from France and Italy. Then, what had been family quarrels became broils between strangers; and the Englishman's world shrank, even as it expanded to take in the Americas, the Indies, India, and the desolate deserts of Australia. That narrow world was loved intensely; we gained in a certain emotion that finally flickered and fell in the ugly rocket of Jingoism, but we lost something which makes the modern Englishman feel that the Victorian spirit is, in some things, remoter than the spirit which enlivened this island in the days of Shakespeare or of Chaucer.

There are however some men left who sympathise with and share the quaint provincialism of those far-off days: and Mr. Ince's apparently complete agreement with his subject's narrow, rather academic standpoint makes his book a very suitable memorial to their genius. At times, it is true, he carries acquiescence a little too far, and can only be excused on the grounds of sincerity, or of ignorance. Anyone may dislike Dr. Pusey, and despise the particular subjects to which he gave the attention of his massive learning; but Mr. Ince should not, in petulance, call baptismal regeneration a mediæval puerility—not, of course, because of the ill manners of his remark (there he but preserves the atmosphere of his little men, and of great ones), but because the doctrine in question is not mediæval, but primitive. He is sometimes rather questionable on quite different matters. In discussing Calverley's departure from Oxford he suggests that he could not find congenial society there, while at Cambridge there was Seeley, Skeat and Walter Besant. Well, at Oxford in his day were Frederic Harrison, C. L. Dodgson, C. H. Pearson and Lewis Campbell, the last at Calverley's own college, Balliol. There is, I think, little doubt that Calverley's rustication warned him that he must be gentler in his handling of university and college fossils, of which each university had a fine share.

Mr. Ince writes of FitzGerald, Calverley, Monckton Milnes, Sterling and Kinglake. His book is a light-hearted, often brilliant, series of essays, in which he skilfully avoids dealing with any of the deeper aspects of life raised by some of his subjects. He is too satisfied with a superficial view; for instance, in the essay on Milnes he mentions, misrepresents and dismisses with an ipse dixit Lafourcade's criticism of Milnes. He writes:

"To represent Monckton Milnes as merely vicious because he had a library of interesting erotica is surely more daring than true."

It certainly would be; but Lafourcade's criticism is not this, but that Milnes asked the young Swinburne to Fryston in order to introduce him to the works of de Sade and other obscene books. This is quite a different accusation from that which Mr. Ince dismisses so summarily.

The best essays are those on FitzGerald and Kinglake. What was the source of FitzGerald's indolence and his amazing energy Mr. Ince does not answer directly; but from his well arranged and sympathetic essay I come away with the impression that FitzGerald only worked under the influence of some strong personal affection. All his writing, even the most trivial, gives one the impression that it was a labour of love, and it seems likely that it was a labour for love. On Kinglake Mr. Ince is peculiarly interesting; but I think he takes too high a view of that super-undergraduate's ability. "Eöthen" is worthy of high praise; though its merits have obscured those of another excellent book on the East, which Mr. Ince does not mention, Palgrave's account of his travels. Kinglake spent long months in the writing of the history of the Crimean War; and it is evident surely that his willingness to accept such a task is proof that he was not really a great historical writer, nor could have been. Mr. Ince truly says that "Kinglake was unhappy in his subject"; but great historians find great subjects, and in his choice of this miserable squabble—which future ages will only remember because of Florence Nightingale and Leo Tolstoy—Kinglake exhibited that curious provincialism which was the curse and the courage of his times.

SPAIN YESTERDAY AND TO-MORROW.*

Barcelona is a touchstone for any book on modern Spain. No one can write about that turbulent city without disclosing the spirit in which he regards the nation. Hence of the twenty-three pages devoted to the capital of Catalonia by Mr. Baerlein, no fewer than eighteen relate to present political conditions. He admits that the Dictatorship has accomplished " a large amount of good " ; yet somehow he leaves the impression of being less than just to King Alfonso. Why, for one thing, drag in and expatiate upon, to the extent of citing a consultant of Wimpole Street, the disease by which the royal heirs are supposed to be afflicted ? And why should Mr. Baerlein discount the opinion of that " foreign observer " who believes the sentiment of the nation is strongly in favour of the monarchy ? After all, Mr. Baerlein is only another " foreign observer." His opinions too are strangely at variance with the spirit with which he claims to have visited the country—a spirit which delayed him for three days on the frontier lest he should make an undignified entrance to a land of so much tradition. A writer who has so much reverence for so many things of Spain might have shown some for one of its most venerable institutions.

But it must not be overlooked that the majority of Mr. Baerlein's pages are devoted to the Spain of yesterday, and that in those pages he weaves into his narrative much of interest derived from reading and observation, even if he seems to imply that it is only in Seville that the ladies wear high combs with black mantillas. There is something here about most of the towns from Fuenterrabia to Gerona, and the numerous photographic illustrations have been selected with unusual care. If a second edition is demanded, it will be well to correct the careless sentences on page 271.

TRUTH ABOUT LIFE.

The author of " All Smoke " [1] is handicapped by a challenging assertion on its jacket -" a careful realism which embodies truth about life." In so far as all books dealing with human-kind or animate matter are likely to contain a modicum of truth about life, the claim is justified. " The House with the Green Shutters " is a classic example of a mean subject swelling to a masterpiece, but the handling of greed and sensuality, of callous indifference to normal human ties, is not a task for inexperienced pens.

If we are to believe this tale of ignoble beings, who act from motives insufficiently explained, life is a sorry business. Realism confined to squalid details, internal and external, without psychological bearing on the development of character, offends without illuminating. Yet Mr. McFadyen's honesty of intention is manifest ; that it fails of achievement is saddening, for he does not revel. If his world is uniformly grey or black, it is at least free from the unclean hues of iridescence.

The story deals with petty folk in a small Scottish town. Though jogging along discursively, it abounds in accident, illness, death, murder and suicide, just escaping melodrama by restraint in the telling. The author may, for aught one knows, be recounting a series of actual events ; but he has neither exercised the creator's right of selection, nor presented the truth about life. A saving gleam of humanity makes one hope for better things in the future.

The title and publishers of " Sanatorium " [2] alike warn us that the theme is painful. The sensitive will inevitably shrink from this record of disease ; but here pathological detail, unpleasant as it is, explains definite psychological reactions. The characters are personalities, not " cases." Donald Stewart has a sense of values. He gives us a young man in the grip of tuberculosis, yet able to realise the possibility of mental expansion during his compulsory quiescence.

> " He lay in bed, slept for hours, watched the progress of the sunlight across the wall, thought about things. . . . Standing upright, rushing about and earning your daily bread, there was neither time nor inclination for thought. Now, cribbed and confined within a prison seven feet by three and a half, Clive found himself heir to the limitless kingdoms of the mind. '

He leaves the Sanatorium uncured, maybe incurable. The tale ends, as it begins, on a hæmorrhage. But his death would be no tragedy ; his short journey has taught him so much of the truth about life. And his creator, in addition to a sense of values, has a gift for language of compensating beauty. The following passage, where one patient soothes another in the night, leaves the reader in a mood to forgive physical horrors :

> " The quiet voice flowed out and enveloped the listeners in a tide of comfort. In its smooth cadences hung a motif of resistance, of hope, of the chances of ultimate escape Suddenly there was nothing to be heard, nothing to be noticed except this voice. The darkness had retreated, the emptiness had withdrawn its folded oppression. And now there was silence and peace."

The recommendation of a work by the Book Society is the outcome of considered and distinguished opinion ; a critic therefore, almost unconsciously, sets a high standard. Although " Jane Dashwood " [3] conceals the identity of a practised writer, want of experience as a novelist from time to time betrays her. The book opens delightfully. Witty throughout, it sparkles with the natural fun and foolery of Lady Pomfret's three daughters, whose characters are as clear as those of their suitors are obscure. Lady Pomfret herself is a vivid study ; her husband convincing, though less definite ; but Julian Carr, the moody and elusive lover, who should have dominated the reader, as he dominates the mind and heart of Lydia, is a shadow. We are asked to believe in his nobility and worth on the testimony of his acquaintance, which is contradicted by Julian's fickle behaviour and insupportable manners.

For Jane Dashwood he has doubtless a body and soul. Either she knows so much about him that her imagination conceives him as visible to others, or she knows too little. Rejected by this phantom, in dread of spinsterhood—" No longer young, but treated as a child by her mother. ' Where are you going ? ' every time she leaves the room," Lydia turns to John Paynton, her former betrothed. " ' I need scarcely tell you,' John said when he took her hand, ' what pleasure this will give my mother.' ' Nor I,' said Lydia, smiling faintly, ' what pleasure it will give mine.' "

These dutiful sentiments cover a world of bitter truth.

[3] " Three Daughters." By Jane Dashwood. (John Murray.) 7s. 6d. each.—[4] " He-Who-Came ? " By Constance Holme. 6s. (Chapman & Hall.)

The author ruthlessly portrays the unabashed hunt for husbands, the fate of the women left over: sordid realities underlying the leisured ease, elegance and obedience of life in the Victorian era.

Constance Holme, whose fine novel, "The Splendid Fairing," won the Femina Prize some years ago, has broken her long silence with a fantasy called "He-Who-Came?"[4] Untrammelled by "realism," it contains a living truth—truth in the futility of malice, the consolatory grace of kindness. It has the quality of a day-dream, such a dream as might befall delicate imaginations amid new-mown hay and strewn poppies.

The tale is told in homely fashion; but it is the homeliness of an artist whose cunning construction is the result of training and purpose. The sublime and the ridiculous walk hand in hand, attaining their height in the scene where Aunt Martha, followed by a bull in quest of butter, charms the "Tainty Herb" from a field. Miss Holme attempts no explanation of the unlikely.

"Wolfenden and Maud Ellen were both of them modern products, already in touch with the outside world that has little time for wonder. Even Billy-Bob's ready acceptance of the impossible was only the narrow acceptance of the child-mind that sees nothing marvellous in marvels. It was only with Tom that the thing that had happened would force itself into the slow seed-bed of his dale mind, and there breed beauty."

And that, according to poets, is the very heart of truth.

JOHN FRANKLIN'S BRIDE.*

Mrs. Gell has done wisely and admirably in allowing these letters to speak almost entirely for themselves. Beyond a foreword and a very few explanatory notes and linkings up, they tell their own story of that tragically brief romance between Sir John Franklin and Eleanor Anne Porden which developed in the shadow of the French Revolution. Under stress of long absences and anxious fears for each other's welfare, he facing the uncertainties and rigours of Arctic exploration, and she battling with a delicate constitution and acting the part of devoted daughter, they are exceptionally revealing and complete in themselves. Surely two more divergent natures never became united, nor could there be more divergence in their natures than in their surroundings and occupations.

John Franklin came of an old Lincolnshire family. Puritanical in outlook, shy and awkward in society, he hated London and all the publicity it entailed, and spent most of his time when not abroad in his home county. On the other hand, Eleanor was a Londoner through and through, with exceptional social gifts, a poetess who gathered a joyous crowd of friends and admirers round her, though much of her time and strength were expended in caring for her invalid mother, and later in looking after her father and accompanying him on his Continental travels. These then were the two whose letters reflect such intimate glimpses of their devotion to each other, their individual tastes and activities.

* "John Franklin's Bride." By the Hon. Mrs. Gell. 15s. (John Murray.)

It is curious to follow the unfolding of such diverse natures in the quaintly decorous terms of the period (not until they are married does Eleanor commence other than "My Dear Sir"), and again and again Franklin's rigorous principles are allowed to throw their ponderous weight: "I am now indeed acting somewhat contrary to my usual practice of writing a letter on Sunday, as I conceive that to be an unnecessary work (unless under particular circumstances) and therefore one that ought to be deferred to some other opportunity." To him writing was always somewhat of an effort, a misfortune which earned him many a gentle rebuke: "I must confess you have a little disappointed me, for I am apt to think that persons frequently arrive at a more intimate knowledge of each other's feelings and sentiments from unrestrained epistolary intercourse, than even from the interchange of an equal number of visits." To Eleanor the art of expressing herself came with the greatest readiness; with utmost ease she was able to write at length and entertainingly of the most trivial happenings. After wilfully misreading his rather laboured and contradictory description of his beloved Lincolnshire—"Cannot you take a joke? You know I dearly love to turn anyone's meaning inside out!", and again:

"Think not that I expect to melt you, for had you not been already hardened by three polar winters, you must be now like my tears, and like everything else in this great town, completely frozen. No—every spark of hope is extinguished in my bosom; therefore as willows are out of season—and my garters withal rather the worse for wear—as the Serpentine is frozen over and even the Thames at Waterloo Bridge nearly inaccessible from icebergs—as daggers and poison are too melodramatic; and opening a vein too surgical and unsentimental; and as razors and pistols are somewhat masculine resources and moreover commonplace; I beg to know your pleasure as to the disposal of myself."

Her taste in architecture, her keen interest in all the scientific discoveries of the day, her real enjoyment of all the social gatherings of which she was always the life and soul, and her infectious gaiety, these all ripple joyously from her pen, and one can imagine what delight they brought to the lonely traveller facing such tremendous hazards in the Arctic regions. Considering the diversities it is surprising that only two real difficulties seem to have arisen, both of which concerned those Puritanical principles which must often have been a sore trial to such a buoyant personality. The first was when, contrary to their earlier understanding, he objected to her name being associated with any of her publications (needless to say, this met with the dignified reproof it deserved); and the second was on the vexed question of Sunday observance. If however Franklin's sterling worth appears to suffer for his lack of self-interpretation (this is readily recognised in what it inspires), it is in Eleanor's letters that we get nearer to his fine qualities, yet we must confess we see also a rather surprising tinge of selfishness and readiness to let her bear the brunt of things, though they were ever the most loyal of friends. A disease of long standing, but bravely resisted, took severe toll of this radiant being, and claimed its victim after they had been married but eighteen months, and five days after she had nobly sped him on one of his Arctic voyages, having embroidered his flag with her dying hands.

Not only do these letters reflect with remarkable clarity two interesting personalities, but they throw a very intriguing searchlight on the life of that period, drawing into radius and focusing from a fresh viewpoint various outstanding events and people.

MARY GLADSTONE.*

The diaries and letters of Mary Gladstone (Mrs. Drew) are alive with interest because she was herself a very vital personality, with strong likes and dislikes, with enthusiasms, prejudices and opinions which she put into writing with unpremeditated candour. And they give, as Mrs. Masterman says in a preface, " an unusual, full and panoramic record of that Victorian London that is so fast slipping out of our reach : a London without telephones or motors ; when people travelled ' on the wings of the wind ' in someone's ' lightning brougham ' ; when Alexandra, Princess of Wales, filled the place in public functions now filled by the Duchess of York ; when churches overflowed and Eternal Punishment was a subject of dinner-party conversation ; when Wagner was a forerunner of the Russian ballet as the newest ' highbrow ' dissipation."

The diaries begin in 1870 and, with a gap of seven years after 1904, continue, in more or less amplitude, down to 1924. Some of the entries are scrappy ; there are occasional references to good talks that are not reported ; and now and then meetings with interesting persons of whom we are told nothing but their names. But there is enougn of vivid description, character sketching, table-talk, comment on people and events to make amends for all this. The pictures of home life at Hawarden, and those of the diarist's father, especially in his later years, are graphic and charming. Among the many she liked and admired were Ruskin, Tennyson (with reservations), A. J. Balfour, Lord Rosebery, Parnell (until she was disillusioned by the disclosure of his secret life). Alfred Lyttelton, Burne-Jones and many another, including a host of her women friends ; and chief among her dislikes were Disraeli (she thought his " Lothair " " snobbish and trash ") and Browning. In 1870 she notes :

> " Browning came in afterwards and made himself very agreeable, telling us all sorts of things about George Eliot. He says she has a mind capable of anything, but is easily discouraged. Mr. B. is not altogether a remarkable person to look at, and talks in a rather too self-confident way."

A few years later, describing a dinner at Cambridge, she says she was " handed in by old Browning (disliked him more than ever, we talked about ' The Ring and the Book ' and ' Abt Vogler ') " ; and goes on to mention among those she has seen much of during the week, " R. Browning, whom I liked less than ever. He talks everybody down with his dreadful voice and always places his person in such disagreeable proximity with yours and puffs and blows and spits in yr. face. I tried to think of ' Abt Vogler,' but it was no use—he couldn't ever have written it."

Tennyson impressed her much more favourably, though whenever he visited people or they visited him he seems to have spent a good deal of time in reading his poems to them. He read " Maud " on one occasion : " Lucy was much impressed. He glared at me and explained everything as if I had never heard of it. He also read ' Sir Galahad ' and ' St. Agnes' Eve,' saying ' any fool cd. read them.' " On other occasions he read " Maud " again, and " Harold," " Daisy Miller," the " Morte d'Arthur " ; and even his manners are not always satisfactory : " He makes us a little hot sometimes, says near the wind things, but all in an odd childlike way." Throughout you catch glimpses of all manner of people—of George Augustus Sala, described as a Daily Telegraph reporter, " a rum man " ; of Joseph Chamberlain who " brought loads of orchids and was altogether very pleasant " ; of John Morley, who hates Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle, " and only now believes in the former as a great poet " ; of the Tennant circle—" Margot, aged 18, perhaps the most really pretty and clever of the lot " ; of Shorthouse, author of " John Inglesant," with " an appalling impediment in his speech, really almost like a sort of convulsion " ; of " the flabby limp figure of Oscar Wilde mooning about " ; and a multitude of others. She discusses politics, social and industrial affairs, and criticises books she has read as well as their authors. Her last letter, printed here (1924), speaks with some emphasis of Bernard Shaw's play :

> " How foolish it is of all the world to rave of ' St. Joan ' for lack of someone speaking the truth. When Watts painted Papa, because he was Watts everyone raved, till I went to see it in Christ Church Hall, at Oxford, and said at once, ' It's awful.' Then the Dean echoed me, and one by one all that saw it took up the same tune, and the picture was returned to Watts, who quite agreed and destroyed it ! Someone should show up Bernard Shaw."

You may not always agree with her, but her outspokenness on all subjects, whether she is right or wrong, gives her diaries piquancy as well as interest. They are valuable for their portraits of her contemporaries and for the many shrewd foot-notes to history she jotted down in them.

CLEMENCEAU'S LAST WORDS.*

Two men were chiefly responsible for France's victory in the Great War, Foch, who commanded her armies, and Clemenceau, who organised the nation with unbending resolution and inflexible courage, sweeping aside the weaklings, energising the feeble and stimulating his Allies. Both share the palm and the crown.

Clemenceau when Prime Minister placed Foch in military control of France and secured for him later the supreme command of all the Allied forces on the Western front. Foch proved to the world that Clemenceau had chosen well. Clemenceau defended Foch from the political wolves in the black hours after the disaster of the Chemin des Dames. They had violent differences of opinion, and Foch made no secret of them. During and after the Versailles negotiations, Foch made or permitted more than one open attack on Clemenceau. The politician kept silence. Not until M. Recouly, after the death of Foch, published his memoirs with their bitter criticisms of Clemenceau did the old man reply.

I cannot share the views of those who find in this volume the splenetic outbursts of a defeated politician. Clemenceau writes—please note that he did not start the controversy—with dignity, good humour and sang-froid. He is the most dangerous of all opponents, for he delivers his rapier-like thrusts with an air of the most generous good-will.

What were these great differences that divided the old friends ? The first was over the question of how the supreme command should be used. Clemenceau, having won for Foch the place of Generalissimo on the Western front, wanted Foch to command the Allied forces, to order their leaders, drive them and insist on their obedience. Foch believed that the better way was to influence, to persuade and to win with good-will.

The particular issue where the difference was most acute was over the use of two million men being accumulated by America in France. Clemenceau wanted large sections of these men rushed to the front to relieve the terrible strain on the French armies. General Pershing insisted that the Americans must wait until they could operate as a unit and not fritter their strength away in reinforcing other armies. Foch, with the concurrence of M. Poincaré, assented to this ; Clemenceau raged furiously against it. " Our men were falling, falling ! " France had over a million dead, and millions wounded and disabled. " The blood of our soldiers was flowing in torrents, while two million men who had come over expressly to help them were compelled to wait until our war magnificos should be pleased to think better." Clemenceau maintains that when America struck at the Argonne, within a few weeks of the Armistice, the War was practically over.

* " Grandeur and Misery of Victory." By Georges Clemenceau. 21s. (Harrap.)

Probably Foch was right. I was visiting the American Head-quarters in France in the summer of 1918, when the matter was being fought out, and my own impression then was that under no circumstances would Pershing yield. But everyone recognised the patriotic fervour of Clemenceau's purpose.

The next great difference between the two was over the settlement of Europe after the War. Foch and Clemenceau were agreed in accepting the Armistice, for they both knew that once the military result had been achieved, they had no right to throw away the lives of more men. But Foch dallied with the idea of carrying France's frontiers to the Rhine and of creating a nominally independent state, really under French control, on the Palatine. Clemenceau would have none of it, and his grim story of the massacre of Pirmasens on February 12th, 1924, shows how the movement for an independent Rhineland was killed once and for all.

These controversial matters are, to most of us, the least important part of the book. What is really vital is the frank and delightful revelation of Clemenceau himself and the sidelights on his philosophy of life. One can picture this old man, wonderful in his mid-eighties, writing this book in his modest and peaceful retirement. He had saved France—let there be no forgetting that fact. It was due to him above all others that the embusqués and the half-hearted did not prevail. Often enough, during the darkest days of the War, you would find him in the early morning in the trenches, in the afternoon facing the Chamber, and long into the night battling with his Allies to force them to do more. When he wrote this book the France he saved had for the moment almost forgotten what he had done, and remembered mainly the petty partisan issues of later days.

Clemenceau gives many delightful thumbnail sketches of the Allied statesmen. For Mr. Lloyd George he retained the growling respect which one hard fighter feels for another. He tells the story of President Wilson one day interposing between them with outstretched arms, saying pleasantly, "Well, well; I have never come across two such unreasonable men!" and thus allowing angry argument to end in laughter. He shows us Lord Balfour, "the most cultured, the most gracious, the most courteous of adamantine men." Mr. Bonar Law would, he maintains, have been a first-class Frenchman had he not been wholly British. Lord Robert Cecil he sees as a Christian who believes and is fain to live his belief, with a smile like a Chinese dragon to express a stubborn mind banged, barred and bolted against arguments. Colonel House is to him "a super-civilised person escaped from the wilds of Texas, who sees everything, who understands everything, and while never doing anything but what he thinks fit, knows how to gain the ear and respect of everybody. A good American, very nearly as good as a Frenchman."

M. Clemenceau's real bitterness is kept for later years, the days when, to quote his foot-notes: "America stands revealed as a pitiless creditor," and "England hears a Snowden grossly insulting France for the sake of currying favour with Germany."

Clemenceau, in this message to the world, written with the wings of the Angel of Death already rustling over his head, saw danger ahead for the nation he loved. "Germany is re-arming," he declared, "spending more on military preparations to-day than France does. The Versailles Treaty that was to have secured the peace of Europe for generations has been scandalously mutilated. America has broken our lot in the economic sphere for an indeterminate time. What can we expect from an ideologist whose ideology has run dry, who most generously gives his blood and then seeks compensation in cash?" And yet he does not despair. "I strive to hope against hope, and I am not unaware that out of the corruptions of decadence come possibilities of regeneration. . . . France will be what the men of France deserve."

F. A. MACKENZIE.

AN ENGLISH LABOUR LEADER.*

An Englishman, and a Yorkshireman at that, with all the characteristics of his race, Ben Turner, now at sixty-seven, is a member of the government; as industrious as ever. A kindly, capable man, happy in his family, simple in his tastes, sincere in his convictions. A consistent lover of peace, lifelong in his opposition to international warfare, Mr. Turner in this autobiography has no word of ill-will for anyone whom he has met. He tells the story of an English labour leader's career in our own times; the story of a trade union official attracted to the moderate socialist programme and always ready to serve his fellows on town council and in parliament. (Was he not even secretary to a Yorkshire Fabian Society before joining the I.L.P.?) Quite fearless too in his dealings with friend or foe, and as ready to do a good turn to an enemy—if he has one, which we doubt—as to spend himself on helping a neighbour. No wonder when Mr. Turner was out of parliament, "decent Tories have publicly and privately said they missed me from the place. It wasn't my politics they missed, but perhaps my human attitude to everybody. Every policeman in the House was friendly with me. They are yet." Why not? It is certain Mr. Turner is friendly with them.

Other prominent persons come into this biography. There is Bernard Shaw for instance, writing to Ben Turner for "a few published stories in north country dialect." Mr. Shaw explains that it is for a play about Joan of Arc he wants help. "It is no use making the girl talk like Dr. Johnson; I must devise some sort of dialect for her; and as she was north country I want to found it on our north country talk." Shaw's letters (for there are others) are quite properly "put away as prized family possessions."

There are many good things in this autobiography. The sketches of Yorkshire life fifty years ago, the recollections of the author's boyhood, incidents of strikes and labour disputes. Some of us who knew Ben Turner over thirty years ago find him in this book, as in the portraits it contains, curiously unchanged. It is the same outspoken friend of humanity, the same hopeful lover of literature; a man of happy disposition, who can count his blessings and feel sure, in his cheerful outlook and high ideals, that the world is a vastly better place than when he was young.

JOSEPH CLAYTON.

STRAVINSKY.†

Stravinsky has said that most of the criticism directed against him emanates from England. This short study by Mr. Eric Walter White—which is not much more than an analysis of the composer's major works—hints at the reasons for England's antagonism. The English music-lover is not wont to listen with his brain: to him music is primarily an appeal to the emotions, reached through his senses and not through his intellect. Mr. White makes it clear that Stravinsky's music is as much the outcome of intellectual theorising as cubism in painting is, or imagism in poetry. Sometimes, as in "Petrouschka," a theme of universal appeal has been exploited and chords struck which evoke a sympathetic response in normally musical breasts; but "Petrouschka" is early work, written in 1911, and nothing of Stravinsky's since that date has found a place in the affections of English audiences. There have always been enthusiasts for "Le Sacre du Printemps," and although "Les Noces" was violently attacked by the press when it was first performed in England, there were many defenders of it, among them Mr. H. G. Wells. The more important of his later works, belonging to the Neo-classical period, have not been given in England; only the ballet "Apollo Musagates" has braved the suffrage of the London public. The opera-oratorio, "Œdipus Rex," about which Mr. White writes with convincing enthusiasm, has yet to be produced over here and until we have heard that, the concerto, and the capriccio for piano and orchestra, it is impossible for us to form a true estimate of a composer whose formula undergoes constant changes. For all his Russian roots, Stravinsky's work is the fruit of an intellectualism distinctly French in character and it is not surprising that he finds his most faithful admirers in France.

CITIZEN WILKES.*

We all are Wilkesites nowadays. Time was—and not so long ago—when that very lively Lord Mayor and Member of Parliament was looked at darkly or askance and hastily bracketed by the beardedly superior with Tom Paine, Titus Oates and Beelzebub; but the swing of the balance towards larger views and common sense and better-written history has brought some redemption for him in the popular view, and now it is generally recognised that while still he was as witty and impudent a profligate as his or any age produced, he yet—beginning by accident as he himself confessed—laid some of the surest foundations of British liberty and struck hard at the system of privileges which cursed political life in the days of Walpole; though the influence of Sir Robert was probably not quite so corrupt as Mr. Postgate appears to believe. This is a very excellent book. Delving ingeniously as well as industriously in the records, and bringing to light points and information which, although available to biographers of Wilkes, have been generally overlooked, he has managed to impart freshness of facts and thought to a theme that we had believed was seriously overworked. The least happy page of the book is that of the title. "That Devil Wilkes" doubtless was an honest sentiment of Farmer George; but it was no more inspired than any other utterance of those royal lips and is hardly appropriate to this volume, having a needlessly belittling effect.

While Mr. Postgate adds nothing positively new to the information already printed about John Wilkes, he has brought his sinuous figure and curious face into an added prominence by painting carefully the background of the stage on which he acted his public part, and by making more definite the peculiar social atmosphere of the times. It is in these respects that this volume stands out from the other works in the small library that has been written about Wilkes in recent years. The ignorance of those days was appalling; and the manners of the general populace worse than dreadful. Open and base ridicule was cast on passers-by whose appearance seemed eccentric to the coarse fools who flouted them; and this at a period when eccentricities were elaborately cultivated by the fops and fribbles of fashion who strutted and posed for their gilded hour. London and the great cities stank, and the highways in wintry or rainy seasons were an endless quagmire; these and other similar disadvantages making the agitations of Wilkes's campaigns the more difficult and his extraordinary popularity with the mass of the people therefore the more striking. It is the easiest thing in the world to forget the pains and disadvantages our forefathers endured less than a hundred and fifty years ago. Yet a true account of the times of the earlier Georges brings excuse for the follies and mad extravagance of Wilkes, and make clearer stil' the debt we owe him for the successful fight he made for those rights and liberties of citizenship and humanity which, won for this country, have also in some measure helped all the free democracies of the world.

On the whole Mr. Postgate's is a genial portrait of the man. He sees the blotches and blemishes—to which indeed no historian worth his salt could be blind—but he recognises also that, with his upbringing and his wretched marriage, Wilkes was handicapped from the start, and is entitled to fairer play than formerly was allowed to him. He was not an unkind man, and although he hit hard where and when it would hurt the most, he preserved a sense of humour, which however did not greatly amuse or fortify the adversary assailed. His methods in fighting duels, as in the less personally dangerous but more exacting battles of his public life, were scrupulously according to the rules; so that if Wilkes was not precisely a gentleman, he behaved very like one at crises, and sometimes a great deal better than the titled persons with whom he fought. And it is pleasant to know that, hard as they had opposed each other, in the end, when Wilkes, like other "lost leaders," had softened and was weary of right doing in his sometimes wrong ways, and went to court, he exchanged friendly words with the old King who had bitterly hated him and whom he had vexed and troubled so seriously and persistently.

The brightness of the book is added to by its author's passing private judgments; as on the Lord Mayors and the City Corporation of later days, and on the quality of the claret at Chesham.

A TELLER OF TALES.

Mr. A. E. Coppard has been at it again, and the news will be welcome to the ever increasing circle of his readers. Of the three books recently issued under his name, one is a privately printed brochure containing his fairy tale, "The Gollan."[1] This gollan or gosling was the son of a swineherd, and grew up to be a great powerful fellow, but because of his strength and of his inability to say "No," he was always at the beck and call of everyone else. At length he did a good turn to a leprecaun, who rewarded the gollan by bestowing on him the gift of invisibility except when asleep. And now you have all the necessary ingredients for the Coppardian fantasy which follows, a wise and whimsical tale which in its dénouement draws close to the realm of fable.

"Unseen, unknown, the good Gollan lived on for many years in great privation, and when he at last came to die (though nobody knew even about that) he had grown mercifully wise and wrote his own epitaph—though nobody ever saw it:
"To choose was my need, but need brooks no choosing."

The second book from Mr. Coppard's officina scriptoris

[1] "The Gollan," printed for Earl and Florence Fisk.—[2] "The Man from Kilsheelan." Limited edition, signed. 10s. 6d. (Jackson.)—[3] "Pink Furniture." 7s. 6d. (Jonathan Cape.)

is one of the "Furnival Books," a new series of slim but handsome limited editions. The story of "The Man from Kilsheelan"[2] is itself not new—it appeared in 1925 in "The Black Dog"—but for reprinting it has been somewhat amended and endowed with a lively preface. In this the author avers that he would have no qualms whatever about rewriting periodically all that he has ever written, but in the case of A. E. Coppard at any rate let us hope that the task will never be attempted. The man who came from Kilsheelan and his companion, Tom Tool, two old Irish peasants escaped from an asylum, are characters so well drawn that even an experienced Irish critic, who knew not his Coppard, hailed the writer with joy as a countryman of his own.

"The Man from Kilsheelan" is the story of a tragedy, but the reader certainly will not find it to be a tragic story.

It has often been a matter of surmise whether A. E. Coppard would ever extend his sphere of activity from the short story to the novel. In "Pink Furniture"[3] he has very nearly answered the query, for the two hundred and fifty odd pages of this book contain one of the most delightful stories for children, young and old, that the present century has produced. In the third chapter of the book, Toby Tottel sets off on his wanderings in search of the pink furniture of his dream, and in the twenty-ninth he returns home to find it there. But the intervening chapters afford Mr. Coppard innumerable opportunities to display his command of the folk-tale, his fantastic humour and his unequalled grace of vocabulary and style. Here are all the types of character dear to the heart of youth, a pirate chief, a fairy princess, a piping faun, an infallible sleuth (Toby Tottel himself), a faithful maiden, and a giant so big and strong that he can lift a river from its bed and twine it round his neck like a scarf. From first to last "Pink Furniture" has not a dull paragraph, much less a dull page, and for the "very young" or for the "rather older" we can imagine no greater treat than to have this book gradually read through to them. They will take their own meaning out of what they hear, but at times—we have no doubt—the reader, while sharing all their pleasure, will be stirred by thoughts of a different, a deeper kind. And interspersed throughout the book both reader and hearers will be charmed to find some of those swinging lyrics which Mr. Coppard knows so well how to write.

Yes, "Pink Furniture" is a book, not to borrow, but to keep.

ALL OVER THE WORLD.*

"But there was always excitement in the air," said Mrs. Cole. One would think so. Albeit the islands of the Philippine group where she and her anthropological husband went are gems of tropic vegetation, yet the fauna is not always desirable. She relates how another American scientist, with whom the natives appeared to be on the most friendly terms, was foully done to death—and with no reason that one could ascertain. Of course he may have offended in a perfectly unconscious manner one of their tribal regulations. "Someone is dead," called Juan, as he started down the steps, "and people can ask the man who it is." "It is only a poor man," he explained when he returned a quarter of an hour later, "if he had been rich the church bells would have rung and there would have been feasting and celebrating." Juan was the Coles's admirable servant; he made life as smooth for them as in that region was possible, and the account of it is extremely interesting.

Interesting also is Mr. Harold Armstrong's book on the modern Turkey and Syria. He knew them before and he illuminates his pages with the contrasts he is able to draw. On this journey, undertaken in 1927, he went as one of the delegates of the Commission for Assessment of War Damage. His actual task was not easy; Armenians, for example, had been murdered in Adana and it was too much to expect that those responsible, for instance Ahmed the Seller of Sweetmeats, would furnish all the particulars, seeing that they had inherited the property. The Armenians did not make things any easier. One of them who lived in Cyprus had proved to the author with a wealth of verbal evidence that he had lost £60,000 in rope and sacking. The author found his shop in the Covered Bazaar; it was the size of a coffee-stall and Mr. Armstrong calculated that, to have suffered such a loss, he would have had to have stored some 1,100,000 odd sacks alone, without considering rope. Eventually he got £50. Angrily he said he should have had £60. "But you asked for £60,000," he was told. "That's nothing," he replied with a shrug of his shoulders, "my lawyer just added a few noughts." Mr. Armstrong is very outspoken as to the anti-French sentiments in Syria; and he is rather despondent about Angora. He supplies us with a great deal of information, that we would not willingly be without, on such topics as Druses, Maronites, Kurds, Nusairi and so forth. Perhaps the episode of Blanche the Dancer was put in as a sop to us and the writing is at times strangely stilted; mostly it is straightforward and even picturesque.

Richard Halliburton is a young American who goes forth adventuring. One is rather disinclined to follow the recital thereof when we discover that he takes a seaplane in order to land on the island first seen by Columbus in the New World, subsequently marching in the very tracks of Cortez, and so forth. There seems in all this to be an excessive amount of pose, of self-consciousness. And the familiar style, calling the great Mexican volcano by the abbreviation of Popo and referring to Cortez's "come-back," does not impress very favourably. Yet in the end we rather succumb, for Mr. Haliburton has a pretty sense of humour and he really did do the most dare-devil things, such as diving into the celebrated sacrificial pool—a dive of seventy feet—in Yucatan. And he tells us that the packet of cigarettes in his pocket was never the same again. All over Central and South America he performed his deeds of derring-do, and the reading of them is as if we were inhaling a great torrent of ozone.

One of the most remarkable things about Mr. Crosbie Garstin's book is its price. Heaven knows how the publishers do it. Here we have a book of nearly 350 pages, with a number of illustrations—and very good they are—all for five shillings. Talking of the illustrations, which are line drawings made by the author, that of San Francisco "visiting his home-town" and being bewildered by the traffic is alone worth the five shillings. Many of the others are a joy. Mr. Garstin is a gentleman of parts. This book appears to have been first published in 1928 and to be now made accessible in a cheaper edition by the benevolent firm of Heinemann. It is a humorous book without being in the least depressing. In fact it is one that the lover of "Innocents Abroad" would enjoy. He tells of a French private in the Colonial Infantry who was being sent up to Laskai by way of punishment. "See here, my child," said the colonel, "if you would mend your ways and give up drink you might become a corporal." "My colonel," he had replied, "when I am drunk I think I am a general." And there are many other excellent stories. You will see that this is very much a book to buy.

So, most certainly, is "Europe in Zig-Zags." We follow the uncle of Europe, as Mr. Huddlestone is usually called, and we follow with delight. He is so urbane, so well-informed and he says shrewd, even nasty, things so nicely. Of the Spanish army: "This incompetent army," he says, "broken and disgraced, nevertheless pretended to govern. It could not subdue the Riffans, but it could suppress the aspirations towards freedom of the Spanish. It gave its support to the authorities, on condition that its commands

ASSORTED ARTICLES.*

Very soon after his death there appeared a tiny pamphlet of bitter poems over Lawrence's name called Nettles' One saw the tortured man, provoked by a seemingly wilful and wronging world, slashing about him with a sheaf of this stinging weed, and the sight did not exactly increase one's love of mankind in general Nor was the matter mended much by the knowledge that, because of the fortuitous publicity afforded Lawrence at his death, hundreds were buying his books who, while he was alive, had never so much as given him a thought

Genius however is often carried into its own on the most unaccountable tides Since therefore men and women are at last reading Lawrence's books, it is as well that they should read them to some purpose To that end I would put this new volume, Assorted Articles, into the hands of all who are now approaching Lawrence for the first time They could be given no better key to his mind The book is, in effect, his apologia Dated the month before his death it provides a fine and explicit introduction to the philosophy that all his later work was designed to express If you do not relish that philosophy as you find it lucidly and very simply expressed in these articles, you will not relish it in his stories and novels Here in fact is the raw material out of which he wrought all his later art The book begins with an essay or two lightly analytical of the modern young woman, it continues, through the study of men and England to-day, to the study of modern civilisation in general, and it ends with a few studies, or sketches of a more strictly autobiographical nature

What Lawrence chiefly deplored, as he looked about him, was the diseased, atrophied condition of the intuitive faculties in the men and women of to-day In his view, intuition was the mainspring of all vital conduct of life Where intuition was atrophied, life could never flower freely Intuition, as he defined it, was "the intelligence that goes with sex and beauty and arises out of sex and beauty" In other words, it has its roots essentially in the physical, and it is Lawrence's loud complaint against our modern civilisation that its trend "is towards a greater and greater abstraction from the physical, towards a further and further physical separateness between men and women, and between individual and individual'

In a word Lawrence viewed modern life, as expressed in its most westernising phases, as a vast and evil conspiracy to deny man's one sure guide to a natural behaviour—his intuition Deprived of this proper guide, man's intellect gallops away with him and his feelings run amok Ashamed of his individuality, he indulges in mass-thinking until he is in danger of being unable to think for himself at all His natural responses to life are so feeble that he must needs fortify them by trying to find a 'point' for everything What is the point of it all? he asks, forgetting that (as Lawrence replies) 'life and love are life and love a bunch of violets is a bunch of violets, and to drag in the idea of a point is to ruin everything"

Such then is roughly Lawrence's diagnosis of the disease that is eating at the heart of modern civilisation In nothing that he wrote has that diagnosis been quite so simply stated as in these articles which were mainly written for the newspapers It would be unfair to scrutinise them for their logic they are a plea for the intuition and they have poured from an intuitional pen. Their method more nearly approaches that of a Mark Antony than the rapier method of an intellectual Indeed there is even a hint of the "revivalist" in this later Lawrence An image or a symbol jumps to his mind and he thereupon proceeds to hammer away with it until, willy-nilly, it has sunk into the reader's consciousness More than in his novels and stories there is here a considerable gleam of humour—a gaiety, rather that tropical forest-gloom into which he is usually so ready to plunge his readers is entirely absent

''But you'll wear out said I 'Not if anybody's a good dancer and will wind me up' she said 'But are you happy?' said I 'Mother's always saying that Why should anybody on earth want to be happy? I say to mother 'Show me somebody happy then!' And she shows me some guy, or some bright young thing and gets mad when I say See the pretty monkey! I'm not happy thank God because I'm not anything Why should I be?

The autobiographical sketches in this volume reveal one at least of the reasons why Lawrence was driven to the formulation and adoption of his philosophy He was not what is known as a good mixer' I don't feel there is any very cordial or fundamental contact between me and society, or me and other people There is a breach And my contact is with something that is non-human, non vocal That being so, he tended to withdraw himself apart contenting himself with what he called the human flow that came to him from those people outside him, whose intuitions like his own were live at the source That explains of course why he felt so much more at home in the Latin South Nevertheless, just in this non-mixer quality, which drove him into the adoption of his philosophy, lies that philosophy's weakness Mankind is not in quite the sorry state Lawrence imagined it to be—as he would perhaps have discovered had he come into warmer, closer contact with people, keeping his ideals, yet tethering them to the common contacts of every day

THE SECRET OF 37, HARDY STREET. By R J Casey 7s 6d (Elkin Mathews & Marrot)

Who should write a thoroughly exciting thriller as well as Mr Casey, who has had such great experience of adventure in his own life as traveller in lonely places, as legionnaire, and as artilleryman in the American Army? We would without hesitation buy a copy of this capital mystery tale as a gift to the most exacting and captious detective story maniac that we know Why did Cyrus Bradley perish? Why was he found in a dining-room chair at the end of a long oak table? Why were four cups containing the dregs of coffee not long cold found on the table, and why did the bits of toast on the plates when joined together make one piece exactly? And why did the murdered man's daughter when questioned crumple up in a faint? A patch of white was near the plate that had been set for Cyrus Bradley at the phantom breakfast—face powder! But the girl was not guilty It was not nearly so simple as that A most desperate criminal is involved The different stages of the story are all set by a most competent hand.

THE KNIFE BEHIND THE CURTAIN. By Valentine Williams. 7s 6d (Hodder & Stoughton)

The most amazing thing about Mr. Valentine Williams's collection of short stories is the variety of them. Surely no present-day writer is more prolific with plots. You may read the whole baker's dozen through at a sitting Portrait by Elliott & Fry. Mr. Valentine Williams.

(and you are tempted to, they are all so good) and not once will you find an idea repeated nor a theme rehashed. A few of the stories have the War for background—"The Pigeon Man" is one of the most artistic in the book—but Mr. Williams does not need the War to furnish him with material for excitement and sensation. He finds both just as easily in Egypt, New York, or a jeweller's shop in Bond Street. If you are one of those persons who harbour a prejudice against collections of short stories, read Mr. Williams's—and you will be converted!

WHITE JADE. By Maude Meagher. 6s. (Scholartis Press.)

Yang Kuei-fei, the Helen of the East, has been lauded by Chinese poets down the centuries, and Miss Maude Meagher here tells her story in prose that is akin to poetry. Some few years after her beauty had wrecked the Chinese Empire, and she herself, the Emperor's concubine, had been hanged in a village near the centre of China, two young students set out to explore the story of her magic. "We made a vow that although all the rest of the world might hate Yang Keui-fei, we two would adore her," said Chu-i, "and every year since then we have come together to burn happiness-candles on the day of her meeting in the sky with the Bright Emperor." Dead, after being beloved by the Emperor for more than twenty years, she still lived for those two friends; and though she has been dead nearly twelve hundred years, Miss Meagher, in a novel of rare charm, brings her to life again and makes us feel her spell. "The historians and moralists of China condemn her," we are told. "But poets worship her. In her small body were the seeds of dream, as potent after as before its death." The book will delight all who appreciate beauty combined with originality.

ÆSOP DANCING. By J. E. Buckrose. 7s. 6d. (Nash & Grayson.)

Readers will always come to a new novel by this writer with pleasant expectations securely based on agreeable experiences in the past. We are the more grieved to confess that we have read this volume with some regret. When an author deliberately chooses literary biography as the subject of a novel, the result cannot be judged only as a novel. Mrs. Buckrose has given us what is practically a life of Goldsmith, and we cannot think she has given us a true portrait. It would appear that she has been influenced overmuch by Boswell's jealous depreciation, so that while loving Goldsmith she has unconsciously belittled her hero. Garrick's epigram has overpowered her judgment as it has that of countless others, and it is well to remember that Poor Poll was quite able to avenge himself in the most scathing lines ever written on the vanity of mummers. There are many sides of Goldsmith not reflected here, and most of all we miss the wit and the humour. Mrs. Buckrose has written a most readable book, and we must not, we suppose, consider it too closely as a memoir. But when one of the very greatest writers of English prose appears as the hero of a sentimental romance, with the title of "Æsop Dancing,' there are some even of the least judicious who must grieve.

RELENTLESS. By Myrtle Johnston. 7s. 6d. net. (John Murray.)

This is another clever and unusual novel by the author of "Hanging Johnny." It relates the life-story of Oscar Berenger, a neurotic wastrel, who saves his manhood by fleeing to Siberia, where his father had earned fame as an explorer. The finest part of the book describes the quarter of a century spent by Berenger in Ghoyak, where he and his English wife endured incredible hardships as members of a native tribe of which he ultimately became the elected chief. The miserable degenerate developed into a giant physically, but became little more than a savage. His problems appeared as his six children grew up and began to evince a desire to know the world outside. This craving in time defeated the savage opposition of the father, and the closing chapters of the novel depict the family in London—Berenger longing to return to Siberia, and his children revelling in the marvels of civilised society. Again the family triumphs over paternal authority, but not without murder and death as the penalty. It is a virile and arresting book, and it is to the author's credit that while many of the incidents are stark and brutal she obtains her full effect with a style of dignity and correctness. The underlying problem is one of great interest, and Miss Johnston has handled it with conspicuous ability and distinction.

BELLS OF THYME. By Catherine I. Dodd. 7s. 6d. (Jarrolds.)

Miss Dodd has more than atoned for any disappointment we may have felt over "Apples and Quinces." Her latest book radiates a delightful old-world charm, and is generously filled with the fragrant scents of the woods and orchards and delights of the country-side. These in glowing pictures form an alluring background for the daily happenings in a small German university town, during the earliest days of woman's emancipation. The curious complexity of nationalities to be met with in such a town, and in particular the quaintly assorted party which gathered daily round the lovable little Frau Doktor's table, give excellent scope for the interplay and unfolding of diverse opinions. It is Miranda, the English girl, seeking to heal her own wounds, who draws them all out with her ready sympathy. The gossip at the table, the lectures, picnics, festivals, etc., all are joyously depicted. With graceful ease, Miss Dodd allows a light and whimsical touch to dissemble the knowledge and spade work involved.

SINGERMANN. By Myron Brinig. 8s. 6d. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

The publishers of this book, with unusual reticence, give us no clue to the identity of Myron Brinig. We are not told whether he is a young man, or an old man who has been hiding his light under a bushel. That he is a Jew is clear; that he is probably, like his chief characters, an American of Rumanian extraction may be deduced from internal evidence. Whatever his age, whatever his race, he is clearly a born writer, with the rare power—akin to that of D. H. Lawrence—of being able to invest petty and even squalid details with beauty. "Singermann" is a very long story of a Rumanian Jew, Moses, who with his wife, Rebecca, emigrated to America in the days when bustles were fashionable, and opened a general store. Seven children are born to them and the novel deals with their lives, their love affairs, their drifting away from the faith of their father, their absorption into the melting-pot which is America. Most of the characters in the story, and all the important ones, are Jews, but nevertheless "Singermann" is not a story of Jews but of human beings, seen with an unusual largeness of vision and expressed with peculiar skill.

The Bookman's Table.

SOBER TRUTH: A COLLECTION OF NINETEENTH-CENTURY EPISODES, FANTASTIC, GROTESQUE AND MYSTERIOUS. Compiled and edited by Margaret Barton and Osbert Sitwell. With a Preface by Osbert Sitwell. 12s. 6d. (Duckworth.)

The colossal credulity of mankind is almost too appalling to be amusing; yet amusing it assuredly is. This book, while not always adroit in the putting together, provides excellent entertainment, although the general ignorance, the charlatanry and daring or impudent humbug, the shabbiness and showiness that it exposes are enough to make one wonder whether Father Adam had anything at all of the divine in him but was mere animal, especially endowed with gifts for swindling and a weakness for being deceived. Better in any case to treat it as a joke and laugh —at what? According to Mr. Sitwell in his preface, at the Nineteenth Century! But of course that is wrong. No century is to blame for it. Men have been quacks and rogues, gulls, fools—heroes and saints—through all the centuries. It is therefore enough for us to smile, not too unkindly, at the ape that is a part of ourselves, and so take at their true value, more or less, such portentous curiosities as are exhibited in the gallanty-show of human life: including amongst them as here we are shown Louis Napoleon, General Tom Thumb and his lady, King Cristophe of Haiti, that magnificent, grotesque negro who, for a time, was able to indulge in his island the absurd glories of court life at their absurdest; Joanna Southcott, Home the Spiritualist, Tichborne, the Siamese Twins, Jack the Ripper, and the multitudinous families of Brigham Young, with Mermaids thrown in; and while we are about it, the Sea-serpent, which may truly have been the last survivor of the monsters of prehistory, conveniently forgetting for the moment the crocodiles and rhinoceri that still are unpleasantly with us; and Princess Caraboo, and Louis de Rougemont. As de Rougemont was not tall, lank or stooping, endowed with long thin hair, or calm or philosophical of face, it was certainly not he whom Mr. Sitwell saw selling matches in Piccadilly or Shaftesbury Avenue. That amusing and somewhat innocent charlatan was not brought to such extremity; but was able to return from England to his native Switzerland with money in his pockets.

LORD HENRY BENTINCKS'S FOXHOUNDS. Compiled by Lord Charles Bentinck. 21s. (Hutchinson.)

Such another pack of foxhounds as those bred by Lord Henry surely never existed, and here his descendant has performed a pious and interesting duty. For this is a history of the pack, and contains a record of Lord Henry's dogs in their correct order, according to the modern system of tabulation. We very much enjoy the amusing names, and the occasional entries under the column headed "Remarks." "Waterloo"; Sire, Duke of Beaufort's "Warbler"; Dam, Lord Ducies's "Jezebel," is briefly described as "rank rogue." "Careless"; Sire, Mr. Foljambe's "Fleecer"; Dam, his "Conquest," stands out to the life in these words: "A most trimming animal for nose, stoutness and pace, turned rogue at four years old." And as for "Despot," offspring of "Duster" and "Modish," he "promised well but ended in getting wide." Lord Henry began by being Master of the Rufford Hounds in 1835; a few years later he became Master of the Burton. His hounds were so well thought of and so much used by contemporary Masters, that most well-bred foxhounds to-day have their blood in their veins. Brains went to the making of this brilliant pack, and it must have been a delightful labour of love to set forth these detailed records and pedigrees, and to collect the charming and handsome pictures of men and dogs that we find in this carefully planned volume.

THE CRADLE OF GOD. By Llewelyn Powys. 10s. 6d. net. (Jonathan Cape.)

"Christian arguments" (writes Mr. Powys in his latest book) "are false arguments, Christian thoughts shallow thoughts; yet, even so, these prayerful madcaps have hold perhaps of some invisible clue denied to ruder natures." So in search of that clue he went to Palestine. "If I myself could hold in the cup of my hand the dusty soil of the Mount of Olives, then perhaps I would come to a juster understanding of these incredible impossibilities." One does not feel however, as the last page recording those journeyings is turned, that Mr. Powys has found the clue. Pagan when he set out, he still returned a pagan. A pagan however with a difference—the difference of a poet returned from having faced, nobly and without blinking, a great experience. In this book he does not tell his adventures (these he leaves for another time), but instead he tells over again, from his own most individual angle, the story of the Bible, from Abraham's "invention" of God to the death of Christ upon the cross. With his sensitive eye upon the actual setting, he describes those familiar-unfamiliar scenes anew—so that often it is as if one were seeing with all the veracity of a good photographic film a scene hitherto known only within the dim realm of the imagination. Pagan and "unbeliever" as he was, and remained, his is no dispassionate description of the sacred history. For Mr. Powys is a poet, and the loaded beauty of those ancient histories touches him to noble flights. Like all Mr. Powys's books, "The Cradle of God" is intensely personal, in the finest sense; it is in fact nothing less than his own spiritual explorations among the tracts we all must explore in our sincerest moments.

CHRIST IN THE SYNAGOGUE. By L. Aaronson. 12s. 6d. (Gollancz.)

Properly to examine this extensive collection of poems, the fruit of a decade of composition, would require a much more extensive article than is here possible. For Mr. Aaronson writes in every mood, on every theme and in a vast variety of forms. "This poetry," we are told in a long note on the dust-jacket of a handsome volume, a note for which the publisher is responsible but the poet himself must surely have suggested the trend, "this poetry is not afraid of rhetoric, exuberance, 'bad taste,' ungentlemanly excitement of feeling and even obscurity, where the tension demands the communication of the poem in its very making." There are romantic ardours in it, crepuscular melancholy, modern cynicism. Much of it is obscure, with the obscurity of the elliptical and those disconcerting metaphors which the moderns love. To read it continuously, as we are recommended to do, is to be bewildered by the twists and turns of Mr. Aaronson's mind. It is difficult to determine whether that mind is settled in an extraordinary complexity or is still rather feverishly seeking its ultinate orientation. But there is no doubt of its vitality, its sincerity or its intrepidity, or of Mr. Aaronson's accomplishment as a writer, his sense of the beauty and significance of words. When his poetry arouses disapproval—æsthetic, that is, not moral disapproval—it is not by any clumsiness but by its strangeness, and it is clear that it must be read carefully and often to be justly appreciated. Scanty quotation would but misrepresent it, but one complete piece shall be given, one of those of which the appeal is most immediate, as evidence of its purely literary quality:

"I have defied the sun! plucked sprigs of blackthorn
From high thin hedgerows in the winds of March,
And laid their trembling immaturity
Upon the grass still Autumn-sad with leaves.
My fingers and my eyes have stroked their white
Frail petals, moist and mute, and kissed the buds
That never shall be pierced by the sun,
And open to its treacheries of touch,
As human hearts have opened in their season
And withered in their season. . . .
I have laughed
To see the flowers dying with their dreams
All folded-in like a young girl's secret hopes,
Trembling faintly in the first Spring days."

A WAYFARER IN BAVARIA. By Suzanne St. Barbe Baker.

A WAYFARER ON THE RHINE. By Malcolm Letts. 7s. 6d. each. (Methuen.)

For more than one reason these two books make a most timely appearance. With the welcome advent of spring, projects for holidays once more assume a prominent place in the scheme of things. In his journeyings up by road from Cologne to Speyer and down by water, Mr. Letts offers great enticement in the discovery of many little known and attractive districts. He has embellished his "liquid history" with a rich diversity of interests, and it is with many glimpses into its glamorous past that he quickens the attractions of to-day. Hermann Weinsberg, the German Pepys, is only one of the many delightful digressions by the way. It is not difficult to understand Mr. Letts's obvious devotion to the Rhine after perusing his picturesque descriptions. It speaks much for the attractive wealth of Bavaria that Miss Baker has only devoted twelve pages to the famous Passion Play at Oberammergau, which this year will draw thousands of people from all parts of the world. Apart from this unique interest there is an amazing amount of varied appeal. Bayreuth, the Mecca of music-lovers, the priceless art treasures, statuary, architecture, etc., sufficient in themselves to lure the traveller irresistibly; the majestic beauty of its mountains, the romance of its exquisite valleys and lakes, round which linger so many captivating legends. Whether it is Passion Play year or not (and, by the way, we are under the impression that a good many more performances are given than Miss Baker suggests) Bavaria is a land of enchantment which she has admirably interpreted Both volumes are generously and excellently illustrated

Books of the Month.

From March 15th to April 15th.

(Books reviewed in this Number are not included in list.)

Barrie was born in a countryside of beauty and romance and battles long ago but it was bent backed weavers toiling at their looms and arguing about the destiny of Church and State that provided him with material for his pen says Mr John Kennedy in THRUMS AND THE BARRIE COUNTRY (6s, Heath Cranton) a very interesting account of the country made famous by Barrie's books He gives us an intimate picture of Thrums the old time Kirriemuir known to Margaret Ogilvy and looked at through her eyes for Barrie drew most of his reminiscences from her and of Barrie's early surroundings and influences All Barrie lovers will appreciate this book It is illustrated with several photographs

"If my achievement be maddeningly inadequate compared even with my own conception and inspiration nevertheless for the sake of peace I must press on," says Brent of Bin Bin in his preface to TEN CREEKS RUN (7s 6d, Blackwood) He need have no fear as to whether nor not he has conveyed the real spirit of the Australian Bush The whole book is instinct with the vigorous atmosphere which belongs to the open-air life of the ranch Its sympathetic understanding of horses is no less keen than that of the humans It is only when the book closes one realises to what extent the little community round Ten Creeks Run has captured the imagination with its zestful activities

Having offered an engaging apology for his youth—"I am eighteen years old"—Mr Somerset de Chaire proceeds, in THE IMPENDING STORM (5s, Constable), to justify the Psalmist The catastrophe of his title is another and greater war, for he believes that "everywhere the patchwork of peace is falling to bits" and that America and France have been drifting apart ever since the War as a result of America's financial imperialism" In view of that conviction, it is logical to reach the conclusion that an all-round cancellation of debts would benefit all nations, including the United States Meantime the omens are not propitious, and the next war will be far more terrible because all the means of destruction will have been intensified The only hope, according to our youthful mentor, is in the formation of the United States of Europe and a peaceful world state as the final outcome The little book is an earnest and well-reasoned contribution to the study of international politics

Having inspired numerous books of travel in recent years the largest of the Balearic Islands appears to be now engaging the attention of writers of fiction In THE GOLDEN ISLE, by Dorothy M Fisk (7s 6d, Methuen), the background is at times allowed to dominate the story; yet there is a certain adroitness in the manner in which the sights of Majorca are utilised to further the romance of the hero and war-widow heroine There is nothing pretentious about the development of that romance, and, inasmuch as George and Margaret are of too mature age and experience to be misled by unreasoning passion, the love-making is pitched in a low key But the story is not the less attractive on that account Indeed the restraint and unhurried spirit in which the happy climax is reached are a faithful reflection of the manana atmosphere of the peaceful island in which the scenes are laid Topographically, it might be objected that the Almundania has got strangely out of place beside the Lonja, and that delicate spires seem hardly the words to describe the somewhat stunted finials of Palma Cathedral

Howe, Rodney, Sidney Smith, Camelford and Napier are the sailors of genius about whom Mr Brian Tunstall has written in his entertaining volume, FLIGHTS OF NAVAL GENIUS, with illustrations (12s 6d, Philip Allan) Perhaps it is misleading to use the word entertaining at the beginning of a notice of the book, for no implication of mere surface-treatment is intended But all the same these five biographies are entertaining as well as admirably sincere, impartial, and thoughtfully written Of Howe, the brilliant young sailor in prolonged wars, the more mature intellect that dealt with technical seamanship, the yet remembered hero of the Glorious First of June we read here first as an old and suffering man, but one ready to deal with mutinous schemes and bring them to an harmonious conclusion Of Rodney's courage, anger, ill-treatment, difficulties, of Sidney Smith's impetuous actions and humane schemes, of Camelford's somewhat tumultuous life and death of Napier's achievements and disappointments, Mr Tunstall writes in such a manner and with such authority and knowledge that the heroes come to life again under his pen, and we realise afresh the greatness of the men the dangers and adventures they faced, the unquestionable proofs of their ability and fidelity The difficulties of an admiral to-day are not the difficulties of yesterday, and Mr Tunstall has done good service in shewing the men, and the sea-life of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries in such a vivid and accurate manner The portraits of these men of genius are reproductions from famous portraits

The Collector

" Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—BURTON

ASSOCIATION BOOKS.

THERE is an aspect of book-collecting that is extraordinarily interesting. Strictly speaking, it is subsidiary to book-collecting; a side-show, shall we say? But it is very alluring for all that. In fact, I am inclined to think that book-collecting only reaches its highest and most attractive condition if the collector adds the making of association books to it.

Almost everybody these days knows what is meant by the making of association books, although the understanding of it has come in recent years. It was not so long since that only the few, the expert and the experienced book-collector, knew anything about it, or understood exactly what it meant. But the business of it has grown so rapidly, and we have heard so much about it at sales, and in special articles, that the average man, and especially the ordinary book-collector, is now fully aware of its meaning. Moreover, we may examine few modern catalogues and fail to find a section given to it. As a matter of fact, many booksellers issue special catalogues devoted entirely to association books.

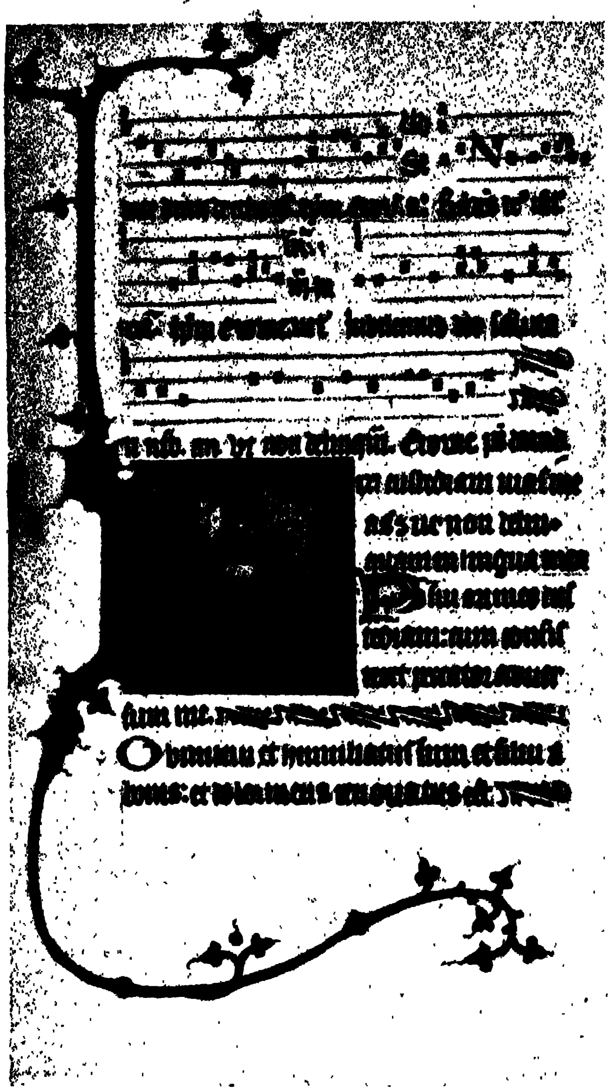
Time was, when the only adjunct to a mild interest in book-collecting—only the rich and the wise indulged in it in those early days—was that of extra-illustrating, or grangerising, as the professionals had it. That is not so popular in these modern times. Association book-making may have largely taken its place; although I believe extra-illustrating will revive before long. Mr. Clive Holland gave us an extremely interesting article on Grangerising in THE BOOKMAN for April. It was very helpful and informative.



This interest in association books is growing apace; and a very justifiable interest it is. There can never be any lessening of entertainment, if I may so call it, in book-collecting; and it can be added to a hundredfold if the building up of association books is indulged in. I call it a building because that is really what it is. Always the chase is a fascinating affair; and if we go about it intelligently, it can give us the highest possible form of enjoyment. As time passes we become adept in it, and realise the untold and unknown thrills that it brings to our task. As we pursue it we are deeply conscious of its wonderful possibilities. It matures our book-collecting habit; it widens our literary horizon, and opens up new fields of thought and pleasure.

Fortunately it need not be limited to those of us whose pockets are deep. That is the quintessence of the pleasure we derive from book-collecting of any kind. Granted that most of us are never likely to be in a position to purchase, shall I say, all the first editions of Mr. Kipling's books; or the original manuscripts, if they were obtainable, of all the books by Charles Dickens. But all of us can, if we have learned the art to judge an early writer's work, buy a first edition here and there, and add a modest association item to it, if we have the vision and the foresight to do so. The democracy of book-collecting makes it one of those joys that turn the grey world with its everlasting grind of wage-earning, into a realm of beautiful and permanent reality, that has no equal in any other walk of life. Wise book-collecting is a valuable interest—pursuit—entertainment—study, or whatever name suits the taste and tendency of the individual. When we add association book-making to our book-collecting, we at once have a new source of interest which is more rich in attractions than is any other form of book-collecting. There is, in itself, the sheer fascination of it. Moreover, the extent of our success is governed by the height of our intelligence. This intelligence can spring only from the literary knowledge that, by dint of close concentration and persistent contemplation, we have established in our mind. If we have approached literary evaluation by a sure and certain process, we shall have laid down such a basis of standardisation as shall enable us, in the first place, to collect those authors who are worthy of a place upon our shelves; and secondly, there will come, in natural sequence, reliable conceptions as to what we shall add to them in the way of association books.

Indeed, this good and pleasant work of association making gives our carefully selected books only such value as our understanding shall dictate to us. Commercially, the value is definite. It may represent a few shillings to begin with; it may some day add a great many pounds to the price we paid for the volume. Here in front of me are two entries of Sir James Barrie's "When a Man's Single." The price of one, without an autograph, is £120. The other, bearing but a bare presentation autograph of the author, is priced at £150. Ordinary first edition books by authors who are moderately collected, having the autograph of the writers, would possess an additional value of several pounds.

But, says the reader: after such a prelude—How shall we go about it? It is a fair question, and while I may give you, in a broad way, the outline of it, the successful making of an association book depends largely, if not entirely, upon the innate understanding of a collector. As time passes original ideas will come for items that will make a volume distinctive. Just to beg an autograph from the author, is doing only the obvious. Besides, there are a thousand and one people doing this. Of course, to have an original letter in a volume from the writer of a famous work is a fine thing. but it is not always possible to procure it. And after all it is rather a trial for the popular author to be so bothered. We really must give him a chance to enjoy some leisure. Still, it is a great accomplishment if one can persuade the writer, whom we have in mind, to do something of especial interest for the book. If this cannot be done, I would urge you to go to the antiquarian bookseller, who is usually able to offer you some autograph item that will fit the depth of your purse.

From Messrs. Myers & Co.'s new Catalogue. See page 157.

If it be a long one, try to find a short, original manuscript. Some document that will add extreme value to your copy of the book. Imagine the added value of, shall I say, a first edition of Mr. Kipling's "Barrack Room Ballads" if it were practicable to insert in it the original manuscript of "Gunga Din"; a letter relating to the volume from the author himself; a signed picture, or some other odd bit of manuscript, in one way or another associated with the author, and especially the volume. Such a book would have considerable literary value, and tremendous commercial value. My own association book-making is not restricted to such things, however valuable from a monetary sense they may be. I slip into my copies all kinds of things having, of course, to do with the book or the author, which may have no attraction for others besides myself, although they are real and inexpensive items. I include a fugitive poem, an unexpected picture, a printed letter—and a dozen other things. Which brings us to the finest aspect of association book-making—the personal. Most of my own books are of this kind. For years I have sought from those authors whose value has been my value—happily maturity has supported my earlier judgment—letters of varied hue on this or that. There are in these respected books of mine, autograph letters not only from the authors themselves, but letters about the books from other writers, original poems in MS., printed poems, manuscript bibliographies, and many other things that my ingenuity, or rather my interest has persuaded me to seek. I have bought odd bits of things here and there; I have bothered the booksellers for items, and paid modest prices. My way has been easy and fortunate, rather than deliberately wise and clever. The gods have pandered to my pursuit. They have tried to help me, as they always willingly will help the disciple. Sometimes, in my hauntings of the rare book shop, I have found other unexpected things. Once, in my questing, I found a copy of Whitman's "Prose Works," nicely and interestingly autographed by Mr. Wells. Thus the good gods of literary environment ever bless the true collector—he who regards his collecting as something of sacred and intellectual value. It is a most intimate hobby.

THE MARKET.

The Golden Cockerel Press have issued their spring list. It is a work of typographical art, and apart from the many interesting things in it, it is really worth possessing for itself. It is the most distinctive list we have seen this year. It is wonderfully printed, on fine paper, and remarkably illustrated. It is a list, not only to be read, but to be kept. If the Golden Cockerel Press issue many more like this, they will surely be collected.

It would be well to secure a copy of a splendid omnibus volume of "Great Sea Stories of all Nations." A good, and even a fascinating idea. When it is borne in mind that that notable writer, H. M. Tomlinson, edited it, and wrote an introduction, it will be realised that the book is important. The stories included in the volume cover all ages.

There is a new list recently issued by the Hours Press, 15, Rue Guénegaud, Paris. The books to be published by this Press are by living authors, signed, numbered and limited editions privately printed. There are included in the list: A War Story, by Richard Aldington; and "Ten Poems More," by Robert Graves.

In spite of the fact that the market for first editions is somewhat on the low side, at the moment of writing, arising out of the past financial happenings in both America and England, there has been a good deal of business done in this direction, and quite a number of sales have taken place in the auction-rooms. Also many famous old and rare books have been sold. We noted that a copy of the first illustrated edition of Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare" was disposed of for £220; Pepys's Memoirs, £165; Boswell's "Life of Johnson," £115; and Sterne's "Tristram Shandy," £100.

One of the best journals in America for collectors and booksellers is The Bookseller and Collector. It is really a weekly magazine for book and print sellers, collectors, librarians and learned societies. It is well edited, readable and informative.

An author to collect is Edmund Blunden. Probably readers of these notes are collecting him. His books, many of them, are still procurable at reasonable prices, although they are all appreciating in value. None of them has yet reached a very high price, but some of them are costing a pound or so. We see, for instance, a little booklet of his called "Pastorals," published in 1916, is now being offered for £3. Only a little while since it could be bought for a few shillings. Mr. Blunden writes both distinctive poetry and prose; he recently became literary editor of The Nation.

Mr. A. E. Coppard's "My One Hundredth Tale" is on the Golden Cockerel Press Spring List. Mr. Coppard's books are fetching high prices these days. "My One Hundredth Tale" is limited to 750 copies.

"Galsworthiana," by Louis Henry Cohn, is a book for collectors. Only 500 copies have been printed for England and America. Messrs. Elkin Mathews & Marrot are the publishers. Captain Cohn has been a collector of Galsworthiana for a long time and is an authority on the subject. It makes an excellent companion volume to Mr. H. V. Marrot's bibliography of Mr. Galsworthy's works.

Two limited editions of Marlowe's "Edward the Second" have been made by the Aquila Press. The twenty-five guinea edition recently appeared. Only fifty copies were issued, printed on hand-made paper; the other edition—500—was issued at £2 12s. 6d.

The Trustees of the British Museum are appealing for £30,000. This is the balance of the amount needed to secure for the nation the famous "Luttrell Psalter" and the "Bedford Book of Hours." We hope, indeed, that in spite of the many appeals that are made for this and that these days, that this £30,000 will be speedily forthcoming, so that these precious things may not leave the country.

At a Sotheby sale a little while since, an excellent copy of the first issue of the first edition of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass," dated 1855, was sold to Mr. Gabriel Wells, of New York, for £515. This first edition has the misprint "abode" on page 23. Other items of interest at this sale were Apperley's "Life of a Sportsman"—a book that is appreciating in value—£108; a first edition, in the original cloth, of "Jane Eyre," by Charlotte Brontë, £420; and Reade's "The Cloister and the Hearth," £265.

HERE ARE CATALOGUES.

Sometimes in our unwisdom, we think that at last we have come to the end of the catalogues quietly awaiting our verdict in the waiting-room outside the consulting-room. And there comes a gap in the mind of us. But there is never need to be dismayed; for almost before we have put the full-stop to our last paragraph, there arrives a fresh array of goodly lists. Since our notes last month, there has reached us a number of very excellent catalogues. All are worth careful reading and study.

Bernard Quaritch always provides us with extremely attractive catalogues. As far as we can remember, their manner is as it was in the days of the famous Quaritch, whom we met on many occasions. The list before us is No. 431. There are a number valuable items in it covering Americana, Bibles, Bibliography, Early Printed Books, English History and Literature, Genealogy and Typography—and no end of other things. We feel, when we take up a catalogue, that we ought to review it in detail, just as we do an important book. Here, for instance, in the 431 Quaritch list, there is a crowd of most excellent entries, and in our enthusiasm, when we read it carefully at breakfast-time the other morning, we marked no end of them. Some of the books, in our desire to be honest, we confess we knew and know little of. But we would, with the right measure of fervour, stay for a few moments' thought over a delectable collection of the writings of the desirable Richard Jefferies. A fine set of twenty-three volumes. Price £25. To be had for the ordering. And a modest price, too. Then on the next page there is an entry over which we pondered with reverence; a copy of Keats's "Endymion." A scarce item—a precious and a valuable item, £750. There are many such things in this list. There are lots of others of more modest sort. The "Tragedies" of Swinburne for £5 5s.; Conrad's "Arrow of Gold," 25s.; "The Life and Typography of William Caxton," £16 16s.; Leslie Stephen's "Studies of a Biographer," four volumes, £3, and a heap of others. There is a presentation copy of "Kidnapped," by R. L. S. for £63, and also a very fine set of Surtees' "Handley Cross," in seventeen parts, for £650. Just as we were putting down this list we caught sight of an entry of "1914 and other Poems," by Rupert Brooke for, £8. Here is an instance of how an early effort at judging future values has been justified. We paid 3s. 6d. for our copy, a few years since. It will appreciate still more.

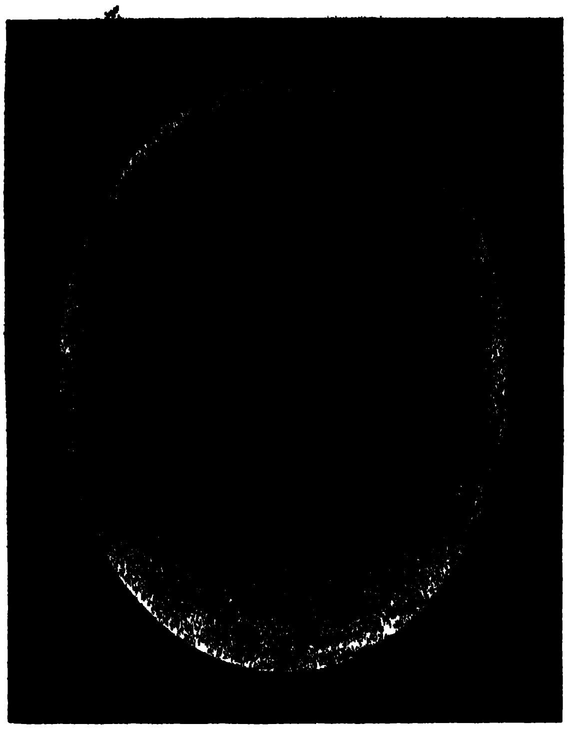
Engraved Frontispiece from Scarron's Comical Romance, London, 1676.
(Maggs.)



Part II of Maggs Bros.' Catalogue of Books devoted to English Literature and History from the fifteenth to the eighteenth century has just come to hand. It is a magnificent list, including a large number of most excellent full-page illustrations. It would take a very long time to deal adequately with this really valuable catalogue. It took us a long time to read through it, and not a moment was wasted, and not a second was uninteresting. There is included in this five hundred page list —No. 536—many splendid manuscripts, autograph letters and documents. Messrs. Maggs's catalogues have been reaching the writer for a number of years now, and we have wondered at times, how many thousands of pounds they must have spent upon their production. We must give a word of praise to the printers, the Courier Press, of Leamington Spa and London. How shall we start to comment upon the catalogue? We shall never be able to deal with it as we would wish. But here are a few things that will interest all of us. Our illustration is a reproduction of the engraved frontispiece in Paul Scarron's Comical Romance, published in London in 1676. The sub-title of the work reads "or a Facetious History of a Company of Strowling Stage-Players. Interwoven with Divers chosen Novels, Rare Adventures, and Amorous Intrigues." Our picture is a view of Old Smithfield market-place, and shows an open-air stage in the background, with strolling players entering an inn in the foreground. Among the manuscripts is a reasonably priced (£7 10s.) "Common Place Book," extending to over three hundred closely written pages, circa 1690; and a manuscript of Sir John Mandeville's Travels, written in the Monastery of Good Children at Liége in 1456, £250. There is a fine collection of John Milton's works, who is, wisely says the chronicler of the catalogue, "After Shakespeare the greatest English Poet"; a copy for £42 of Ovid's "Metamorphosis"; Wycliffe's Translation of Saint Paul, £350; a superb collection of "Poems and Ballads"; a Rayleigh Document, appointing John Chudleigh captain of a ship for the intended voyage to South America in 1616, £350; a number of valuable Scottish items, and twenty-five pages of Shakespeare's works and Shakespeareana. We have been looking again at that remarkable list, Part II of Bibliotheca Nautica, being an alluring collection of books and prints and manuscripts relating to naval battles, pirates, buccaneers and privateers, shipwrecks and disasters at sea. Can anyone think of a list of more fascination than this No. 534 catalogue? One's mind goes a-rovering at the very title, and the re-reading of the titles just filled our mind with romance instead of work! We ought to mention here a third Maggs List (537) devoted to modern first editions.

From Messrs. Myers & Co., of 102, New Bond Street, W.1, comes another finely illustrated catalogue. Messrs. Myers have very kindly permitted us to reproduce a page from an illuminated manuscript, taken from the Psalterium Davidis cum Calendario (Item 257). It is a beautiful manuscript Psalter of French Dominican use, of about 1300. A highly interesting historical note is printed beneath the entry. The price of the MS. is £150. This valuable catalogue contains many rare books, manuscripts, autograph letters and historical documents. Among the titles are a number of extraordinarily interesting early printed books, and an exceptionally fine and perfect copy of the Third Folio Shakespeare. It is a tall copy, and in splendid preservation, and contains the rare dedication to the Earls of Pembroke and Montgomery. This is an extremely precious item, and the price is £4,500. Other books in this list include presentation copies of the first editions of Thomas Hardy's "The Dynasts," and Charles Reade's "Cloister and the Hearth." We hope to return to the catalogue next month.

We trust that as a result of these catalogue notes the interest in such publications will increase; for it is rare that one finds a list that is not interesting. Yesterday we were looking through four rather special catalogues—from J. & J. Leighton, Thomas Thorp, R. Fletcher, Ltd., and W. Heffer & Sons, Cambridge. All are good lists. The Heffer catalogue is of a general character, and includes the library of H. V. Macnaghten, sometime Vice-Provost of Eton. The Fletcher list is worth a second reading, and comprises rare books, editions-de-luxe, illustrated books and a number of interesting first editions, private press books, and sets of works by famous authors. There are no less than nine hundred entries in the Thorp catalogue of rare, valuable and important books, including a number of scarce editions: Barrie, Boccaccio, Dickens, Hardy, Kipling, and many Nonesuch Press volumes.

Messrs. J. & J. Leighton's No. 12 catalogue is a very argosy of good things—early and rare copies of all manner of books, most of them published between the fifteenth and eighteen centuries. The 1,140 items in their list comprise an interesting selection of sixteenth, seventeenth and eighteenth century musical settings of psalms and songs and books about music, and, among other engravings a score of portraits, including an original drawing in pencil by D. G. Rossetti of his brother, W. M. Rossetti, which we reproduce on this page. Catalogue No. 13 from the same firm contains a further list of between six and seven hundred items selected from their large stock of books, mainly fifteenth to eighteenth centuries. All of the books have been carefully collated, and are considered as perfect and in good condition.

Other catalogues on our tables at the moment have been received from W. H. Smith & Son, Southport; J. W. Browne & Son, Rugby; Henry H. Bates, Salisbury, Gilbert Jamieson, Liverpool; J. D. Miller, Kilburn; J. Preston & Co., Clapham.

The (No. 282) catalogue of Messrs. James Rimell will repay attention. To begin with, there is the only known copy printed in colours of Thomas Malton's "Picturesque Tour through the Cities of London and Westminster" (1792 1800), with descriptive letterpress. This is in two volumes, and is priced, in the finest possible state, at £1,200. There is another copy with the hundred plates uncoloured at £125. There is an illuminated early fifteenth century manuscript Book of Hours (...0), some desirable first editions of Dickens, Ainsworth, Trollope; the first illustrated edition of Ben Jonson; a good 1816 edition of Ackermann's "Public Schools of England," with forty-eight aquatint plates (£95), and a large variety of other books ancient and modern. The illustrations in this catalogue—quaint old woodcuts, and from drawings and paintings, are excellently reproduced.

Messrs. Charles J. Sawyer's illustrated catalogue No. 95 offers a very interesting selection of seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth century travel, history and other books about America; and some early medical treatises, one in black letter. Another rare black letter is Tusser's famous "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandrie" (£26), and another, Barclay's "Ship of Fooles" (£65). There are four beautifully illuminated fourteenth and fifteenth century manuscript books of hours, a page from one of which we reproduce. Other items to be noted are first editions of Godwin's "Political Justice" (£63), Blackstone's "Commentaries," that great legal classic (£90), Evelyn's "Sylva" (£15), a number of manuscripts and historical documents, and Jacobean and other early tracts. It is a catalogue that collectors should not miss.

Another attractive catalogue of first editions, rare books and manuscripts comes from Major Hartley Clark. It includes a first edition, first issue, of Boswell's "Johnson" in the 1791 two volumes, with the first edition, first issue, of the 1793 volume, for £250; a first edition of Gray's "Odes," printed by Walpole at his Strawberry Hill Press; first editions of Burns and Robert Ferguson, and (for £5 5s.) of Gay's "Trivia." A first edition of "Pickwick" for £28, of Browning's "Paracelsus" for £6 10s., of Meredith's "Modern Love" (Ellen Terry's copy) for £16 10s., of Trollope's "Orley Farm," for £6 10s., are a few other items that one is not likely to overlook, and among first editions of contemporary authors are books by Hardy, Galsworthy, Kipling, Coppard, Blunden, W. H. Davies, Robert Bridges, Conrad, George Moore, Mottram and Humbert Wolfe at moderate prices.

And you should write also for Messrs. Elkin Mathews's Catalogue of Modern First Editions (No 31), which contains nearly two thousand items, and has an admirable introduction by Mr. Percy H. Muir, giving some useful "points" in modern first editions for the guidance of collectors.

POINTS FOR COLLECTORS.

The first edition collector of the present time is very discriminating, and the standard of knowledge required makes it necessary that information upon the subject of modern first edition collecting should be given freely.

The old order is changing, and the old "oyster" type of bookseller is dying out; the bookseller of to-day who is able to work his business for the benefit of his collector clientele, conforming with the spirit of the times, is getting the business.

I was speaking to a member of the book fraternity the other day—a bookmaker, let me explain, but not my bookmaker, of course! He voiced the old cry "that things are not what they were, owing to the good information given by the newspapers."

The number of his customers has increased, and although profits might be smaller, actually the amount of steady genuine business had increased. This applies to the more noble profession of book-selling also, and I would venture the opinion that there are in England to-day three times as many collectors of modern first editions as there were four years ago, and the book trade has benefited.

We English are characteristically conservative, and we believe that we should hold what we have, be it knowledge of books or the books themselves. With regard to books and our conservatism especially, it is quite obvious that our pride of possession has had many rude shocks owing to the mighty power of the dollar forcing us to sell to America our literary treasures. These may only be lent to that great country, for a well known American dealer recently said to me that in a few years' time we should be going over to U.S.A. to buy back our old English books.

Fortunately we are able to progress at the present time with the making of a new and well defined period in the history of English literature; assisted by the writings of living authors of to-day, and coupled with the fact that the English collector is really alive to the importance of the age in which he lives, we can, in regard to the immediate future of the modern first edition market, look forward with equanimity.

But in order to do justice to our English book-collectors, believing them to be the real backbone supporting the prestige of English literature, I believe in the policy that book-sellers should give real open-handed service to the genuine collectors of to-day. There are many professed book-collectors who are not worthy of the name, mere speculators or amateur dealers; they are the most astute information seekers, but they are quickly discovered by the alert bookseller, who can then be an oyster!

Buyers of modern first editions do wish to know that the first edition that they are buying is a copy of the first issue, if such exists. A conscientious book-seller will not, knowingly, sell them a "wrong 'un," but, like a tipster, he is not infallible!

The appearances of several modern books, which in their first editions are found to have omissions, alterations, etc., have created a need for definite information for the benefit of collectors and booksellers. Many "points" are hard to fix. The dropped "O" in "The Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man" is one, but whether the type shifted or not during the printing, the fact remains that the average collector prefers to possess a copy with the dropped letter.

Fortunately the practice of inserting several pages of publishers' advertisements of varying dates has gone out of fashion, but I would assume that the issue of Kipling's "Traffics and Discoveries" with the advertisement pages dated "35.8.'04" has priority over any other issue, the belief being that the misprint was discovered ere the whole edition was finished, and altered to "25.8.'04." I have found copies with other dates, and also undated, and without advertisements at all.

Presumably the average collector will always be satisfied to possess a copy of a first edition which seems to answer for itself the question, but a missing word, though actually missed later in the printing, is an acceptable point in favour of calling the book the first issue,

Before departing from the importance of points, may I express the hope that publishers will not become too lax with their proof readers, and allow them to discover too many misprints during the printings of first editions!

It will interest readers of THE BOOKMAN to know that the first edition of A. E. Coppard's recent masterpiece "Pink Furniture" has been issued in three different shades of binding to the first edition, namely pink, red, and creamy yellow. The issues are classified by me in that order. The first two issues have uncut bottom edges and the last has cut bottom edges. The first issue is undoubtedly going to be a rarity, and I have had to pay twenty shillings for a copy. There are minor alterations in the designs on the covers, but the cloth colourings are unmistakable.

Mr. Coppard told me that he knew "no more than a Mahatma in purgatory" of the difference, so—let it be known!

Mention of uncut edges leads me to remark upon the wrong belief many book lovers and collectors have that to cut the edges or to open the leaves is to destroy the value of a book. An uncut edge means that the edges of the leaves have been left rough, or untrimmed by the binder's guillotine. To open the leaves of an uncut book is not cutting the edges, and it still remains an "uncut edge." Many collectors persist in the practice of keeping their books with the leaves unopened, and have to struggle to read the volume. It is quite unnecessary and it does not make an atom of difference to the value, but the leaves should be opened with a paper knife and cut carefully! The unopened leaf is rather an annoyance, and an amusing incident occurred the other day in a book shop which I know well. A customer living some distance out of London had purchased an "unopened" book the day before, and came back with the volume, because he said that he could not read it in that state on a railway journey. An assistant was detailed to open the leaves for him!

Book collectors in England are showing a lively interest in many of the rising men of the time, and there is a good demand for the first editions of Aldous Huxley, T. F. Powys, H. E. Bates, Liam O'Flaherty, A. E. Coppard, R. H. Mottram, Hugh Walpole, and others. A brisk rise is apparent in the first editions of Eden Phillpotts's books, and a fine copy of "Children of the Mist" brought twelve pounds the other day in a London sale-room. I wonder how long it will be before the first editions of Maurice Hewlett, Rider Haggard, Conan Doyle, W. W. Jacobs, and some others of our rather neglected great men will be the rarities of the first edition market. No sounder advice could be given than that the firsts of these authors be collected at once.

GILBERT H. FABES.

THE FIRST EDITIONS OF HENRY WILLIAMSON.

There are very definite signs that the first editions of Henry Williamson will appreciate greatly in the future. He possesses all the attractive essentials of a collected author: he has exceptional merit (he has been praised by Hardy and Galsworthy), his early books are definitely rare in a fine condition, his limited editions are "limited" in the true sense, and he has never written anything that can be said to be inferior to the standard of an important author. There is no reason why every first edition of Williamson should not be read and appreciated by the collector. Williamson's output comprises a volume of nature essays, two volumes of short stories and five novels.

It is with these five novels that he definitely established himself as a writer who would eventually count.

"Tarka the Otter" is now recognised as a classic, but he has proved that he understands men as well as animals in his tetralogy "The Flax of Dream," which consists of "The Beautiful Years," "Dandelion Days," "The Dream of Fair Women" and "The Pathway." "The Beautiful Years" and "Dandelion Days" have been recently revised and republished.

Since it is doubtful if these novels ever entered a second edition in their original form their rarity and interest are great, and it is safe to say that they will be wanted not only by collectors but by those who wish to compare them with the author's maturer efforts.

The prices of Williamson's first editions are not yet set, and it would be rash to mention hard and fast figures.

The writer purchased a fine copy of "The Beautiful Years" about twelve months ago for 14s. A copy, to his knowledge, was recently purchased at £5, which is cheap to-day. Mr. Williamson kindly confirmed that the writer's set was complete a short time ago, and this list brings his publications up to date.

JOHN MILTON.

BY GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

FOR a man born in the nineteenth century and having had his life spread over a good portion of that and the twentieth to be resuscitated in the twenty-first would be, no doubt, in some respects a bore. Some folk, if one does not mistake, who have imagined things of the kind have thought it necessary or advisable to delete the revived one's memory. But one can imagine some not disagreeable pastime for a person of literary tastes and knowledge who had not been dememorised, in criticising the literature of the middle period. He would have the advantage of what may be called a double Pisgah sight, forwards and backwards; he would of course retain that knowledge of still earlier time without which all criticism is futile and real criticism impossible; and he would be, if not a very poor creature, almost entirely impartial.

John Milton.

From an engraving after the painting by Faithorne.

There would be of course much interest for him in the literary aspects of the present time: its curious and (begging pardon) surely rather semivirile mania for talking about "sex"; its amiable anxiety to assure itself and other people that it really is cleverer than its grandmother; its devotion to "psychology" in a sense somewhat different from what had been attached to the word previously; its almost invention—its certainly much increased use—of the Latin equivalent, "mentality"; its increased valuation of construction and technique, etc. etc. Such a student will, or at least would, find Mr. Tillyard's "Milton"[1] very interesting; and fortunately there is no need to wait for such a peculiar and perhaps unlikely status in order to find it so. It would indeed have been a very interesting though a very improbable book to have found at any time between the later seventeenth century and the earlier twentieth. Interesting because of its own merits; improbable because in former times (as its author seems to admit in a noteworthy passage) until quite recently people have not taken his point of view or busied themselves about much of his subject.

Of course neither standpoint nor subject can be wholly dissociated from the older battle-ground of Milton's poetic value and of his quality as a man. There are again of course, and fortunately, some who have been able to dissociate the last two from each other. They can appreciate the magnificence of the poetry from where the bare five words:

> "It was the winter wild," taken into conjunction with the known subject, warn you of what you are going to hear, to where the quieter and less musical but equally, or almost equally, magical

> "All is best, though we oft doubt" dismisses you—for just what it all is. In the more chequered prose itself they can allow the not so very much less magnificent rhetoric of the greater passages, in spite of the childish rebelliousness throughout, the equally childish triumph over the supposed controversial victories, and even the malevolent vulgarity of the worser controversy itself. But it is not everybody who can do this, giving his full due to Milton the poet, for all what Mr. Tillyard truly and rather happily calls their "intense repugnance" to Milton the man. He himself, though he would seem not to feel any repugnance at all, has by no means set out to whitewash Milton. His object is to explain him. He thinks it "strange" that hitherto, or at best till within the last decade or so, critics have hardly concerned themselves with the "meaning" of "Paradise Lost," a this is what he busies himself with, after an investigation of the author's—should we say—mentality as exhibited in the earlier life and work. And in this he considers pretty fully what his few predecessors in this line (chiefly, though not wholly, American and

[1] "Milton." By E. M. W. Tillyard. 15s. (Chatto & Windus.)—[2]"Reference Guide to Milton, 1800–1928." By D. H. Stevens. 22s. 6d. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press.)

French) have thought and said about it. Of pure literary criticism there is but little in the book: though some flashes are interesting and some excellent translations of Milton's Latin verse and prose, which he most rightly holds to have been too frequently neglected, enrich the volume.

"Meaning" of course here means and is meant in a sort of secondary sense. To the ordinary use of the word one might object. "A less obscure writer than Milton does not exist." But what Mr. Tillyard means by meaning is a vast sort of Hinterland to which one might apply the terms "intention," "conscious and unconscious prompting thought," "beliefs underlying expression," and so forth. To deal with such things in a short review is of course impossible. But one or two points may be touched on. For instance it is clear that Mr. Tillyard is puzzled and even a little nettled by Milton's unhesitating acceptance—and use of it, even as a basis for argument and other things—of the creation of Eve from Adam's rib. But surely there is no need to discuss this? There were certainly atheists in the seventeenth century, whether they were "fools" or not is quite unnecessary to argue here. But it is doubtful whether there were any persons who had reached the idea of what we may call a Limited Liability God—a God who might do some things but must not do others. The acceptance of the rib need not in the least surprise us.

As another instance we may take Mr. Tillyard's repeated efforts to show that it is wrong to regard "Paradise Regained" (of which he quite rightly holds a higher view than some people) as a "continuation" of "Paradise Lost." He is even very severe on poor innocent Quaker Ellwood for having supported—if not originated—the notion that it is. Well, you know, though Ellwood may have exaggerated or invented his own part of the matter, "Found" is not such a bad version of "Regained" in the circumstances, and a perfectly accurate description of the plainer and more evident meaning of the poem.

We need say nothing of what Mr. Tillyard says of "Milton To-day" and the notion of some contemporaries that he is not contemporary enough. The necessity of contemporariness (see Matthew Arnold's famous preface of eighty years back) seems to be a recurrent fallacy. Recurrent fallacies have the virtue of mushrooms in that they disappear as they appear. They are sometimes too, like mushrooms, poisonous, but they are seldom so good to eat as mushrooms sometimes are, in the interval between appearance and disappearance.

It has so happened that one of the American scholars mentioned by Mr. Tillyard has completed, though not in time for Mr. Tillyard himself to mention it, a most laborious and useful bibliographic catalogue on the subject[2]—a list of nearly three thousand entries of books, articles, etc mostly though not invariably accompanied by brief summaries of their contents, or at least drift.

WITH ROBERTS TO HAGLEY PARK.

By Edmund Blunden.

AMONG the comforts of living in the twentieth century, one is that we have a very good view of Dr. Johnson; we are not confused by the romantic rage, not startled and exasperated by his harshness towards several forms of genius; we come to the man and all that he means with a happiness derived partly from his courage and partly from the completeness of his period. It is as Boswell said with his quotation from Horace: the whole of the old man's life lies before us. To recall another classical aphorism, it is soothing to be lying on the cliff watching the breeze giving the confident sailor something to think about. We are on the right side of the question. The giant cannot eat us. He will oblige us whenever we wish by devouring a few travellers who thought they had him. He devours Boswell so often that one realises the destined application of the couplet in "Hudibras":

> "Doubtless the pleasure is as great
> In being eaten as to eat."

And then, the pleasure of the Johnsonians has been so aptly voiced by those gentlemen. They are not cold, cautious idolaters. They wish to increase the gaiety of nations. Their papers are "familiar but not coarse, and elegant but not ostentatious." Of those flourishing at present, as Mr. Aleyn Lyell Reade is the most assiduous investigator, Mr. S. C. Roberts is the most pleasing reflector. Whether he is discoursing upon the style of Dr. Johnson, or on some aspect of the career and character, he is ever at home. He may (being on the right side of the case) affect to add new examples of the master clearing our minds of cant; this he does with fineness, and is suspected of being in communication with Boswell's ghost. Or he will linger over historical themes, piecing out their imperfections with scholarly aptitude, speculating with probability; as in his new volume he revisits with the reader the books of Johnson, and comments upon those who purchased some of them, in memory of their owner and proud to possess something that had contributed to that "vast and various collection of learning and knowledge, which was so arranged in his mind, as to be ever in readiness to be brought forth."

Yet, in a manner, I am even more gratified by a paper in Mr. Roberts's unassuming volume* that does not primarily treat of Johnson than by the rest. His "Eighteenth-Century Gentleman" is the first Lord Lyttelton, and it must be long since an essayist took much trouble with the life and writings of George, Lord Lyttelton. His "History of Henry the Second," though "elaborated by the searches and deliberations of twenty years," lies unopened; his "Dialogues of the Dead," though much less monumental, are in the same state. His poems, still briefer, are seldom regarded; there is an exquisite edition of 1801, printed by Charles Whittingham in his best style, and usually found in a rich binding, but it is hard to get beyond the print and the tortoiseshell calf. The monody for his wife is tender and graceful, a prologue or a song flows easily from his mind, but Lyttelton's verse is a thing of the past—

> " Ye shades of Hagley, where is now your boast ? "

The mention of Hagley holds the reason why, even at this date, Mr. Roberts commands our gratitude for his study of Lyttelton. We know what activity this man, and his kind, sustained for their country. With all their travels, their public services, their personal crises, they successfully balanced life. That was nothing, in their judgment. " He inherited," says Johnson of Lyttelton, " a baronet's title, with a large estate, which, though perhaps he did not augment, he was careful to adorn by a house of great elegance and expence, and by much attention to the decoration of his park." The England which we now, between us all, adore and degrade, treasure and desolate, was largely the unboastful work of such as Lyttelton, seeking individual serenity amid great labours, and, more, preparing it for the advancement of genius and personality in others. To Lyttelton, the poets were men of splendid advantage to the race, and Hagley was a means of ripening them like any nectarine—the " British Tempe." Thomson has recorded this with deep beauty in his " Seasons," and shown Lyttelton himself in a contemplation which combines experience with innocence as we strive to do in our time :

> " You sit beneath the shade
> Of solemn oaks, that tuft the swelling mounts
> Thrown graceful round by nature's careless hand,
> And pensive listen to the various voice
> Of rural peace : the herds, the flocks, the birds,
> The hollow-whisp'ring breeze, the plaint of rills,
> That, purling down amid the twisted roots
> Which creep around, their dewy murmurs shake
> On the sooth'd ear. From these abstracted, oft
> You wander through the philosophic world . . .
> And oft, conducted by historic truth,
> You tread the long extent of backward time,
> Planning, with warm benevolence of mind,
> And honest zeal, unwarp'd by party rage,
> Britannia's weal ; how from the venal gulf
> To raise her virtue, and her arts revive."

It is to be hoped that Mr. Roberts will recommend with his usual sweetness other eighteenth century gentlemen to these times.

FREDERICK THE LITTLE.*

By Alfred Tresidder Sheppard.

LESSING wrote once about " the bad example of the cynic on the throne," and Werner Hegemann, examining the claims of Frederick II to be regarded as a great king worthy of international ad-[illegible] tion, considers it a world tragedy that one of the [illegible] sup- obnoxious figures in history has so long been hel[illegible] up as a model for kingship. One lays down the boo[illegible] with the feeling that " Frederick the Little " might have been an apter title. Two of the four illustrations reproduce the famous death-mask, and even these are an idealised touching-up of the original. It is difficult not to think of Thackeray's devastating essay on George IV: "I try and take him to pieces, and find silk stockings, padding, stays, a coat with frogs and a fur collar, a star and blue ribbon, a pocket handkerchief prodigiously scented, one of Truefitt's best nutty brown wigs reeking with oil, a set of teeth and a huge black stock, under-waistcoats, more under-waistcoats, and then nothing." Herr Hegemann takes to pieces more scientifically the "highly interesting, lean little old man" whom most of us met first on the terraces of Sans Souci and the country roads round Potsdam, in the opening chapter of Carlyle's panegyric. The battered old cocked hat, the blue and red coat smeared with snuff, the high boots, the wig, are stripped off; the man beneath the clothes is pitilessly dissected—and there seems nothing left of Carlyle's hero but the death-mask, which itself flatters and hides the truth.

The author has chosen a new method, or one almost new—for "Conversations in Ebury Street" crosses the mind. Here are six conversations in Naples, shortly before the War; Manfred Ellis, a critic of American and Austrian birth, attacks the tradition of greatness; "the cynic on the throne" has a cynic to defend him in Herr Hegemann, who plays devil's advocate; among others who intervene are Georg Brandes, Thomas Mann and—to one's amazement, but no doubt because of his brilliant essay on Frederick in "Books and Characters"—Mr. Lytton Strachey. Everywhere the king is tested and found wanting. Of the subjects in which he dabbled and lay down the law he knew nothing, or next to it. He is found ignorant of natural sciences, history, astronomy, geography, mathematics, mechanics, geometry. On his own admission he spoke German like a coachman; he did not even know French well, and a third-form schoolboy would have laughed at his Latin. His verses were atrocious, his musical taste and abilities mediocre. He was contemptuous of Shakespeare, and called Goethe "a writer of loathsome platitudes"; he asked himself what greater service he could have rendered to German literature than neither to read nor heed it. An historian is refused permission to go to Holland when writing a history of the Dutch Republic—he can write it at home without running about. A scientist is rebuked for asking for information about rare fish; the same species are everywhere, of course, except in one place where there's a fish called—"whatever the name is." His services to education are illustrated by the appointment as teachers, at incredibly low salaries, of disabled soldiers unable to read or write. His famous Snuff Parliaments, in the little yellow room decorated with painted birds and flowers at Sans Souci, were tedious, gluttonous, blasphemous and dull; professing to allow freedom of speech, he silenced disagreement with a "Hold your tongue!" or "Off to Spandau!" He thrashed soldiers; he even thrashed artists; he ignored law. His diplomacy in supporting France and Russia against German Austria was unpatriotic, short-sighted and dangerous. Even great military capacity is denied him; the Prussian glasses of Ranke and Treitschke have magnified him out of all reason. As for Nietzsche's "addle-pated Carlyle" and his prostration before his hero, Manfred Ellis says that "nearly every page seems to betray the learned old maid who would like to join in the game but has not the bigness of heart for it."

Now and then this very brilliant and scholarly book stings one into faint protest. It is almost too ruthless. A boy forbidden to learn Latin, forbidden to indulge his taste for music, may at least be allowed a little charity. He was made familiar with brutality from childhood; he was nauseated with a mock piety; he was driven into an unwelcome marriage. As Lytton Strachey has pointed out, his French preferences were "merely an extreme instance of a universal fact" among men of rank in his day. I have ventured to say before in these columns that, in my opinion, Carlyle is often unreliable; perhaps Mr. Stirling Taylor is not far from the truth when he says (in a recent Fortnightly Review article on "The New History") that Carlyle's critical judgment of the facts he laboriously collected was rather below the level of the cave-man for gullible innocency. But it must be remembered that time has brought many things out of hiding since Carlyle wrote, and time is no hero worshipper. In a winter not long before the War, when collecting information for my first novel, I visited many of the localities described by Carlyle, with his "Frederick the Great" in hand. I stood on the terraces at Sans Souci; entered the little room where Frederick died at an hour still recorded by the clock which stopped at the moment of his death; saw in the garrison church the marble sarcophagus which covers his dust. In Berlin I watched the gigantic Prussian Guards march past another Hohenzollern—Emperor as well as King. Time, in a few brief years, had written its "Sic Transit."

In the eternities of which Carlyle so often poured out his rhetoric, who is great, who small? An English contemporary of Frederick the Great—or Little—wrote of his "motley composition" of barbarity and humanity. May we not at least leave the humanity in the final verdict, however much we take away?

THE APES.

By Eden Phillpotts. 6s. (Faber & Faber.)

It was an eventful day in the Great Simian Age when there took place the meeting of the Big Seven of the Anthropoid Parliament, of whose proceedings Mr. Phillpotts gives this faithful record. There are so many similarities between simian and human procedure that the report is full of instruction for the present age of enlightenment. Each of the Seven had to prove his merit by a statesmanlike utterance before an audience comprising every branch of the simian world, and it was an accepted understanding that any speaker who incurred the displeasure of the assembly should be instantly clubbed. Intrepid radicals were in imminent peril, but some were saved by being taken for unintentional jesters. The one who went too far actually hinted that evolution would produce something higher even than the simian. He was rescued from death only by the miraculous appearance of a homo sapiens projected backwards by relativity. Mr. Phillpotts has winged his satire with a pleasant humour that does not however blunt its incisiveness. One of his morals is that if you want to keep a whole skin you must not think too far ahead of your contemporaries.

RELIGION AND WAR.

By St. John Adcock.

THE famous fifteenth and sixteenth chapters of Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire" have been printed as a separate volume in the Thinker's Library series under the rather misleading title of "Gibbon on Christianity."* It is customary to talk loosely of the irony with which Gibbon wrote ot the Christian faith; but the fact is he was not concerned with Christianity; his aim was to study and write an account of the beginnings and progress of the Christian Churches; which is quite another story. As the Right Hon. J. M. Robertson says in an introduction, Gibbon made "the first systematic and scholarly attempt to present in historical narrative the rise of organised Christianity as a natural and not a supernatural process." If it was ever claimed that there was anything supernatural in the mere organisation of the Churches, essential Christianity is not responsible for that, but the men who organised it. Gibbon says truthfully that "even admitting, without hesitation or inquiry, all that history has recorded, or devotion has feigned, on the subject of martyrdoms, it must still be acknowledged that the Christians, in the course of their intestine dissensions, have inflicted far greater severities on each other than they had experienced from the zeal of infidels." But this charge does not lie at the door of all Christians, and the truth remains true even when it is superficially discredited by the errors and stupidities of some who profess to advocate it. I have frequently urged that in their own way, in their ridicule of Christian beliefs and their general cocksureness, the Rationalists are as narrow and bigoted as are the members of the smallest, narrowest and most absurdly bigoted of religious sects, but this is only a reflection on certain Rationalists and not on Rationalism as a reasonable attitude toward a legitimate subject for inquiry. Even the Rationalists do not and cannot know enough to be in a position to despise any way of thought that differs from their own.

Mr. H. L. Mencken takes up this same subject in his "Treatise on the Gods,"† and whatever Mr. Mencken writes, he is stimulating, he is provocative, and when he does not convince you he exasperates you into brushing the dust off your opinions and holding on to them harder than ever. However perverse some of his views may seem, he propounds them with such wit and humour that they are never less than entertaining. He is an independent thinker and goes his own way, and it is interesting to watch him going it, even if you are not persuaded to go with him.

* 1s. (Watts.)
† 10s. 6d. (Knopf.)

Mr. Henry Williamson, author of The Patriot's Progress (Geoffrey Bles).

In this "Treatise," his chapter headings intimate that he is studying the Nature and Origin of Religion; its Evolution; its Varieties; its Christian form; and its State To-day. But in fact he entangles himself in systems, in symbolisms that Christian Churches have taken over from the ancient gods, and he never gets through to religion at all; he is really only busy over its outward manifestations in ritual, ceremony, dogmas and practical organisation. The spirit of the thing curiously evades him. He makes too much of such matters as that "the common people have always rejoiced over a show of piety in their rulers"; that in the United States it seems felt that the President "ought to be a member of some Church or other," and so on; all which of course has nothing to do with actual religion. He castigates priests and parsons very thoroughly, and says "their prayers have always gone up for kings not for rebels and reformers." He should read the history of Wat Tyler, of how John Ball and other devoted priests, who marched with him and his poverty-stricken rebels, prayed on Blackheath for them before they stormed London, and were hanged with the rank and file when the king went out for vengeance. There have been priests and parsons who have fought for the underdog and rebelled with him all down the ages. I hold no brief for parson or priest, but we may as well do our tar-and-feathering with some discrimination. In any case this too is beside the point.

Mr. Mencken's survey of primitive ideas about the gods, and primitive forms of worship, cover well trodden ground, and cover it ably, forcefully, interestingly; but here still he is busy with formulæ, with the trickeries of priests, with the flaws not in religion itself but in its organisation and organisers. If you wipe out all the details that trouble him, religion still remains. As an example of his rash statements, he announces that happily in the eighteenth century scepticism spread everywhere and the human race improved—"at no time in its history before or since has it ever lived more delightfully or been, in any true sense, more civilised." Defoe's and Fielding's novels do not support that, nor Hogarth's pictures, nor the records of the Georgian Courts, nor the Newgate Calendar. Coming down to date, Mr. Mencken declares that "one seldom discovers a true believer who is worth knowing," and suggests that nearly all intelligent persons now are atheists; but the proof he offers of this is very superficial. I wish he had worried less about the hypocrisies of those supposed to be religious and told us something about religion itself. To judge it by its outward show is like judging a book by its binding. Moreover if he and I have had no spiritual experiences, it is amusingly arrogant in us to take it for granted that nobody else can have had any; even if we conclude that he and I have no souls, we are not justified in assuming that every human being is similarly deficient. None of us knows everything; Herbert Spencer, who was not a religious man, owned in his search for truth that when science had probed to the utmost and discovered all it could, it was brought up at last against an impenetrable mystery. To lapse, in face of that impenetrable mystery, into extravagances of fanaticism, atheistic or other, certainly does not denote that one has exercised more intelligence than usual.

Mr. Mencken, no less than Gibbon, is justified of his attacks not on authentic Christianity, but on its machinery, and on the conduct of some who run the machine; and divers modern developments, including the recent War, give a sort of plausibility to his argument. It was sad enough in the Middle Ages that Pope Urban should have summoned "the fighting men of Christendom to take up arms, not in any earthly quarrel, but to march into Asia to recapture the sepulchre of Christ. It would be a pilgrimage, and it would also be a war." Mr. Harold Lamb tells the story of that holy war, and of later wars with the same object, in his ably written, intensely interesting account of "The Crusades: Iron Men and Saints"*—he tells of them and all the futile slaughter, misery, robbery and wrong those long-drawn campaigns involved, significantly dedicating his book to "the uncounted thousands who died in the Crusades." Obviously no man can at once accept the teachings of Christ and go on the war-path or encourage others to go. A religious war is a contradiction in terms; there never has been and never can be such a thing. The Crusades belong to the Middle Ages, and since then we are supposed to have become more humane, more enlightened, yet we have just left another, more heathenish and far more devastating war not many years behind us.

All things considered then, I am immensely taken with Brigadier-General Crozier's attitude toward both war and organised Christianity in "A Brass Hat in No Man's Land."† I began by disliking him for the crudely candid confessions of his own brutality, but I came to see that he is absolutely right, that he took a perfectly common-sense view of the situation, and could nevertheless be so humane when circumstances allowed that he wins your admiration; and to confute some of his assertions by reconciling Christianity with war is more than I am able to do. When he was busy in 1915 training soldiers for the new armies, General Crozier says:

> "I, for my part, do what I can to alter completely the outlook, bearing and mentality of over a thousand men in as short a time as possible—for blood-lust is taught for purposes of war in bayonet-fighting itself and by doping the minds of all with propagandic poison."

This propaganda, stories of German atrocities, "many of which I doubt in secret" . . . "all help to bring out the brute-like bestiality which is so necessary for victory." Bands, the pipes, marching songs are also of value in making the young soldier "see red," and the General adds: "The Christian Churches are the finest blood-lust creators which we have, and of them we made free use." He hoped that when the men he was training were sent to France they "will not only regard death, gashing and gaping wounds, gas-destroyed organs . . . as mere nothings, but they will be able to joke lightly among themselves in these matters, fortified by the fact that they are giving more gashes, ripping up more bodies and causing more suffering generally than the other side." "War," he tells you, "is a dirtier game than is generally known," and "He who hopes to wage war without wine and women is living in a fool's paradise." He believes in the necessity of shooting the man who shows cowardice in face of the enemy, and thinks those who object to it should take the higher aim and work for the abolition of war. "The record of beer and the Bible in the War leaves me stone cold. Both sides suffered from alcoholic debauchery, while both used the Bible as propaganda for hate." War he calls "the last resource of fools," and hopes "the Press of the world will throw its weight into the scales for permanent peace as readily and efficiently as it did for the purposes of war."

This is a very remarkable book. Its absolute honesty takes hold upon you. General Crozier admits that, for the purposes of his profession, he was a brute and did his best to brutalise his men, because it is impossible to win war otherwise. And his severe reproof of the Churches is I think unanswerable. When men go to war they have ceased to be Christians, and to send padres out with them is a terrible inconsistency. When, going through France and Belgium in the autumn of 1916, I was talking with a soldier at Poperinghe, he complained, as many had done, that there were far too many "sky pilots" messing about at the base, and he was glad to get away from them. "They're no good to us out here," he said. "If they want to come and encourage us to kill our enemies instead of forgiving them, they'd better make a start by wiping the Ten Commandments off the walls of the churches, for if it isn't murder we're doing nobody has ever done any."

Here are eight more war books that are all worth reading. The most reticent, like the most outspoken of them, show war as the filthiest, cruellest, most completely ungodly enterprise on which human creatures can enter. There are mitigations in the fine sense of brotherhood it fosters among men menaced by a common danger; in the chivalry, kindness, self-sacrifice they practise when occasion serves; but even this does not atone for its degrading and demoralising influences. It is a relief among so much misery to read "The Good Soldier Schweik,"* which has little concern except with the humours of the whole horrible business. Schweik is a great character; a Czech soldier with the "Old Bill" sense of fun, he meets misfortunes with unfailing cheerfulness, hides his artfulness under an appearance of almost idiotic simplicity, and is fertile in dodges that save him from ever being sent to the front. But there is a deal of sly satire in his pictures of life among the officers, and of the general drunkenness and indiscipline of the Austrian armies. Schweik laughs while Austria crumbles, and he forces you to laugh with him in spite of the horrors that environ his merriment.

There is bitter philosophy enough in "Four Infantrymen on the Western Front,"* the four being Germans. Of all animals, protests one of the four, an ex-student, "man alone is deliberately, refinedly cruel. . . . He runs societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals—and for men, he makes war with flame-throwers; then after battle he will go and offer up prayers of thanksgiving." There will never be an end to wars, one of the four insists, "so long as the people who cook them up can stay behind well out of the range of the guns." They denounce the Christian Church for tolerating murder. "Woe unto thee," mimics Job, "thou Christian Church, for thou hast given thy blessing even to this greatest of shindies. But wait now, wait, I say; these millions of shells are even now singing thy dirge. All things have an end." I am afraid that is a feeling many soldiers of all armies brought home with them.

"The Battle of Brains"† is a series of capital tales of what was done by the "Intelligence" branches during the War. "Merry Hell"‡ is the story of a Dane who joined up and fought in the Canadian contingent, and gives an excellently vivid account of the training of the troops and their experiences at the front. "Secret War"§ is a thrilling, exciting record of the American secret service before and throughout the War. In "Haunting Years"|| you have the unvarnished narrative of a Territorial who joined the Black Watch. Mr. Andrews was a journalist and is now editor of the Leeds Mercury He discounts the reports of excessive immorality among the soldiers; he speaks well of the Germans, and denies that there was much in the way of killing prisoners. He writes well and temperately, but does not present war as romantic or as anything but inhuman. At the close he remarks that if anyone began to say the War "was a great landmark of world progress we should begin to think how, for four years, it crucified a great part of mankind, and we should be confronted with the almost intolerable thought of the twenty million soldiers, sailors and civilians who perished in it."

There is the same temperate style of narrating events, even the most pitiful and horrible, in Mr. R. H. Kiernan's "Little Brother Goes Soldiering,"* and its very quietness gives it extraordinary power. Many of its graphic little sketches haunt your memory. I can say with Mr. Stephen Gwynne, in his admirable introduction, "for a piece of swift narrative, incisive without brutality, and admirably free from the least touch of emphasis or exaggeration, I commend this with confidence."

Mr. Henry Williamson takes an average man for his hero†—"John Bullock, a youth beloved by his parents, was a clerk in the City of London," and enlisted in Kitchener's Army. His life in training camp, and out in France and Flanders, is unrolled before you with a stark black-and-white realism; all the dreary, exhausting marches, the fear that has to be conquered under shell-fire, the wallowing in the mud and blood and stench and horrors of the trenches, the wholesale slaughter, the hideous mangling and agonies of the wounded—the whole thing is as simply, grimly and plainly told in Mr. Williamson's terse, vigorous prose as in Mr. Kermode's numerous lino-cuts, both prose and pictures seeming to have absorbed into their very style something of the harsh and sombre qualities of the War itself. There are touches of bitter irony and unforced pathos; "The Patriot's Progress" reads like a matter-of-fact record of an ordinary clerk who went through all that was endured by thousands of citizen-soldiers, and came home minus a leg. This is one of the strongest and most impressive books the War has inspired.

Reading these war books, after reading many others, I come back to sharing General Crozier's conviction that Christianity can have no possible place in war. While each country retains a merely national Christianity and, on the outbreak of war, assumes that God will fight for it, as their tribal gods fought for the heathen of old, there is not much hope for the future. When Christianity is, as it should be, international, and, recognising that there is only one God of all the universe, joins hands the world over to set itself against any war that is threatened, we may have peace in our time, but not till then—unless the League of Nations, a secular body, succeeds where the Churches so far have failed.

POETS LAUREATE.

By Wallace B. Nichols.

ROBERT BRIDGES.

A DISTINGUISHED English composer has laid it down that his countrymen should refrain from the writing of rhapsodies, the rhapsodic note being foreign in his opinion to the English temperament. That may be true of our musicians, but it is not, I think, equally true of our poets: I remember, as I write, Spenser's "Epithalamium" and Shelley's "Epipsychidion." But indeed there are two types of the poetic rhapsody—the poem of ecstasy and the poem of joy. It is not necessary to compose in a white-hot frenzy to produce a true rhapsody; but it is necessary to work in a golden glow; and it is as the poet of joy that I claim Robert Bridges for a rhapsodist. Other poets have written in a more serene spirit than he, but few, I feel, in a spirit of more inward content, and in that lies the principal difference between himself and Wordsworth. Wordsworth tore a serenity out of Nature—a serenity not always there; while Robert Bridges abstracted an inward joy out of life—a joy likewise not always there. The result was the production in Wordsworth of a rugged grandeur, in Robert Bridges of a limpid aloofness.

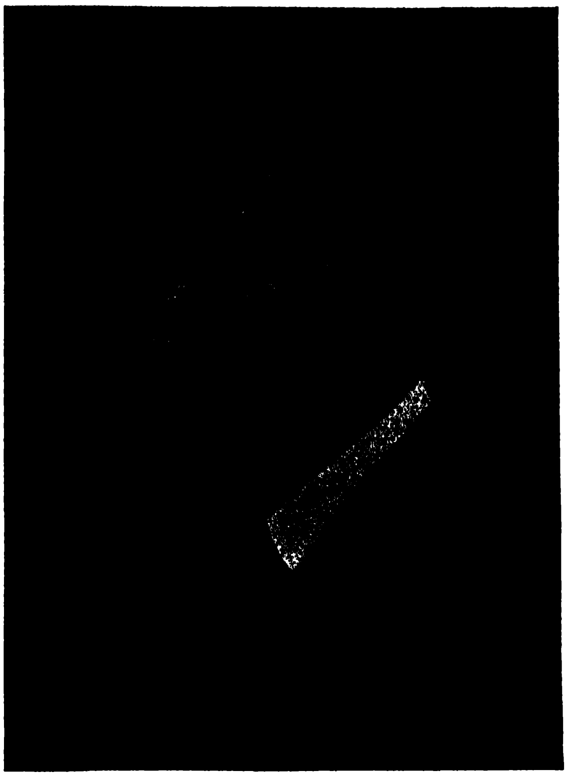
The themes upon which a poet spends his endeavour are conditioned less by his theories of the art which he practises than by his own temperament. If the treatment betrays, for good or ill, the sincerity of the workman, the theme shows the man. It has been so with all poets of the true faculty, pre-eminently so with such dissimilar poets as Milton and Burns; and it was not possible for Robert Bridges to escape that self-revelation. It is clear that his preoccupations as a poet were principally two: with technique, and then with life seen from a hill-side in summer as against life met in all weathers in the street. He was not gifted in the painting of mankind, but rather in the brooding upon it; and while he was thus provided with a limitation, he was at the same time endowed with an individual strength, for the quality of that brooding—though few suspected it until "The Testament of Beauty" was published—was, at least as far as his contemporaries were concerned, incomparably inspired.

Nevertheless there is about the poetry of Robert Bridges, even about "The Testament of Beauty" itself, an air of academic aloofness that served him ill, especially as a laureate, with the larger public; it may continue to serve him ill with posterity—in the way that a similar characteristic has served Milton and Matthew Arnold in contrast with Shakespeare, for instance, and Browning. It is the direct painters of life who secure, no doubt deservedly, the greater audience, from Homer and Euripides downwards, even if the "fit though few" will always sufficiently console and reward the poets of perhaps purer, though smaller, compass from Pindar to Robert Bridges himself. One misses in the late laureate's equipment the fullness of life; one meets only with the contemplation of life. Moreover it is not the tumultuous contemplation that informs and inspires the work of the greatest artists, the Beethovens, the Michelangelos, the Dantes and the Goethes; it is the contemplation of the scholar and of the man of inward content. He did not wrestle, as Jacob, with the angel; the angel instead took him by the hand.



But what he lost in strength and magnificence he gained in exquisiteness and balance of beauty.

II.

No poet in English ever possessed a more delicate ear than Robert Bridges; he could, as it were, split semitones into intimate values of new sound. His capacity for the smoothing of cadences and for the resolution of syllables—mainly, I think, owing to his almost unique understanding of quantity as a constituent of English versification—was astonishing, and if the much vaunted musical power of Swinburne is more apparent to the unsophisticated in metre, it is inestimably the less learnedly based, the less prosodically scientific, the less subtle and varied. Robert Bridges had nothing of Swinburne's flame-like rush or harmonic sweep—for Swinburne was more a harmonist than a melodist—or his resonance of vocables, and the verse of Bridges was infinitely more illusive in its music, but—perhaps owing to that very illusiveness—it was more truly melodic because less monotonous in both beat and resolution of tone. Once the ear has caught the Swinburnian tune, the next cadence is rarely a surprise; but in the work of Robert Bridges, except in the poems written in the iambic pentameter, nearly every cadence is a surprise. Technically considered, that was probably his greatest triumph, the continual surprise to the listening ear in his lyrical cadences. But in the iambic pentameter, that is to say in his blank verse and sonnets, he was scarcely as successful because not so original in movement; he did not seem entirely at home in the iambic pentameter, and his work in that medium has curious rhythmic echoes, occasionally of Milton, here and there of Keats, at times too of Gray, even when in colour he yet remains entirely distinctive and personal.

But it is as a lyrist that he showed the full purity of his originality, and that in spite of the fact that so many of his songs have a native air of Elizabethanism. Many of them indeed might have found, by natural affinity, a place in any of the song-books of that prolific period of delicate lyric fantasy—the period before the Jacobean hardening came to add to English poetry the first touch of spiritual disillusion, a touch not escaped by Shakespeare, whose Jacobean work is at all points deeper than his Elizabethan. The real Elizabethan lyric was not remarkable for its emotional base; the Romantic School had not yet come to acquaint the world with the introspective kinship of poets with mountains, seas, sunsets and dawns. But it possessed instead a limpidity, both rhythmic and thematic, that has never been equalled. England was young then, and her air full of adventurous savour. But while the lyric poetry of Robert Bridges blossomed, as it were, on the Elizabethan stem, it had a new colour, a new surcharge of power, and Elizabethan in its manner as it may have been, was only deceptively so in its final effect, which is of no period unless beauty itself may be said to have a period. And in certain respects he was as little modern as Elizabethan. It was only his metrical experiments that kept him really modern, and it is impossible to label him as a true Georgian. His presence in Mr. Harold Munro's recent anthology only emphasised his independence by the contrast of his consummate yet adventuring technique with the sprawling "humdrum and harum-scarum" (to use his own expression) of so much of what else is there.

Portrait by Foulsham & Banfield. Mr. John Masefield.

III.

He attempted as well both the dramatic and the narrative poem, but in neither did he achieve any complete success; there is something too cold, too willed about his plays, and about the pseudo-epic "Eros and Psyche" in particular. He wrote too much from the mere literary standpoint and too little from within his subject-matter; the poetic dramatist must place for the nonce his stage technique above his verse technique, and the narrative poet must be overwhelmed by the cumulative force of his story. In none of his plays, and certainly not in "Eros and Psyche," did Robert Bridges fulfil the fundamental demands of the art either of drama or of tale-telling. Passages of great beauty, it is needless to say, are not lacking, but where they occur they seem rather to be embroideries upon the theme than gushings from the theme's central fountain; also where he is most beautiful he is most Greek—which is to say, more imitative and less himself. It is inevitable that the reader, and the critic too, should pass almost at once, and without deviation into the by-paths of his other work, from his perfect and original lyrics to the crown of his achievement, "The Testament of Beauty."

This poem is the fruit of a long life of inspired brooding upon our mortal lot and the meaning of life. No deeper, no vaster, no more poetic subject is possible to any poet, and the greater poets of the world are finally judged by their success or failure in giving, not an answer to the eternal problem—that is the goal of the philosopher proper, not of the poet—but a statement of it in such terms of beauty that his vision of the truth enlarges the spiritual experience of mankind. To do this is not to be didactic; it is only to have ascended Sinai—and no artist need be ashamed of that!

An exposition of such a poem is impossible in these brief limits. It should be read itself, not once, nor even twice. Robert Bridges had something to pass on to his generation, a vision of the truth, and he revealed it in terms of unimpeachable beauty. Nor must the form of "The Testament of Beauty" go unremarked and unpraised. In a new measure of incomparable malleability he showed a supreme mastery of rhythm. Much has been written concerning it, often by those who betray a complete unfitness for the task. The secret of the success of what he himself called his "loose alexandrines" lies, I think personally, in the fact that the metre is evolutionary rather than revolutionary, that the experiment is based upon a previous and triumphant experiment by the "mighty-mouthed inventor of harmonies." And here I should like to let Robert Bridges speak for himself: "In the art of English verse my own work has led me to think that there is a wide field for exploration in the metrical prosody, and that in carrying on Milton's inventions in the syllabic verse there is better hope of successful progress than in the technique of free verse as I understand it."

That advice is his technical legacy to those of us who come after him, and we lost by his death something more than an official chieftain. Poetry itself had been newly dignified by his practice of it.

JOHN MASEFIELD.

The appointment of Mr. John Masefield to the laureateship is provocative immediately of a discussion upon the nature of poetic beauty, and we are faced with the question as to how far beauty, in the art of poetry, can be homespun as against cloth of gold. In the older view upon poetry, a great mass of Mr. Masefield's work would have been said to possess only secondary beauty and not the full, authentic splendour of the Muse. I can imagine Vida and Boileau denying to "Dauber" and "The Everlasting Mercy" any specifically poetic beauty at all; I can imagine even Longinus and Quintilian being somewhat of the same opinion; but not entirely Aristotle, who would have had, I venture to believe, a few reservations in Mr. Masefield's favour; and certainly Euripides would have hastened to clasp hands with the new laureate. But the whole question of what is and what is not poetry has changed front, and that chiefly through two literary revolutions: the revolution called the Romantic School, and a revolution of later date which Mr. Masefield himself, consciously or unconsciously, has partly led—one which might be termed the Unromantic School. Even the classicists were not as non-romantic—in the literary sense—as the modern realists who, strangely enough, may be said to have grown out of the Romantic Movement, though their inheritance is complicated by the fact that they are also, in some sort, in reaction from the Parnassians and the Symbolists.

Still, be that as it may, the realism, the direct painting of the outwardly ugly, if inwardly dramatic—and therefore surely material for a poem—is modern to the extent that it has turned Apollo and the Muses from an aristocracy into a democracy. This, in that it has enlarged the audience for poetry, since it has given to the poet's net a wider sweep, has been wholly to the good, wholly evolutionary. A theme which to a classical poet would have seemed unworthy of attention seems to a modern poet worthy of his utmost endeavour. Nevertheless it cannot too often be affirmed that the enlargement of the scope of poetry to include, in Mr. Masefield's own words, "the dirt and the dross, the dust and scum of the earth," depends for its æsthetic success not on its theory but solely on the individual powers of the poet who seeks to put that theory into practice, and we are once more—as in art always—face to face with the old and fundamental problem of technique.

To many, especially to the young, self-confident critic fresh from the universities, the perfection of a writer's technique lies in its scrupulous freedom from verbal fault; but to the more experienced critic good technique lies principally in its power to hold an audience selon; as Napoleon said of another art, les règles. To the first type of critic the greatest writers of the world must seem rather astonishingly unsatisfactory—until he grows older and understands more of life, for it is only a true knowledge of life that can give a true knowledge of the greatest art. That is why the dilletante is so often a brilliant critic, but rarely a true one. Brilliance needs no experience, while truth does.

The technique of Mr. Masefield has been called in question by one critic after another. It is, of course, easy to show that his verse, as verse, may not always be classically flawless. Nevertheless it is constantly vivid, and vividness in poetry is no secondary virtue; and it is constantly human, that is to say, neither academically moribund nor preciously anæmic, and humanity in poetry is no secondary virtue either. If poetry is to exercise its proper function among the people of the world it must be human first and æsthetic after; and it is a blessed truth that in the case of the greatest and most authentic poets, the æsthetics and the humanity are found in equal proportion. If a poet's technique enables him to say what is clamouring in his soul to be said, and to say it in such a way that it evokes a real response in the fit reader, then his method is right for him, no matter how wrong it may be for some other poet—or for some critic of poets—with a different instinct towards expression, and I consider that no critic has a right to pillory any poet's lack of some other poet's verbal acrobatics when he has, as Mr. Masefield, the red-ripe glory in him. It is the very perversion of cleverness!

There are, however, poems in which Mr. Masefield's technique is finer, warmer and more luminous than in others, and though perhaps I am offering an opinion counter to the general one, I believe myself that his greatest work—because most intimately poetical—is less in poems such as "The Everlasting Mercy" and "Reynard the Fox" than in certain of his meditative poems, such as "Fragments," "Truth," "Biography" and in nearly all the "Lollingdon Downs" volume. These, I consider, form Mr. Masefield's purest achievement, being fine and most human in thought and passionately beautiful in expression. They have about them the very tang of immortality. So too have the ending of "Dauber" and the close of "The Widow in the Bye Street."

II.

No two poets could differ as a whole more radically, and yet be more alike in one fundamental matter, than the late laureate and his successor. It is as if each lacked what the other possessed; their one common factor being their intense preoccupation with beauty. But with John Masefield beauty is a more militant quality than it was with Robert Bridges. It is as though the new laureate has had to fight and wrestle for the attainment of it, while it came, almost as though unsought, to his predecessor. It is this which gives to Mr. Masefield's work the greater warmth and variety, and the greater exquisiteness to that of Robert Bridges.

John Masefield possesses the true gifts of the narrative poet. As a dramatist he is apt to prolong a scene beyond its climax, to water it, as it were, with the inessential; but in his tale-telling his lapses are not in the conduct of his story but through the facility of his technique, for too often he will make three lines say what two would say better. Nevertheless he can draw character and portray the deeps of a person, an achievement beyond the reach of Robert Bridges, just as the limpidity of thought of "The Testament of Beauty" is beyond his own. Mr. Masefield has always wrinkled his brows over the problem of existence, and has faced it much as a Roman centurion faced the Parthians; but Robert Bridges considered it in a walled garden, filled with fragrance and bird-song, and sighing gently over the dear stupidity of the unlettered generations.

But the measure of the unlikeness of these two poets may best, I feel, be exemplified by quoting them, as it might be, in an antiphone to the beauty so predominantly served by both—Robert Bridges with his "I love all beauteous things, I seek and adore them," John Masefield with his "Be it through me you shame the world!"

THE BOOKMAN PRIZE COMPETITIONS.

JUNE, 1930.

Answers to these Competitions (each on a separate sheet bearing name and address of sender) must be received by the Editor not later than the 14th of each month. A Competitor may enter for all the seven Competitions, but must cut out coupon below and send this with each answer or group of answers, and address envelope

"The Prize Page," THE BOOKMAN, St. Paul's House, Warwick Square, London, E.C.4.

That they may be available also to Overseas Competitors, Competitions I, II and VII will be the same each month until further notice, but the subjects for all the other Competitions may each month be changed.

Competitors must please keep copies of their MSS., the Editor cannot undertake to return them.

THE PRIZES OFFERED THIS MONTH ARE:

I.—ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric.

II.—HALF A GUINEA for the best quotation from English verse applicable to any review or the name of any author or book appearing in this Number.

III.—THREE NEW BOOKS for the best example of bathos from any poem, by a well-known poet, published this century.

IV.—HALF A GUINEA for the best criticism, in not more than two hundred words, of Hamlet's famous soliloquy, "To Be or Not to Be."

V.—HALF A GUINEA for the most terse pathetic passage selected from any modern novel.

VI.—HALF A GUINEA for the best review, in not more than one hundred words, of any recent book. Competitors should give names of Book, Author, and Publisher at head of each review.

VII.—THE BOOKMAN will be sent post free for twelve months to the sender of the best suggestion for a Competition.

Miss Claire Spencer, author of 'Gallows Orchard' (Jonathan Cape).

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR MAY.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to Sylvia Hooke, 39, Paternoster Row, E.C.4, for the following:

A SONG OF THANKSGIVING

This is the Day of Days.
Seek bright buds on the honeysuckle sprays,
Watch how the hawthorn laughs in morning's eyes,
Spilling her silver foam on every briar,
Breathing a perfume sweet as Paradise.
Hark to the chorus swelling in the skies.
The birds have never sung such roundelays,
From branch and cloud and thorn all silver-wet,
Echoes their ardent praise.

This is the Day of Days.
Now the late primrose seems more golden-fair,
All blossoms fling their colour on the air
Till the whole world is dizzy with their fire.
Now 'mid the long grass see the violet,
Tiptoe on slender stalk, all purple-bright,
As if she had waited through an endless night
To give that colour and dew to the morning light.

This is the Day of Days.
Oh, never was the sky so heavenly fair,
Never so warm a fragrance filled the air,
Never sang birds so wild, so full of glee,
Never breathed wind so indolent with bliss;
Never ran hearts so light, so fancy-free,
Never was love so undismayed as this.
Yea, even in the most barren heart behold
Hope born again in amethyst and gold.
Fresh shoots of joy and eagerness betray
The new Love sprung from death on such a day.
Creatures and men are jubilant with praise,
On this, the Day of Days.

LYRIC

I am in love, in love with Spring,
That fairy maid the elfin thing,
Gives me no rest,
Beneath my breast
My foolish heart is murmuring:

With Spring for lover,
You might discover
Secret of youth the fount of laughter,
And so be young for ever after,
At one with Spring.

Were I successful in my winning
I too should share that glad beginning,
Eager as dawn,
Oh, I would pawn
My very life if she would take me,
For so she would immortal make me!

But Spring, who sets the gods to sighing,
Could never heed a mortal's crying.
Land, water, air,
Her presence share,
But none shall stay her feet from flying.

Go, lovely Maid, warm winds engage thee,
Buds, birds and blossoms flock to page thee.
Herald of birth
For Mother Earth,
How could a mortal hope to cage thee!

Your lovers can do naught but sing
"Blessed be Spring!"

(Elsie Fry Laurence, Edson, Alberta, Canada.)

HAVEN.

Here, in an age of endless fret,
When Time sweeps by on beating wings;
A quiet house in a quiet street
Stored with old and lovely things;
Walls that are white as carded wool,
Whereon the sun his setting flings;
And floors that creak; and corners full
Of pattering steps and whisperings.
A quiet house; in a quiet street;
And sweetness here that quiet brings;
A hearth whereover men may sit,
While Time sweeps by on beating wings.

(John Dawson, The College, Lichfield.)

We also highly commend the lyrics by A. C. G. Ross (Glasgow), Irene Hubbard (Steeple Claydon), Kathleen Lee (London, E.), E. M. Newman (Devizes), Barbara Alden (Wellesley), Doreen Levy (Bloemfontein, South Africa), Mrs. John Carlisle (London, S.W.), L. C. III.—The Prize of Three New Books for the best drawing illustrating any book title is awarded to Kathleen Ida Noble, Bridge House, Lyston, near Long Melford, Suffolk, for the drawing reproduced on this page.

We also select for reproduction the drawings by Mrs. Irene Wintle, The Knoll, Ashlyn's Road, Berkhamsted, Hants, and by Freda I. Noble, Bridge House, Lyston, Suffolk, to each of whom a consolation prize of one book has been awarded. We select for special commendation the drawings by Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), R. Allen (Liverpool), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), E. L. Wise (Denmark Park, S.E.), L. Bruce (Ashford), D. Urwick (Walton-on-Thames), M. R. Fleeson (Manchester), Muriel Bending (Bexhill), James P. Higgins (Birstall).

By Joseph Hergesheimer.

By Mrs. Irene Wirtle.

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best patchwork poem is awarded to Mrs. Maude R. Fleeson, 26, Chatham Grove, Withington, Manchester, for the following:

Fair Amoret is gone astray (William Congreve)
And finds too late that men betray; (Oliver Goldsmith)
But left her lover in despair, (John Dryden)
For he'd profane so chaste a fair. (William Habington)

Her eyes are sapphires set in snow; (Thomas Lodge)
Go, pretty birds, and tell her so; (Thomas Heywood)
These, these are joys alone, I cry; (William Whitehead)
Yet will I love her till I die. (Anon.)

Absent from thee, I languish still, (Wilmot, Earl of Rochester)
Then to resist I had no will; (Thomas Otway)
The tender thought on thee shall dwell; (William Collins)
What fair can Amoret excel? (Mark Akenside)

We also select for printing:

Ah! my dear love, why do ye sleep thus long? (Spenser)
Now, while the birds thus sing a joyous song, (Wordsworth)
Rise, and put on your foliage, and be seen (Herrick)
Sleep-soothing groves and quiet lawns between. (Thomson)

Give life to this dark world which lieth dead. (Drummond)
Rich glowing colour on bare throat and head. (Gosse)
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height. (Browning)
My love, thou art my way, my life, my light. (Wilmot.)

And when thyself with shining foot shall pass (FitzGerald)
To light the high tips of the forest grass, (Morris)
Lo, all things wake and tarry and look for thee, (Bridges)
Thou whom I long for, who longest for me. (Rossetti)

(Phyllis E. Noble, Bridge House, Lyston, Long Melford, Suffolk.)

We also select for special commendation the replies by C. E. J. Capern (London, W.C.), Mrs. G. M. Yallop (Gorleston-on-Sea), Ierne Ormsby (Addiscombe), L. Bruce (Ashford), Emily Davis (Dublin), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), Margaret Burcham (Winscombe), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), Teresa B. Noble (Long Melford), Margaret A. B. Jones (Loughton), D. Urwick (Walton-on-Thames), Marjorie Crosbie (Wolverhampton), John E. Woods (Coventry), Ada F. Strike (West Worthing), H. Fawcett (London, W.C.), Norah M. Butterfield (Westward Ho!), R. K. Spedding (Liverpool), John A. Bellchambers (Highgate), Muriel Bending (Bexhill), Mrs. R. Mair (Guildford), Mabel Rourke (Manchester), Iris Ottaway (Bungay), A. Dodd (Bembridge, Isle of Wight), D. E. Tweed (London, S.W.).

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best cross-word puzzle introducing the names of well-known authors is awarded to H. Fawcett, 6, Doughty Street, W.C.1. Mr. Fawcett introduces the names of thirty-one authors, but his puzzle is too roughly drawn for reproduction. Every other competitor is disqualified, as each has introduced all manner of words as well as names of authors—some introducing twice as many words as names.

VI.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best hundred-word review is awarded to J. A. Jenkins, Edge Hill College, Liverpool, for the following:

PORTRAIT OF A CHINESE LADY. BY LADY HOSIE. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

It is difficult to give an adequate account of this most delightful book without appearing somewhat fulsome in one's unstinted praise thereof. It is a very satisfying piece of work, and is written in so human a manner that the note of friendliness and good-fellowship is the predominant one. Anything more sympathetic than the writer's appreciation and treatment of the handicaps and drawbacks of the women of China it is impossible to imagine, and she stresses—deliberately but apparently incidentally—the opportunities open to Western women to help these others to win through to social and economic freedom.

We also select for printing:

NEW LINKS WITH SHAKESPEARE. BY E. B. BARNARD. (Cambridge Press.)

Cheerfully written, this illustrated quarto exhibits wide research. But it does not reveal "new material of Shakespearean interest" in the bald inventory line: "Mr. Shakespeare owes Ralph Huband £20." Debtor's identity

"The Knife Behind the Curtain."
By Valentine Williams.
By Freda I. Noble.

remains unproven. Many Shakespeares then existed. Mr. Barnard asserts "little is known of Shakespeare between 1583—1596." What of "Love's Labour's" (1591); "Titus" (1594); "Poems" (1593-94)? Henry Condell is described as "Co-Editor of 1623 folio," and with Heminge "best qualified for the task." Manifestly absurd! They did not edit Shakespeare, or even write the preface they signed. Mr. Barnard conjectures, is redundant and woefully disappoints his expectant readers.

(Captain Wm. Jaggard, Rose Bank, Stratford-on-Avon, Warwicks.)

THE FLOWER OF LIFE.
By Thomas Burke. (Constable.)

No simple story of more elusive beauty has come from the pen of Mr. Thomas Burke than this short novel, "The Flower of Life." By some magic alchemy he turns to gold the drab surroundings and incidents in the life of a woman bent on the wheel of misfortune and sordid poverty. The streets of London, however squalid, are touched by his magic with a wan majesty. Jane is a figure of austere dignity. There is tragedy, kindliness and indifference in this quiet chronicle of a lowly life whose god was respectability and whose passion was pride.

Miss Mary Roberts Rinehart, whose new mystery novel, "The Door," has just been published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

(Kathleen Hyde, 9, Stepney Drive, Scarborough.)

THE ENGLISH CAPTAIN. By L. A. G. Strong.
(Gollancz.)

In this volume of short stories the author of "Dewer Rides" reveals a fine accuracy of word and phrase, which gives his work distinction and individuality. His style is oddly reminiscent of that which characterises Thomas Hardy's poems; he expresses with precision and beauty the undertones of thought and emotion—a rare and notable thing among modern writers. "The Gurnet," "Ann" and "The Gates" are especially remarkable for their delicacy of touch and their revelation of sympathetic insight. This book will undoubtedly enhance the reputation of an author whose first novel was recently acclaimed by a competitor in The Bookman.

(N. M. Butterfield, 3, Kingsley Terrace, Westward Ho!), Devon.)

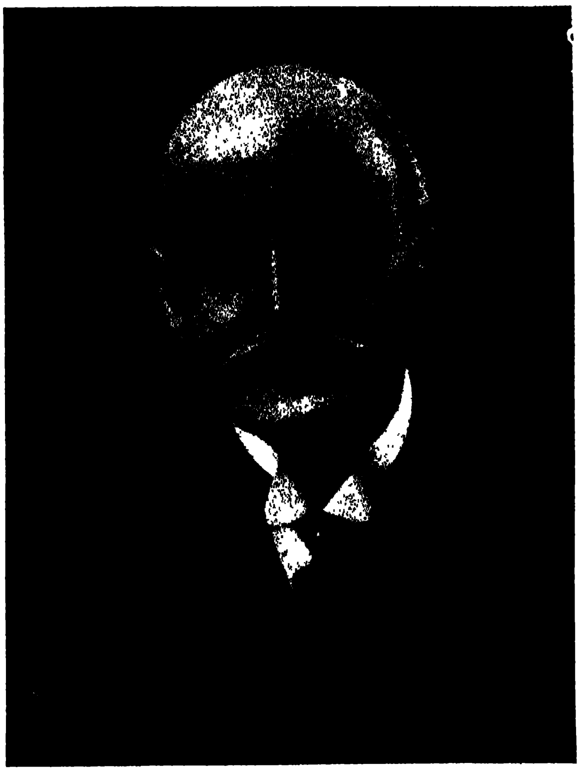
We also specially commend the reviews by Silvey A. Clarke (Hurlingham), A. E. Gowers (Haverhill), Margaret A. B. Jones (Loughton), C. S. Stamper (Grimsby), Alfred Higginson (South Kensington, S.W.), G. Pitt (London, N.), James P. Higgins (Birstall), Margaret Owen (Whitstable), A. Dodd (Bembridge, Isle of Wight), R. K. Spedding (Liverpool), Sylvia Hooke (London, E.C.), Agatha Honnywill (Bristol), Evelyn Bamber (Blackburn), Joan Stiebel (Leatherhead), Edith E. Hall (Eastbourne), S. Barrington McClean (Glasgow), Mrs. Emily E. Moore (Letchworth), J. S. Coltart (Norwich), B. M. Beard (Bexleyheath), K. M. Sanders (Bridport), S. R. Fuller (Streatham).

VII.—A Prize of One Year's Subscription to The Bookman is awarded to G. Macaskie, The Oratory Central R.C. School for Girls, Stewarts Grove, Sydney Street, Chelsea, S.W.3, and to Sam van Hoff, Karlsruhe Gardens, Campbell Place, Colombo.

THE BOOKMAN GALLERY.

G. B. BURGIN: HIS CENTURY.

In George Burgin's delightful "Memoirs of a Clubman," he tells how, being sent out to a Canadian uncle at eighteen, he was taken at once to a prayer meeting at Four Corners, and rather staggered to hear this pious uncle pray for him. There must have been a herald letter from his father. Young George wished to be an author, and had been told, "Very well, then; you must see the world a little before you begin. 'Home-keeping youth have ever homely wits.'" The prayer ran: "Thou knowest, O Lord, that in Thine infinite goodness and mercy Thou hast directed the steps of our young friend into our midst. He has it in mind, O Lord, to write books, and it has not yet been given him to know what sort of books. Turn him, O Lord, we beseech Thee, from the thoughtless error of his ways, and in Thine own good time teach him to do something useful."



My conviction is that this prayer was answered, as prayers may sometimes be, in the spirit and not in the letter. The young friend has lived to write and publish one hundred books—mostly novels—and I think them rather more useful work than any that Uncle James at Four Corners can have had in mind. There are sundry ways in which the art of fiction is of service. The novel may be a bigger and better pulpit than he had seen, or indeed, if not a pulpit, a bigger and better school. Some use is claimed in writing circles for even its most dismal examples. But the service least easily computed is a novel's contribution to the good cheer and happy charity of life, the service done when the author, with an honest, gay and sympathetic heart, merely holds a mirror up, letting us see life for a while undistorted by our frets and limitations. That is neither computed nor commonly thought about with due gratitude, yet it is a service only to be done by writers whom the Almighty has fitted for it. And it is the service done by George Burgin in all these novels.

A feat? Yes; a feat to be wondered at easily. But I am not, for my part, concerned very much in the debate as to whether it is, or is not, a feat without parallel. What concerns me more is the human debt of gratitude. Consider the hard fact that, apart from gratitude, the reward of such a "something useful" is mainly found in doing it. True, no honest, gay and sympathetic author knows what luck may come his way, and Burgin's "The Shutters of Silence" is in its forty-first edition. But this gallant diligence deserves better thanks than the world has given. It has been modest. Its motive has never been that egotism of "self-expression" which imposes too much upon humourless critics. It has been clean-minded, and that is a something rather precious in these times, when filthy novels parade all public ways with brassy faces.

To my mind, these merits are much rarer than they ought to be in current English fiction. I can think of no others which the novel so much lacks, by comparison with its natural pre-War sobriety and sane health. It has merits by way of compensation; some indeed are beyond the fetch of pre-War fancy and skill; but these are not the achievements of egotism, prurient or simply pretentious. And, so far as post-War fiction is good, it differs from Burgin's output most in being unhappy; for another of his diligent virtues is a resolute mind for the happy story when he can tell it. We shall inevitably come back to that preference, having learnt in suffering what to teach in song.

Meanwhile Mr. Burgin keeps on writing imperturbably. At 74, this feat of creative work, though it means more than 6,000,000 words written, is less wonderful than his unfailing freshness. That no doubt accounts for it. But who will pretend to account for that? One finds him, in spite of some physical fatigue, boyish still, with a warm heart and a light humour—proof that, in a longish life, he has lost neither interest nor courage. He says that such work takes something out of us. "We give so much to making shadows that we are in danger of becoming shadows ourselves." But he has somehow survived this peril and kept his hundredth book as airy as the first. Now, it is true that a novelist may owe some of his ability to do that to skill acquired as he learns his trade. But the wonder is, after all, that Nature has equipped him; and one finds in fact that George Burgin's method of work, almost a lack of method, has been to let Nature have her way. He has not nursed his strength with any regimen of hours, or ridden it like a hack as Trollope did (with no disadvantage), but has just written at any time, and for any length of time, when the dæmon possessed him, letting reactions take care of themselves.

Portrait by E. O. Hoppé. Mr. G. B. Burgin.

What is this dæmon? How does the genius of story-telling inspire and use a writer? He says very simply:

"You see some face or some incident that makes an impression. An idea goes into the back of your head somewhere and germinates. One day you will sit down and say to yourself, 'I've got to start,' and somehow the beginnings of a plot come to you. You have gradually imagined your story, and then comes the real difficulty—to know the people in it. You have conceived their characters, but you have to get to know them intimately and believe in them; because, if they're not real people to you, they can't be real to anybody else. The curse of it is you don't want to be interrupted then. If you're taken away from them you lose sight of them, and that's fatal. Until you get to know all about the people in your story the best thing to do is to go and live on a desert island."

The study is tyrannous for still another reason. "Of course you must have an idea to begin with, of what they are going to do—of what the story is about and what the end will be. You make a skeleton. But, for my sins, I can't begin with a note of that. Directly I make a note it has the effect of putting the thing out of mind." So he must make the more haste to clothe and animate his skeleton; and there is always the chance that it may turn out to be loose in the joints. "Often you plan for a character to do a thing and it turns out that he won't. However, that is really hopeful though for the moment embarrassing, for it means that the character is alive and real, with a will of his own. You have then to change your story, of course."

That account of the creative process comes from an authentic story-teller. Estimating my friend's output, I think I am justified in looking at it as one gallery of very human figures, rather than asking how many frames contain important works. The size of canvas used was prescribed by a publishing fashion; it has nothing to do with the size of his artistic achievement, and I see this, in the main, as a panorama of French Canadian life, teeming and happy, rich in humour and sympathy.

Apart from his Canadian stories, Mr. Burgin has written many novels of English life, the most recent of which are "Nitana," "Allandale's Daughters," "Out of the Swim," "The Final Test," "The Faithful Fool," etc. In addition he has written various tales of Eastern life embodying ideas picked up when he was secretary to Baker Pasha and accompanied him to Armenia on a Reform Commission. Among these are "Tomalyn's Quest," and "The Slaves of Allah." The scene of "The Hundredth Man" is partly laid in Australia, and there are two Spanish novels, "A Lady of Spain" and "Diana of Dreams." Hence, it will be seen that Mr. Burgin has had the good fortune to travel widely and study many and varied nationalities. Of all the countries he has visited, Canada was his first love although he has been unable to revisit it since the War.

The hundredth book, "The Woman Without a Heart," is a novelistic variant of "When you were a king in Babylon and I was a Christian slave." The hero's mother before he was born became firmly impressed with the idea that she and her husband had lived before, and wronged each other, and were condemned to expiate this wrong in various shapes for an indefinite period.

The husband believed this too, and, when the mother died, constantly impressed on his son that he would one day meet a woman whom he had wronged in a previous state of existence. The boy, in every other respect a sane and healthy young Englishman, unquestioningly believes this. The woman without a heart gets to know of this kink in his mentality, shams that she was the woman he had met in some bygone age, and insists that he must repair the wrong he had done her by furthering her present ambitions. She has no heart and uses him to get to know the millionaire whose secretary he is, and marries the millionaire. The rest of the story is devoted to the hero's escape from her toils when he is convinced that she is a fraud. Perhaps the best character in the book is the millionaire Bannister, who loves the woman without a heart and devises her punishment in the hope that it may one day redeem her.

Some fault may be found with G. B. B. on the score of hasty production; he himself says frankly that he has never been able to decide whether it would not have been better "to spend two or three years over a big book which a couple of hundred people might praise," instead of "turning out a smaller book in three months, content to tell a happy story pleasantly." But, on the whole, he is glad to have let fame look after itself. "There are too many people writing with swelled heads and becoming insufferable."

However, it is not a mere question of egotism. The limæ labor et mora is worth while as conscientious artistry, yet Mr. Priestley gave as little of it to his 240,000 words of "The Good Companions" as Mr. Burgin gave to "The Shutters of Silence," written in six weeks. The question is commonly one of taking a bigger risk with one's bread and butter. When Jerome was asked, "Why don't you give us another 'Paul Kelver'?" he said, "It took me two years to write and one must live." Certainly there is egotism in the ambition to write for posterity, and I suspect that motive of many failures. Burgin's advice to a young author is sound: "Say to yourself, 'I'm not going to bother about posterity; I'm going to write this story in the most conscientious way I possibly can, and, whatever posterity may think, I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I did all I could with it.'" But, if the young author be a sensitive artist, his most conscientious way may be slow; or, if his story needs a big canvas, it may aggravate his risks in another way. In either case he will and should be judged by his quality as well as by the fertility he shows; and my friend's best answer on that score would be, I think, that the human values have more weight for a fine judgment than the nice artistic ones.

These his work has in the highest measure, and they give it a large beauty that many a painstaking artist misses. The figures in the long gallery, limned with unfailing sympathy and a blithe, gentle humour, are very lovable; and it is the spirit in which they were created that one admires and loves in this prolific author, still young, and wearing his honours modestly.

EUROPA'S BEAST.[1]

If you give Mr. Mottram's title its full significance, I suppose you must regard Olive Blythway as Europa and Geoffrey Skene as the Bull, but the parallel is not suggested until the close, after they are married, on their honeymoon in Venice, and looking at the Veronese painting of the Rape of Europa:

> "Then, as he looked, he began to wonder. Didn't he frequently feel just like that prize animal, surfeited with effort beneath a yoke that was self-imposed by its own nature's necessities? And, making allowance for differences of diet and daily activities and contemporary manners, didn't she submit to her destiny—her actual fate, anyhow—with just that lovely, almost ostentatious acquiescence?"

Somehow Olive fails to win your sympathy. When Skene first sees her in the Cathedral she is a strangely pathetic, alluringly romantic figure; but when Skene comes to know her the pathos and romance seem superficial, she dwindles to a rather shallow, commonplace little person, and Skene himself is dimly aware of this, yet she retains her fascination for him and, in spite of the fact that she is married to a war-broken, neurotic, self-centred young man, whom she has ceased to love, Skene feels she is the one woman in the world for him and is recklessly resolved to make her his own. Accident clears the way for him to do this without outraging the proprieties, and though you do not understand his passion—the War had left him, also, uprooted and perplexed, and possibly he did not understand it himself—you are held closely interested in the man and in the woman, and in their story. Their characters, and indeed all the characters in the book, are drawn with Mr. Mottram's accustomed skill and insight—Skene's Aunt Chris, as practical as she is kind, is wholly charming, the egregious Mrs. Garmont Liversedge a pure joy; Olive's father and mother, her old grandfather and eerie old grandmother are sketched with humour and subtle understanding, and Olive herself fails to capture your affection only because she is so perfectly and faultily human. As a story, this will not rank with "The Spanish Farm," but it is as well written and as strong in its characterisation as anything Mr. Mottram has done.

SEVEN BOBSWORTH.[2]

The title has no reference to the price of the book, but stands for the number of the house in Bobsworth Garden City which was the address of Mr. Fiddler, and the story is derived from the private and occasionally scandalous diaries and papers he left for somebody to edit and publish after his death. Fiddler was a quiet, average man, with some small private means, who was drawn into becoming publicity agent for the Garden City founded by the eminent financiers Sir James Cobbold and Lord Grout on philanthropic lines which had to be cautiously modified as time went on, in order to make the City a profitable as well as a going concern. The designing and inauguration of the Garden Suburb (a ground plan of which is given on the end-papers), steps taken to popularise it, the desirable and undesirable residents who settled down in it, and the efforts made, for business reasons, to freeze out the undesirables and replace them with respectable suburban people—all the life of the place and the characters of its founders and of many of its conventional and oddly unconventional inhabitants are described with wit and humour and quiet satire that are shrewdly revealing and keep you continually amused. Where is Bobsworth? It has features so much in common with every Garden City that every Garden citizen will have his suspicions, but it is pictured so graphically and in such detail that you are convinced it must have an authentic local habitation somewhere under another name. " Seven Bobsworth " is at once a brilliant social satire, an acute commentary on certain developments in modern life, and excellent entertainment.

THE GOLDEN POUND.[3]

Except here and there, in " Set in Dominion," and in " What Shakespeare Knew," these stories are written in the very lightest of light veins; they are whimsical, fantastic, farcical, droll, everything but serious. Often a streak of charming sentiment runs through them, now and then there is a fleeting, elusive hint of pathos, but in the main they were written to amuse and are delightfully amusing. Mr. Hutchinson evidently has a tenderness for schoolgirls who have character and rebel against too much discipline. He introduces an exasperating and attractive one in " The Girl With the Grave Nose," and another in in " The Disciplinarian," and his story of how the difficult Celia was at last completely subdued by the resolute kindness and genial tolerance of the wisely sympathetic and understanding Miss Strong, famed as a stern trainer of the young, is one of the deftest, most entertaining things in the book. Clever too, in its gossamer, airy way, is " The Wicked Aunt," and in its quainter, more grotesque fashion, " The Magic Stick." They are all fairy-tales for grown-ups, fresh and piquant in style as in idea, and the grown-up who writes this has read them with complete enjoyment.

CIMARRON.[4]

While the East was settling down to a life of order and culture, the prairie lands of Oklahoma were still a wilderness. The displaced Indians were still brooding over their wrongs, a peril to the early settlers; bandits with their six-shooters kept scattered prairie towns and unfortunate travellers in a state of uneasiness. Yet it was this wild land that called Yancey Cravat from the orderliness of Kansas and the decorum of his wife's family into the heart of unknown dangers. And Sabra, his wife, brought up to elegance and comfort, went with him, taking their four-year-old son. If she had guessed half the discomforts and dangers she was to face, would she have gone? Undoubtedly, for Sabra was made of the true pioneering stuff, and while her big, handsome husband did all the picturesque, theatrical things, Sabra did the hard work and kept the newspaper he started coming out regularly. Miss Ferber gives a vivid picture, glowing with colour, full of movement, of the early Oklahoma days, and in the foreground are Yancey and Sabra, drawn with sympathy and humour, very much alive. Yancey with his ideals, his waywardness, longing to make a new state, something finer than any that had been before; Sabra working quietly from the domestic angle to make the state a replica of the one from which they have escaped. A brilliant book, bold in conception and written with shrewd understanding.

THE STRANGER : AN ADVENTURE AMONG THE ENGLISH.[5]

Until he was sixteen Rodney Gayne had never set foot in his native country. Coming to England an orphan to live with an aunt and uncle, he found himself something of a foreigner among his own countrymen. The feeling stayed with him. English snobbishness, English desire for conformity, English notions of fair play, English aristocracy—these things puzzled him; he was always battling against the stream. How could he be friends with a common village boy, and still associate with a young baronet and his sister? Yet such is the underlying strength of the quiet, dreamy youth that somehow he contrives to do it. The merry, impetuous, imperious Lydia is rather more than a friend; her power over him is enduring. Rodney grows up, goes to Oxford, goes to the War, but remains intrinsically the same boy with the analytical mind and tender conscience to whom the impudent young baronet said: " I shall get more fun out of life than you." The book is perhaps too leisurely, but it is an interesting study, and when at the end Rodney says: " I swore I'd get to understand the place and be English myself some day," we are inclined to endorse Lydia's declaration: " You've been far, far more English than any of us."

HER FATHER'S HOUSE.[6]

It is delightful when an author whose progress one has watched, not without anxiety lest she should fall below her previous accomplishment, actually soars beyond it. In her new novel Hilda Vaughan reveals a charming, even a robust, vein of humour that blends beautifully with the pathos and drama of her theme. We are carried along in spite of ourselves, for there is so much on the way that urges us to linger and read again. The characters of this tale are a considerable advance on those of " The Invader," Miss Vaughan's last book, while the sitautions are more tense and the incidents are never anything but natural, though we see them through the eyes of a lyric poet. It is not only in her descriptions of scenery that the poet discloses herself, but in the clouds of tragedy that hang over the world and the brilliant gleams of sunlight that struggle through them. It will be a long time before we will forget old Tom the shepherd, who thought that a bath at his time of life would be an experiment fraught with peril, and Nell Tretower and her gallant wreck of a father, and Uncle Mark, the very rigid, and Matthias Jones who, writing a letter of indignant denial that the manageress of one of his milk-shops is disreputable, informs Nell's mother that " your younger daughter proved to be as idle, light-minded, flighty and ungrateful as your elder one was changeable. I am glad you have no more in family to offer me. Assuring you, dear Madam, of our grateful esteem, We are, Your obliged servants, Matthias Jones & Co., Ltd." Hilda Vaughan is to be very warmly congratulated on this novel, and so are the thousands who will revel in its pages.

TALES TOLD BY SIMPSON.[7]

Some of Miss May Sinclair's finest work is to be found in these stories concerning an artistic circle in Chelsea, all told by Roland Simpson, and each one in its way a little masterpiece. Whether Miss Sinclair is dealing with the pathos of " Khaki," the bank clerk who loved to frequent the studios and who was " in love with danger," or with the comedy of the celebrated author, Watt Gunn, and his attempt to escape from the lion-collector, Mrs. Folyat-Raikes, she always writes with the admirable restraint and economy characteristic of her work, and has a keen sense of the subtleties of life. Her humour and her sentiment are alike subtle, delicately woven into the fabric of her stories, and even if nothing happened to the people she describes, it would be a delight to read about them, for all are invested with the exciting qualities of humanity; all are real, skilfully finished portraits. But something does happen every time; Miss Sinclair can get the essence of a life-history into a few thousand words, can be satirical without giving way to malice, ironical without descending to bitterness. "The Bambino," "Between the Lines," as well as "Khaki" and "The Collector," rank among the best stories in the book—though it is hard to state a preference when all the thirteen are so entertaining and so beautifully done.

GLORY PLACE.[8]

There is a largeness about Miss Bower's themes, a leisureliness about her manner which give her an affinity with the Victorian novelists. "Glory Place" is a long novel—almost four hundred pages—but the length is necessary to its subtle characterisation and compelling atmosphere. In East Anglia tradition dies hard, and ancestry is revered even more passionately than in the more sophisticated regions of England. Miss Bower's story is of a man in whom ambition is a "grievous fault" and who, coming of ancient lineage, yearns to possess the ancestral hall, Glory Place. To this end he sacrifices all the better part of his nature, all that men hold dear—love, honour, the three women who influence his life—the beloved, the loving and the woman whom, to achieve his ambition, he marries. And what does he gain by it? Miss Bower tells us in a dramatic, carefully written, carefully thought out story, a story that keeps one intensely interested from its opening page to the final bitter calamity that wrecks Anthony Gayteways's plans—yet brings with it an echo of hope. The characters are cleverly drawn, and although the principal ones do not invite our sympathy to any great extent, their very naturalness keeps us absorbed in their actions and thoughts, and the circumstances that aid or thwart them. It is a human book, touching depths of reality, and pleasing with the haunting strangeness of that remote East Anglia Miss Bower knows so intimately.

THE PROGRESS OF BOOKBINDING.*

The monks, with the assistance of goldsmith and jeweller, were the first bookbinders, before printing was invented, and the costly and beautiful bindings of their manuscript psalters and books of hours remain among the things that are a joy for ever. But Mr. Michael Sadleir's concern is not with the whole art of bookbinding; he has made a careful study of the practical development of publishers' bindings since publishing has been a considerable business or profession, and has written a history of that development and of the different styles of bindings adopted by publishers from time to time during the hundred and fifty years ending at the end of last century. Starting with the primitive, unlettered paper wrappers in which some eighteenth century books were issued, he shows how these were succeeded by the stiff cover with labelled spine, and that by cloth bindings and labels; how decorations on the cloth in gold and colour were introduced; and duly brings us to the publishers' bindings that were in general use thirty years ago. It is an extensive survey that will interest all who are interested in books, and will be of special value to collectors in helping them to recognise from the style of a book's binding the approximate date of its publication. The volume is illustrated with twelve collotype plates showing bound books of various periods.

This is the first volume in a "bibliographia" series of studies in book history and book structure between 1750–1900, which Mr. Michael Sadleir is editing, and others in preparation are "An Index to the 'Annuals,'" by Andrew Boyle; "A Bibliography of William Beckford of Fonthill," by Guy Chapman; and "Henry Colburn," the story of a publisher of the Regency, based on his private notes.

RUDYARD KIPLING.†

The task of writing about the great ones of the earth is not an easy one. Some try to fit a genius into a niche that has been the special viewpoint of other great ones of his craft, but to essay to do this must mean failure; for "each in his separate star" differs from the rest. Mr. Hopkins has realised this, and has given us a most interesting and well-reasoned book. This "story of a genius" is well worth reading from many points of view, one of the chief being that the author has neglected no part of Mr. Kipling's writings. To many the poet and author is known principally for his poems and stories dealing with soldiers and, fine as these are, there is also another side frequently lost sight of—the splendid lyrics, such as "Eddi's Service," "The Recall" and "Cities and Thrones and Powers." And new to some, unacquainted with Indian publications, will be the verses describing "the long-haired things of the studios":

> "But I consort with long-haired things
> In velvet collar-rolls,
> Who talk about the Aims of Art,
> And 'theories and goals,'
> And moo and coo with women-folk
> About their blessed souls.
>
> "But what they call 'psychology'
> Is lack of liver pill,
> And all that blights their tender souls,
> Is eating till they're ill,
> And their chief way of winning goals > Consists in sitting still."

London did not appeal to Kipling. The magic and charm of the East were in his blood. The city of the West could not offer a fare so mysterious, subtle and alluring as did Lahore or Calcutta. But still the Empire, and such men as Joseph Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes, who stood for its further greatness, he cared for very much. To such a patriot the true picture of a British army officer "is of a captain putting down his glass untasted, after twelve hours of hunger and thirst, to make sure that his men are properly fed and billeted." A little different picture from one or two of those drawn rather unpleasantly by some of the more modern writers of war stories!

Like many artists, Kipling is attached to no particular section of the community. "Kipling's God is the God of the Old Norse Sea Kings, the fighting God, the 'Jehovah of the Thunders,' who can sympathise with men who can put up a good fight or sing a roystering barrack song." The book is a very welcome addition to those Mr. Hopkins has written on Kipling and on Sussex.

THE BOOKMAN'S DIARY.

NOTICES.

All communications intended for the Editor must be addressed to the Editor of THE BOOKMAN, ST. PAUL'S HOUSE, WARWICK SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.4.

A preliminary letter of inquiry should be sent to the Editor before any manuscript is submitted for his consideration.

It is with more than regret that I record the death last month of Mrs. Marion St. John Webb, a writer, for children whose work has for some years past been steadily growing in popularity. She is best known for her three books of tales in verse about "The Littlest One," which have reached a sale of well over a hundred thousand, and were two years ago collected in one volume, "The Littlest One: His Book"; and for her series of whimsical, quaintly imaginative "Mr. Papingay" stories in prose. These last, which ran serially in the Woman's Pictorial before appearing in book form, were "The Little Round House," "Mr. Papingay's Ship," "Mr. Papingay's Caravan," and "Mr. Papingay's Flying Shop" to be published shortly by Messrs. Collins. She was still in her teens when she began contributing verses for children to the Daily News and other papers, and these were in 1914 included in her first book, "The Littlest One." The present vogue of verse that is written not only about children but for children had not started so long ago, and it is doubtless with this in mind that Mr. A. G. Sparks (of Harrow), sending an appreciation of her work to THE BOOKMAN, refers to her as "one who struck a pioneer note in contemporary literature. I shall never forget," says Mr. Sparks, in the course of an article that comes too late to be given in full, "the thrill of sheer delight I experienced at the old Steinway (now Grotian) Hall in 1920 when that fine actor-reciter, Mr. Utt Ridge, rendered Mrs. St. John Webb's 'Tit for Tat' in his child mimicry. That it was the outstanding success of a fine performance was evident." Since 1914, in addition to the "Littlest One" and "Mr. Papingay" series, her other books have been "Eliz'beth, Phil and Me," "The Little One in Between" and twelve small volumes about flower, sea and other fairies, all in verse and illustrated by Margaret Tarrant; and in prose, "The Girls of Chequertrees," "Knock Three Times," "The House of the Twisting Passage" and "The Magic Lamplighter," a fantasy woven out of the real life of present-day London and the glamorous old London of legend and history. Always a lover of London, she and her husband, Mr. Sidney H. Webb, had for long made their home at Pump Court, in the Temple, where she will be greatly missed by a multitude of friends. Until her illness last December brought all work to an end, she had for two years been contributing verses for children every week to the Sketch, a selection of which, "John and Me and the Dickery Dog," will be published this summer by Messrs. Harrap, with illustrations by A. H. Watson. That she had the gift of appealing to children and making the people of her stories in verse and prose real to them, was shown by the letters from children in all parts of the world that were continually coming, addressed to herself or to the imaginary men, women and children of her books. "If you believed in fairies," said the Evening News, writing of her death, "you could easily believe that Mrs. Webb was in close touch with the Little People. She was born with a delicate air, an ethereal beauty, and a charming and winsome simplicity that remained with her always. She was also very humorous—and brave." It was her courage and humour that enabled her to work more than ever in the years when her health was failing, and to be happy in her work to the last.

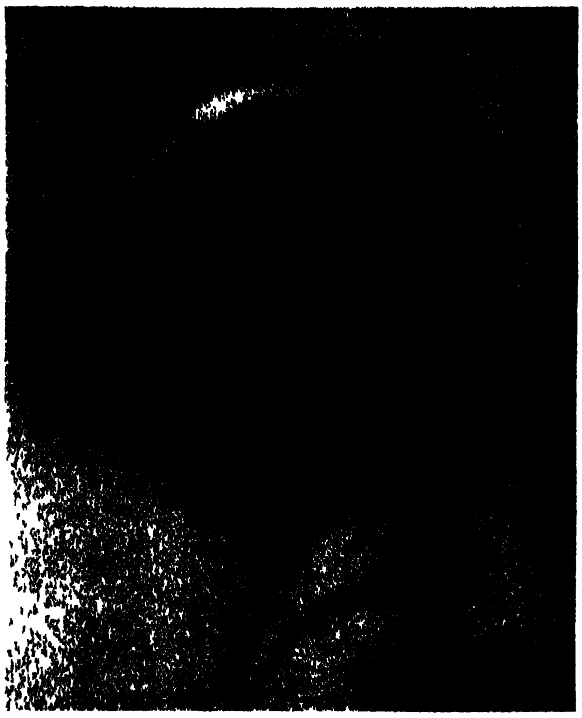
The completed portion of Lord Balfour's Autobiography will be published this autumn by Messrs. Cassell, who will publish also the official Life of Lord Balfour which is now in preparation but will take some two or three years to complete.

Messrs. Constable are issuing a collected edition of the works of Mr. George Bernard Shaw. This will be in thirty volumes and limited to a thousand sets. The first ten volumes, which will include Mr. Shaw's first novel, "Immaturity," a number of unpublished letters, a complete act omitted from the second edition of "Back to Methuselah," and his last play, "The Apple Cart," will be ready in July.

After writing two novels of modern life, Mr. Wallace B. Nichols has completed a romance of the days of Henry VII, "A Wonder for Wise Men," and it will be published this month by Messrs. Ward, Lock, who have just issued a new edition of Mr. Nichols's poignantly beautiful narrative poem, "The Song of Sharruk."



Sir Charles Petrie's Life of George Canning is to be published this month by Messrs. Eyre & Spottiswoode.

No authoritative Life of Marie Corelli has yet made its appearance, and we are to have this at last in the "Memoirs of Marie Corelli," by Bertha Vyver, which Messrs. Alston Rivers have in the press. Miss Vyver, as Miss Corelli's lifelong friend and companion, is able to write from intimate personal knowledge, and a special chapter of recollections and criticism is contributed by Mr. J. Cuming Walters. A first issue of the book, limited to two hundred and fifty copies, is now in readiness and likely to be over-subscribed; the ordinary edition will not be published until September.

Mr. Martin Secker has just included D. H. Lawrence's "Mornings in Mexico" and "Fantasia of the Unconscious" in his New Adelphi Library.

Mr. F. A. Mackenzie writes: "In your kind and generous notice of my book, 'The Russian Crucifixion,' you state that no protests were made by the civilised world against the abuses of Tsarism, and that therefore any protests against Soviet oppression must be made with diffidence. This is not the case. The ruthless pogroms and the oppression of freedom and free thought under Tsarism were the subject of constant public protest in this country and elsewhere. Our Government, on at least one occasion, made strong official representations. Not long before the Great War a declaration was published, signed by a large number of leading authors in Great Britain, voicing their indignation. I myself, in my own small way, spoke out." Our reviewer says he was referring to the very strong protests recently made by the Pope and other heads of Churches, and supported with such wide publicity. This had not happened before.

A book that should be welcome to all who are interested in the past is "The Old Book: A Mediæval Anthology," edited and illuminated by Dorothy Hartley, and to be published by Mr. Alfred Knopf. From a wide acquaintance with the out-of-the-way literature of the period, Miss Hartley has brought together a quaint collection of love poems, recipes, prescriptions, curses—all manner of odd scraps of prose and verse that serve to give amusing, fantastic, lurid and informing glimpses of the life, superstitions, practices and way of thought of the folk of the Middle Ages. There is a running commentary of marginal notes, and Miss Hartley's illustrations in colour and black-and-white are subtly in harmony with the mediæval atmosphere of the book. One of the illustrations is reproduced in our "Collector" section. "The Old Book" will be issued in a limited edition of 1,300 copies for England and America, Nos. 1 to 75 of the English edition being signed by Miss Hartley.

There is more of imagination, of the story-telling art and of literary quality in the work of Mr. W. J. Locke than in that of several contemporary novelists who are not too popular to be praised by the elect. Indeed the elect praised him enthusiastically in the early years when he was writing "At the Gate of Samaria," "Derelicts," "Idols," "The Usurper," "Where Love Is——," and obtaining an audience that felt fit because it was comparatively few. Those novels, the last four anyhow, have the same grace of style, the same charm of sentiment and skill in characterisation and, one would have thought, make the same wide appeal to the general reader as most of his later books, but in 1905 he "went popular" with "The Morals of Marcus Ordeyne" (which took the town by storm too in a dramatised version), and still more popular with that irresistible, picturesque romance, "The Beloved Vagabond," and he has retained his popularity here and in America from that day to this. After leaving Cambridge, Mr. Locke lived for a while in France; he spent many holidays there, and finally made his home there and for long past had been living at Cannes. That he studied the people as well as the literature of France, and had an intimate understanding of them, you would guess from the insight and sympathy with which he has drawn that lovable rascal Paragot, Sebastian Pasquale, the joyous heathen, Aristide Pujol, and other of the Frenchmen in his stories. While he was waiting for success to come to him he took a post as mathematical tutor in a North Country school, and then for ten years was secretary of the Royal Institute of British Architects, and it was "The Beloved Vagabond" that set him free at last to live by his pen. Among the ablest of his later books are "Stella Maris," "Jaffery," "The Rough Road," "The Great Pandolfo," "The Old Bridge" and, this spring, "The Town of Tombarel." He left another novel completed, "The Shorn Lamb," and this will in due course be published by Messrs. John Lane, who were the publishers of his first book and have remained his publishers ever since.

Mr. W. J. Locke.

I have just received from New Zealand Nos. 3 and 4 of The N.Z. Artists' Annual, edited by Pat Lawlor, a miscellany of pictures, stories and verse which has given me good entertainment. English editors have already annexed several of Mr. Lawlor's authors (including Hector Bolitho) and three or four of his artists (Low and Harry Rountree and E. H. Thompson among them), and there are others in these Annuals they will not be happy until they have taken away from him. George Finey's caricature of Sir Joseph Ward is a masterpiece of grotesquely humorous drawing, and his sketch of Sir Truby King is as good. Why hasn't somebody here stolen George Finey? But I shall content myself by saying that artists, authors and editor (who is also one of the authors) have combined to produce so clever and lively an Annual that I wonder we do not see more of it over here.

Mr. Pat Lawlor writes to me more especially to express his satisfaction with our recent article on New Zealand literature. "Mr. Dale's survey of literature in N.Z. was an excellent one," he says, "but to my mind it was incomplete. I can think of at least a dozen notable names he has not mentioned. How about the brilliant Frank Morton, James Cowan (now busy on the most ambitious literary undertaking ever attempted in this country, 'Legends of the Maori'), Elsdon Best (our greatest authority on the Maori), Lindsay Buick, Dick Harris (acknowledged to be one of our finest poets), Mervyn Skipper (whose 'Meeting Pool,' recently published by Elkin Mathews, has established record sales), John Barr, G. B. Lancaster, Fergus Hume (at least Hume was born in N.Z.), the late Mr. Justice Alpers and Mona Tracey. I will not add Hugh Walpole, for although he was born here he left this country when a child. Incidentally, Mr. Dale dismisses Eileen Duggan, our most brilliant living poetess, in a few lines, yet her work has been acclaimed by the great A. E."

Admitting that in a short article it is difficult to mention everybody, Mr. Lawlor thinks that those he names should not have been omitted. Well, Mr. Dale is a New Zealander, with an extensive knowledge of New Zealand literature, and who is to decide when critics who are both on the spot disagree? Not that Mr. Dale and Mr. Lawlor do this; they are probably in agreement and only the inexorable limits of space prevented Mr. Dale from giving more names than he did. Fergus Hume, by the way, was born in England, went young to New Zealand and, in 1887, when he was under thirty, published his roaringly successful "Mystery of a Hansom Cab," and came back to England on the heels of it, settled down here and, I am pleased to know, is still living with us, in Essex. And perhaps I ought to say that Mr. Skipper's excellent "Meeting Pool" did not make its appearance until after our article was published. Otherwise, I have nothing to add except that I wish the other authors in Mr. Lawlor's list were published over here so that I might have the pleasure of reading them.

A book that will be read with more than ordinary interest by all who love children and are concerned for their welfare is "Farthing Bundles," by Clara F. Grant (3s. and 5s. Fern Street Settlement, Bromley-by-Bow, E.). Miss Grant is hon. warden and secretary of the Settlement and has told, briefly, the story of her own life, of her training and experience as a teacher, and finally of how the Settlement came to be established and of the work that has been done and is being done there by her many helpers and herself. The Settlement is established near a school attended by hundreds of very poor children, and its aim is to bring more happiness into their lives by looking after their social needs and their home life generally. The book takes its quaint title from a pleasant practice of giving tickets to certain of the children (all of them, in time, take their turn) and lining them up every Saturday evening to buy for a farthing bundles of toys that are sent for them from friends all over the world. The many little kindnesses, and the many great services that are rendered to the multitude of children in one of the poorest quarters of London are related simply, sympathetically, with a most sensitive understanding of all that poverty means and with a shrewd and gentle humour. Incidentally, Miss Grant expresses practical views on the subject of education that are well worth considering. You should buy "Farthing Bundles" both for its vivid pictures of the comedy and tragedy of life in mean streets and because all profits from it will go to help the beneficent work that is being carried on by the Settlement.

A novel that is already making a considerable stir in America, "The Coronet," by Manuel Komroff, will be published here shortly by Messrs. Harrap. It is an historical romance on a vast scale, opening in Florence in 1600 and coming down to the Napoleonic wars, and to the Russian revolution and the campaigning in Russia of the White Army against the Soviet Republic. Mr. Komroff was born in New York, and educated at Yale. He went to Russia in the early days of the revolution and, having already been a journalist in America, became editor of a Petrograd daily, which died when the Bolsheviks came into power. Thereafter he made his way across Siberia, to Japan and China, getting an engagement for a while on a Chinese newspaper, and ultimately returned to America, where he worked for some years as a journalist and on the staff of Messrs. Boni & Liveright, the publishers. But having published a volume of short stories and a first novel, "The Juggler's Kiss," he retired from his publishing office to find time for the re-writing of "The Coronet." This was originally written seven years ago as a short story, and has now grown to a novel of six hundred pages.

NOTES ON RECENT BOOKS.

Mr. W. Riley takes rather an unusual theme in SQUIRE GOODALL (7s. 6d.; Herbert Jenkins) — or perhaps one should say he treats it in a new way, for the successful business man aspiring to be village squire is not an entirely new figure in fiction. Mr. Riley however approaches him from an original angle. To begin with Squire Goodall, known in the North Country as a "wool man," was no ordinary captain of industry. His inconspicuous appearance gave no hint of his enormous wealth, and his own modest tastes made him satisfied with a simple life in a suburban villa. Not so his elder daughter, and to pacify her he bought Morton Towers. His tenants resented the intrusion of business people and the ousting of the old family, and the unpretentious little Squire had many difficulties to overcome, but proved at length that kind hearts are indeed more than coronets, and character matters more than blood or wealth. How the change of circumstances affected his two daughters, as well as himself, forms the substance of an able and arresting story.

There is a striking character sketch in THE BLACK CAMEL, by Earl Derr Biggers (7s. 6d.; Cassell)—that of Inspector Charlie Chan, the Chinese detective of the Honolulu Police, who follows up the mysterious murder of Shelah Fane, of the cinema, the famous beauty. A big, bulky, quick-witted, imperturbable, tireless man is Chan. Shelah Fane is sought in marriage by the rich Alan Jaynes, but she consults a fortune-teller as to whether she should accept. The seer looks in his crystal and tells her she is afraid to do so, as something in her past will continue to haunt her. A little later Shelah is found murdered in curious circumstances. Inspector Chan solves the mystery. An unusually attractive, well written, easily moving detective story.

LETTERS OF PRINCE VON BÜLOW.*

This volume consists of translations of letters and memoranda taken from a considerably larger selection, issued in two volumes in Germany, from Prince von Bülow's official correspondence during the years 1903-1909. They include some confidential letters exchanged between him and the German Emperor. In that period the main events were the Russo-Japanese War, the Entente Cordiale, various meetings of British, French, German and Russian fleets with "hurrah" accompaniments, the German Emperor's visit to Tangier, the Algeciras Conference, the fall of Delcassé, the eternal Balkan question, the absorption of Bosnia by Austria, the Anglo-German naval rivalry, and the incident of the interview granted by the Emperor to the Daily Telegraph.

To the patient excavator of historical material—whose patience will induce him to make a card index as he goes along—this volume will be of immense service for the period covered. But from the point of view of the more impetuous general reader it suffers from three faults. In the first place the letters badly want "linking up": nothing is so tiresome as to have to pass from one letter to another, often dealing with an entirely different subject, without a helpful paragraph to bridge the gap. It is true that the material is divided into years and that each year is preceded by a "note," but this expedient is not very helpful, nor indeed are the notes very good. Secondly, the letters are admittedly a selection and the selection seems rather casual—a point referred to below. In the third place a book of this nature requires a long and very detailed index. Actually the index consists of less than five pages ("Is this the mighty ocean? Is this all?"), and is amateurish to a degree.

* "Letters of Prince von Bülow." Translated and with a Preface by Frederic Whyte. 24s. (Hutchinson.)

As regards the second and third points just mentioned, the Russo-Japanese War naturally exerted a profound influence upon European diplomacy in general and upon Russo-German relations in particular. But there is not a single document to show how Bülow was affected by the dramatic and startling particular occurrences of that war. There is no contemporary reference to Liao-yang, a battle which startled every soldier in Europe—and Bülow had been a soldier. The Japanese were imbued with the tenets of German strategy. The advance and subsequent concentration almost on the battle-field were strongly reminiscent of Moltke in 1866. The counterstroke by Kuroki's army made the battle a classic, and the first real trial of strength in Manchuria terminated in the unexpected retreat of the Russian army. In a flash a new aspect of the Far Eastern question was revealed: the Yellow Man had quite definitely defeated an army of White Men led by one of the foremost soldiers of Europe. Surely the dislocation of the strata of European statecraft produced by this shock must have been the subject of interested comment by Bülow? Nothing of the sort is however included in the collection. Nor can we discover how he reacted to Sha Ho, Mukden, the capture of 203-Metre Hill, or the crowning mercy of Tsushima. The Dogger Bank incident made an immense stir at the time, but the pages of this book are practically unruffled by it, and the index, like the Indian Ocean in Mr. Kipling's poem, simply "sets and smiles." There is indeed some comment of the obiter dictum kind, in a letter to Prince Henry of Prussia, of date March 30th, 1905, upon Liao-yang and Mukden, but the iron resolution of the index-maker to keep these secrets to himself remains unshaken.

It is stated on the "flap" that "some of the ex-Kaiser's outspoken letters are bound to excite wide attention," but there is nothing sensational, and candour compels us to admit that William II, from the evidence of this book, appears to have been animated throughout by the very laudable intention of not allowing Germany to be shipwrecked on the uncharted quicksands which lay thick in the seething cross-currents of that treacherous lagoon of international politics in which the Great Powers suddenly found themselves embayed. There is nothing, for instance, in the least like the bellicose attitude of Queen Victoria, teste Mr. Lytton Strachey, in 1878. There is, however, from the Emperor to Bülow, on August 11th, 1905, a curious letter in which he complains, apropos of the visit to Tangier, "Despite the impediment to my horsemanship due to my crippled arm, I mounted a strange horse, and that horse might have brought me within a hair's breadth of my life—that was your stake in the game." And later in the postscript the Emperor declares that Bülow's threatened resignation "would not find the Emperor still living." One would like to think that these grave statements—italicised in the original—were mere Imperial jests, but the tenor of the remainder is rather against this view.

The incident of the interview granted to the Daily Telegraph is described as being "the most exciting thing" in the section devoted to the year 1909. But it is difficult to register excitement over what are mere vague and belated references. The interview itself is not even summarised, and who of the readers of this volume will be able to recall a journalistic coup of over twenty-one years ago? Further, the interview appeared in the issue of October 28th, 1908 (this information is however withheld), but the first reference to it, page 325, is in a letter of September 25th, 1909. Surely there is an unnecessary hiatus here? Seeing that the unfortunate Bulow was forced to accept responsibility, and felt compelled to tender his resignation on that account, something might reasonably be given us of his feelings at the time? The book would have been immensely improved if Mr. Whyte had not so modestly effaced himself but had boldly stepped forth as the reader's guide, philosopher and friend.

WOMEN—AS SEEN BY A MAN.*

Carefully working over background and foreground, the great American artist has portrayed, with an infinitude of detail, fifteen women. The book costs more than the usual novel, probably because it contains between five and six hundred pages—about 200,000 words. Nor can the reader afford to skip any, for they are not descriptive but cognate, and to get the picture Mr. Dreiser would convey we must observe every stroke of his brush.

Of these studies the most impressive is that of Rella, the young girl not yet out of her teens, who falls in love with her uncle by marriage, an uncle who is thirty and bored by what life has given him. The vivid freshness of the instinctive girl, the darkly craving mood of the man are sharply contrasted, and the end is a damping down of fires—as it would be. "What is man that thou art mindful of him?" cries the author. "He cometh up as a flower and is cut down. He fleeth as a shadow and continueth not." This quotation is the key to the gallery. By far the majority of the women suffer from inhibitions that prevent fulfilment and any sort of human success. "For the most part how bored and weary and lonesome I am. God, how bored." And again, "She craved deeply someone whom she could permanently respect as well as love. Yet is there such a one for any? Or such a state for any two?" We are in fact presented in this book with a philosophy of defeat, which may spring from the author's experience of life, but which is one to which humanity as a whole does not subscribe. It is certainly true that everyday life cannot be carried on at fever-heat, and that we cannot hope to fill our little vessels with the great emotions of life; but happiness does not lie in them. It is to be found in simple instinctive unions, parenthood, and in a growing together, forbearingly, of couples, during the years. Also for many there is "the wind on the heath, brother."

A story to be deeply impressive must be the sum of experience, but the portraits in this gallery appear to spring from meditation on observed fact. Can a man draw women from the inside? He is a different creature. He looks on, collects evidence in support of theory and when he thinks he has sufficient utters aloud his conclusions. Other men give heed. They say, "What has he discovered about the baffling creatures?" The women also listen. "So, he has observed that, has he? Clever fellow to have seen so much." They do not wonder that he has not seen more, because that no man does.

The value of the book, so roughly but effectively written, lies in the glimpses it gives of Mr. Dreiser's mind. I pause however to protest against sentences such as the following. "They were semi-philosophic, semi-erotic, and in certain ways highly romantic discourses on love and beauty and the deeper or esoteric meaning of passion and character, yet relating specifically to at the same time that they attempted to elucidate the various shades or moods of this great emotional tie which had sprung up between Esther and himself, their respective spiritual or poetic attitudes toward beauty and the mental or psychic call that had drawn them together." Careless craftsmanship such as the above are forgotten, however, in the interest evoked by what the writer has seen and the conclusions he draws therefrom. "A rag-bag mind," he says, or "a crusader" and the lay figure comes to life. "Apparently each of us," is his profound observation, "certainly the most of us as Nietzsche points out, seems to draw a certain kind of success or disaster, about as plants draw a certain kind of insect or a given type of tree the lightning. We have, or are, a fate in ourselves." Again—" he illustrated to me the casual and accidental character of so many things in nature—the fact that fortune, strength, ease, beauty, fame, any power of mind or body, come in the main to the individual as gifts and are so often not even added to nor developed by any effort of his."

These portraits are surface studies, but the thoughtful, observant mind of the painter is a deeper matter and, on account of that large view, the book is worthy of attention. One last quotation and I have done. The speaker has been given a prediction which has come true. "If," he says, "a thing that has not yet come definitely to form in the mind of anyone, its exact details, say, could be predicted weeks and, as I came later to see, months in advance, then what was this thing that we called life? Certainly not any haphazard process that each day and each hour and each fresh moment reformed itself, water or cloud-wise, and sans rhyme or reason, out of all sorts of chemicals and elements. Most certainly not! But rather the momentary and progressive display here before our passing gaze of some elsewhere woven pattern this long time in the making, and now draped over the revolving surface of this wheel, our earth."

Oh, yes, a worth while book.

CALM WEATHER.*

Since the popularity of the essay revived, some of our ablest essayists have been annexed to the machinery of the popular press and braced to turn out weekly essays that shall be brisk and light, to tickle the palate of the general reader, and that, to fit into an allotted space, shall be always of exactly the same length; very much as a baker may turn out buns or an artist in delicatessen sausages all of a nicely uniform size and weight. Many of the essays produced so regularly, under such mechanical conditions, have grace of style and spontaneity and are among the most delightful things of the kind in contemporary literature; but when they are collected in a volume that uniformity of length tends to produce an effect of monotony; moreover, it becomes apparent that although the essayist may bravely harness his mood on the right day of every week it does not always run with the same joyous impulse, but at times plods as if automatically, because it must and not because it will.

It is evident that Mr. Gilbert Thomas is not a manufacturing essayist; he does not, you would say, write essays each half a yard in length to suit the requirements of the market, but writes them only when the spirit moves him and lets them grow naturally, so that they are long or short according to the extent of his theme and how much he has to say upon it. He chooses his road and goes along it at his own leisurely pace, digressing now and then into pleasant by-ways; for he is not tied to space and has time for thought. He has a broad-minded, gracious philosophy of life and does not need to go far from home and his everyday interests in search of happiness. Such a personal note, so much of self-revelation and autobiography are in several of the essays that you feel when you come to the end of the book that you know its author as intimately as if you were one of his friends. He confesses that in earlier days, from a hatred of fuss and bustle and lack of pushfulness, he has rejected or missed divers opportunities, yet he remains unrepentant, having lost nothing that he regrets. There are passages of reflective and descriptive beauty in the essays on "Constable's Country," "A Corner of Essex," "When Spring Comes to England"; glimpses of old London in "Sweet Lavender," a characteristic plea for the leisurely manner of life that is passing away in "Cross-Country Journeys," provocative discussion of present-day habits and practices in "On Reading the Newspaper" and "The Wagon and Horse"; a whimsically serious homily on being too prosperous in "When Life is Barest." All these are leavened with personal recollections, and of personal recollections all compact are "The Square," "Sundays Long Ago," "A Schoolboy in London," "Books for Review," "On Whispers," "Memories" and "More Memories."

"Calm Weather" admirably defines the prevailing tone and atmosphere of these essays. They have a quiet, shrewd humour, and when they take a shot at folly as it flies the arrow is never poisoned. Their sketches of places, their little character studies are imaginatively realised and alive; their musings on men and things are rich in the wisdom of experience. It is a friendly, companionable book that I have read with complete enjoyment.

"DOGGE STEENIE."*

The handsome, dashing, imperious Buckingham, so prominent in the reigns of the first two Stuart monarchs in England, and clearly visualised from youth's memory of "The Fortunes of Nigel," certainly is one of the most remarkable and romantic figures of the seventeenth century. His meteoric flight to kingly favour; his easy strides over such formidable obstacles as Carr and Bacon; his reckless ambition, and disastrous failures in the Spanish match and La Rochelle undertakings—all are crowded into the narrow limit of fourteen years.

From the outset destiny seems to have singled out this impetuous Adonis as a hero of unrivalled triumph. With practically no effort of his own he took fortune's ladder at a bound and, what is more rare, once in that exalted position, he remained on the top rung until his tragic premature end at the hands of the fanatic, Felton.

Like that unfortunate tool, Monmouth, young Villiers was thrust into prominence by a Court party so as to bring about the downfall of a favourite in supreme power at the moment. With the difference however that Monmouth's success was usually short-lived, whereas Buckingham, scorning to act as cat's paw, promptly outwitted all the speculative schemes of others striving after their own advancement.

Sir Thomas Lake had a prominent hand in the experimental shoulder-up. The shabby clothes of the youthful protégé were discarded for peacock plumage, and the good-natured James, as had been expected, immediately fell into the snare. Villiers's handsome face and figure, his courtly bearing, ready wit and magnetic charm of manner, caught the king's fancy in an instant. Indeed this irresistible personality, it would seem, finds an echoing response even after the lapse of nearly three centuries, for the Duke's biographer has handled him with almost loving leniency. Not for a moment that George Villiers needed a liberal coat of whitewash, for some features of a gentleman's code of honour in the seventeenth century were more than questionable, and to judge the favourite by modern standards would be distinctly unfair. He was far too straightforward in his dealings, never stooping to mean, underhand actions, to be dubbed a villain. And though as a rule the hero of a monograph naturally becomes in a measure idealised, the author here has not erred on the side of partiality, but has balanced good and bad qualities with accuracy.

* "The Romance of George Villiers, First Duke of Buckingham." By Philip Gibbs. 12s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

That master-hand at character reading, Lord Clarendon, treated Buckingham in much the same fashion, and he was a judge who invariably showed shrewd sense and rare discernment in his summing up.

The name of Sir Philip Gibbs is sufficient guarantee against that somewhat prevalent class of historical compilation that consists mainly of a patchwork of somebody else's arduous research; for references and foot-note authorities handled skilfully can easily reflect glory upon the double-shuffler, leaving the discoverer of hitherto unused documents out in the cold.

"The Romance of George Villiers"* has nothing in common with that questionable type of work. It is a careful and very readable character-study, handled with vigour that stamps the story with realism. It is a faithful picture of the times, and the luxurious surroundings of "Dogge Steenie," with His Grace in the foreground, "manacled, fettered and imprisoned in jewels," as a contemporary writer saw him, conjures up the Jacobean pageantry so graphically described by Scott, Dumas and G. P. R. James.

Looking at Buckingham's somewhat Mephistophelian cast of countenance, as recorded by Honthorst (frontispiece), it is difficult to believe that his career, so crowded with incident and action, was ended at the early age of thirty-six. One must refer to previous portraits to grasp and fully understand that his immediate success at court was mainly owing to his good looks. Robert Carr, his predecessor in James's favour, was not unlike George Villiers in his early twenties. The former's calm face in the National Portrait Gallery and seen in the book, recalls a Welbeck miniature by the same hand of Villiers, taken no doubt before the moody expression of his later days had overshadowed the reflection of a happier mind. For choice, in place of the Villiers family group—viz. the Duke and Duchess, their daughter and infant son—one would perhaps have preferred a reproduction of Honthorst's members of the Villiers circle at Hampton Court, as for more reasons than one it is of greater interest.

This painting includes, in addition to the above, Buckingham's mother, sister and his two elder brothers; with a portrait in the background of his father, Sir George Villiers, whose spectre gave warning of his son's untimely end.

Another illustration of curious interest which might have been included is tha. grimly sad painting by Van Dyck at Castle Ashby—the Duke lying dead after his assassination. This picture, and the group just mentioned, were painted within a few months of one another.

The limning given in the book of Sir Philip's "Essex Woman" is far from convincing, as are most line engravings, for faithful delineation. Far more lifelike is Oliver's rendering of the wily Howard Countess which figures in the Royal Collection at Windsor. Though of maturer age (and less attractive admittedly) than the print, her face here tallies well with the sinister stories of her time.

In conclusion a brief summary of Buckingham's romantic career may be given in the author's own words at the end of the biography:

"The greatest adventurer among adventurers, a gambler losing every move in the game of world-politics, yet winning everything at home with all the court cards in his hands, defying all private and public enemies, and rising from nothingness to supreme power in the kingdom."—"One is able to see him more intimately in his private life, to see him closely as a lover, as a husband, as a father, and as a friend."—"His letters reveal him with most vivid, intimate touches, so that he breathes out of them, and in the whole range of English letters there are not more touching nor more sweet womanly letters than those written by Duchess Kate to her beloved lord."

A few genealogical foot-notes serving to identify some of the dramatis personæ would have been welcome, and though perhaps it may savour of hypercriticism, a four-page index is scarcely adequate for a work worthy of serious study. Not so much as regards explanatory matter as an extenuation of the names of persons and places. Such items as "Ghost-story" and "Remonstrance of the Commons" might well have been omitted.

STAGE AND SHELF.*

One of the pitfalls of success is the temptation to distort the vehicle of such success into some other form—not always happily. This fate has overtaken "Jew Süss." Not that Mr. Ashley Dukes has failed; his adaptation at the Duke of York's is quick-moving, interesting, spectacular; no student of the book (least of all Mr. Dukes himself) can reasonably have expected more, since a mere three hours' traffic was almost bound to miss those qualities that made the novel great—the infinite, loving detail, the subtle sense of irony, and above all the vein of mysticism which gives the original its unforgettable tang. More strange are the play's shortcomings in other respects: faults of miscasting and production, I think, since they are not apparent in Mr. Dukes's text. There is a curious flatness over it all, a lack of conviction; one contrast clear enough even in the acting version—that between Weissensee, the smooth politician, and the bluff, stupid Remchingen—is completely missed; what a flame is old Rabbi Gabriel in the book, and how ordinary here! But all are ordinary, all faintly theatrical, all rather "character-costume" parts than human beings. Mr. Matheson Lang must be excepted, however, if only for the passage of his grief over Naemi, which is the finest and sincerest thing in the play.

Another transformation, though in the opposite direction, is the novelising of "Outward Bound," by Mr. Sutton Vane. Here again was a property so lucrative that one can understand the author's impulse to extend it from stage to shelf, even though one cannot feel that he has improved it. The play was compact where the book proves garrulous; it hinted just enough of what had passed before curtain-rise, whereas the book narrates those events in full without adding to their significance. Again, the play's dialogue was terse and suggestive; it was of such a kind as stimulates acting, giving "something to bite on," as actors say; but since the actors' work has been recreated in print, it is somehow less convincing. I infer Mr. Vane to have the dramatist's rather than the narrator's temperament.

Or perhaps this is not a question of temperament, but of a theme's inherent suitability for one form or the other? It is significant that our big dramatists seem shy of duplicating their themes. Mr. Galsworthy neither dramatises his novels nor novelises his plays; and on the one occasion when Mr. Shaw did so (in "Cashel Byron's Profession") the result was to all intents a fresh creation. There was a welcome revival of Shaw's "Captain Brassbound," by the way, at the Everyman recently. This early play is curiously uneven; in its first half are passages which sound like a cheap imitation of the Shaw we have come to honour; not till the trial scene—perhaps not till the final duologue—is the author at anything like his provocative best. Mr. Malcolm Morley's handling of the play, and his own rendering of Brassbound, were consistently good. I hope he will not cease reviving these Shavian yesterdays; the Everyman is just the theatre for them, being small enough to let them be taken fast, and without danger of that over-emphasis with which the Shavian lily is sometimes so disastrously gilded. Shaw is no " actor's " dramatist; he demands team-work and intelligence, rather than mummers' tricks; which is no doubt why, at the Everyman, one nearly always finds him competently done.

Shaw's fellow-countryman, Sean O'Casey, has had a qualified success at the Apollo with " The Silver Tassie " : a piece worth seeing—all Mr. O'Casey's are—but like the rest of them, disjointed and full of loose ends. For instance, Susie in Act I is said to be in love with Harry; nothing is made of it—it is not even mentioned again. Note, also, Susie's volte-face of character—neither foreshadowed in the first act nor remarked on later. Or the two elder men's appearance in the hospital ward—war casualties presumably: but we are never enlightened. Or, again, that uproarious bit of fooling with the telephone; like a turn in a music-hall, not linked to anything that precedes or follows. I suppose Mr. O'Casey may reply that he is a realist, and that real life is a tangle of such loose ends; and indeed, in his hands, they do not seem to spoil the flow of the play. A much more dangerous fault was the unlikeability of his protagonist in the first act. One felt that if somebody had got to be maimed . . . But here, too, I incur the flat retort, that the play's theme precisely is the tragedy of a character who is at once " unsympathetic " and pitiful. I give it up. Mr. O'Casey seems to me to flout all the rules; yet I enjoy him hugely.

And lastly, Mr. Wallace: what does he in this galley? I must include his play at Wyndham's, " The Calendar," as a faultless example of the slick, well-made piece. Writers who have a message—something worth while to say—are entitled to put that something first, and then to build a play on it with such technique as they can devise or assimilate. Mr. Wallace, having nothing in particular to say and no aim except entertainment (I am not trying to belittle him: sheer entertainment is and always will be a desirable aim), Mr. Wallace is forced to take care that his technique is first rate. And does so. " The Ringer " was good theatre; this is still better. Here are no loose ends—not even the convict-butler's " indeliable " pencil. This is a master-craftsman's piece, which would have warmed the heart of the late William Archer. It should be seen by all aspiring playmakers; for as an exposition of stage-technique it is probably unsurpassed.

Most good plays get published nowadays; and I suppose it is a heartening sign of the theatre's welfare that some of the best are being so well patronised as to be inaccessible to the casual critic—though this somewhat hampers the critic's function. I still find a permanent " House Full " at " Journey's End " and " The First Mrs. Fraser " for instance; but I have by me an edition of Mr. Ervine's play which is good reading. " The First Mrs. Fraser " is light comedy; a shade too light—or rather, too facetious—in its opening passages; but Mr. Ervine knows his London theatres well enough (as he hints broadly in this very play) to allow ten or fifteen minutes' grace for the inevitable late-comers, and the small blemish disappears as he gets down to business. It is odd, by the way, to find in two plays so extremely unlike as this and " The Calendar " a common idea: yet so there is—the central theme of Mr. Wallace's piece, so far as it has a theme, and also pretty prominent in Mr. Ervine's: namely the query why a woman who is playing the cad should feel aggrieved because her male antagonist will not continue to deport himself as a " perfect gentleman." This query was worth making in the theatre and much overdue there; long-suffering man should offer the two dramatists his joint congratulations.

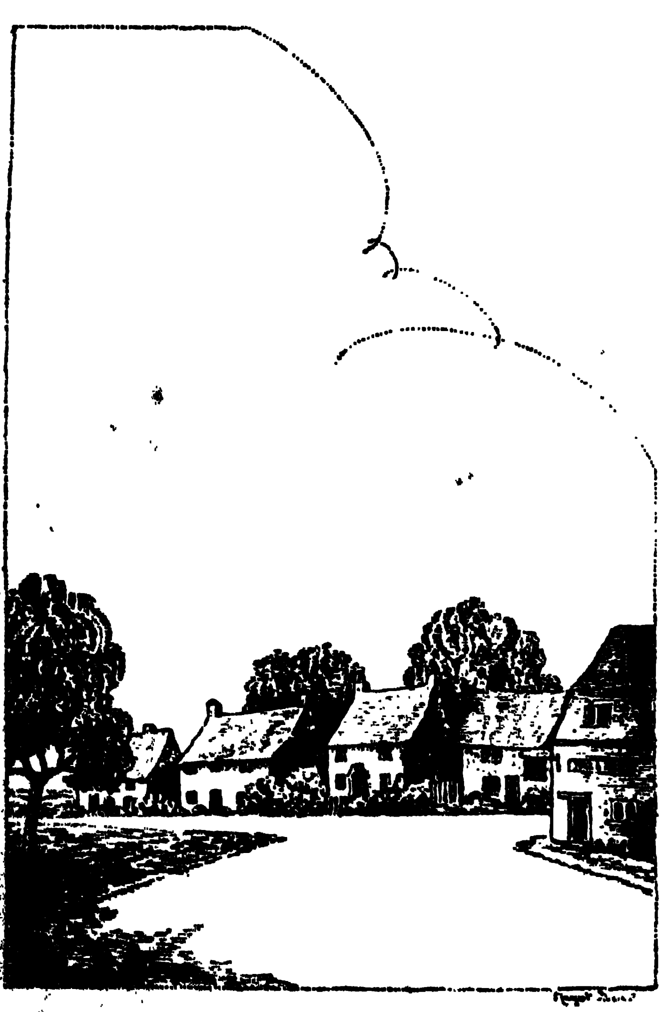
The conflict of older and younger generations, which is a part of Mr. Ervine's plot, is the main theme of Mr. Van Druten's " After All," and in a lesser degree of Mr. Phillpotts's " Buy a Broom." Mr. Phillpotts tells a somewhat artless story, set in the pleasantly original surroundings of a gipsy camp; his folk ring true, even when they are fantastic, and he has drawn two very lifelike and amusing children. " After All " is sterner stuff—more like Mr. Ervine's type of story, though on an intenser plane. It is in fact a modern version of the old " repertory " theme: that quietly bitter strife of parents and their children, which is perhaps still the most generally interesting of all subjects for a play. Mr. Van Druten uses less wit and more humour than Mr. Ervine; in print at any rate I find his piece the best of the three. GRAHAM SUTTON.

Viscount Melbourne.

From a painting by John Partridge in the National Portrait Gallery.

From "Lord Melbourne," by Bertram Newman (Macmillan).

THE CYNICAL PREMIER.*



Mr. Bertram Newman has widespread taste in his biographical researches. For there are wide gaps between the human natures of Cardinal Newman and Edmund Burke (both of whom he has already handled in earlier volumes) and the subject of the present book. It would be difficult to imagine two men more unlike than the sentimental Burke, full of theories and enthusiasms, and the cynical Melbourne—who seemed, on the surface at least, to have neither a guiding principle, either moral or constitutional, nor any emotional social outlook of any kind whatsoever. Yet even Burke and Melbourne had one thing in common: they both adored a Queen! But in how different a manner. And both the saintly Newman and the very sceptical

* " Lord Melbourne." By Bertram Newman. 12s. 6d. (Macmillan.)

Melbourne had a common taste for wandering along the vague meandering bypaths of theological controversy. But again, how different were the two wanderers. One fancies that the Cardinal would have described the Premier's theology in the dogmatic terms of heresy.

Mr. Bertram Newman has given us a very charming and a very useful volume. It is of a far higher standard than the more frivolous productions of those authors who are so set on the production of smart epigrams that they seem to forget that a biography is not merely an essay in style. Mr. Newman has plenty of style; and he manages with unaffected ease to say serious historical truths in the sparkling manner which holds the attention and remains in the memory. But he has all the time a sense of the courtesy that is due to the stately Muse of history: he does not drag her to the more trivial realms of burlesque. Lord Melbourne might so easily, with all his affectations and social surroundings, have been turned into the gaudy hero of a musical comedy. Mr. Newman, with rigid respect, has kept to the strict truth, and given us the portrait of a very polished gentleman, who concealed beneath that cynical surface a mind that very nearly reached the highest realms of philosophy.

This author modestly denies in his preface that he has paid chief attention to the political side of his hero. But one ventures to discover a great deal of most illuminating political history closely and artistically bound up with the biographical facts. It is a period that easily lends itself to the trivial chatter of the smart governing class set; and Mr. Newman is right when he gives us a due proportion of this glittering display. Lord Melbourne's sparkling mother, and his highly strung wife, Lady Caroline, were very typical of their day, and are a very legitimate part of the background. They, more immediately, were all-important factors in the life of Melbourne. Without such a mother and such a wife, the story of Melbourne would have been a very different affair. It is more than a possibility that the unruly behaviour of Lady Caroline was a most considerable factor in her husband's firm conviction that human beings—on the whole—must be given their heads, to go their own way, however stupid and self-destructive. That was why he was so firmly sceptical whether the reforms, for which so many other men were ready to lay down their lives and sell their souls, were worth the parchment and parliamentary paper on which they were inscribed.

". . . where Bunyan buffeted three Quakers."

From "Joyous Pilgrimage" by R. Francis Foster (Elkin Mathews & Marrot).

Yet beneath this cynical surface, as Mr. Newman has rightly shown, was a mind of high social purity. No party success or lazy indifference would move Melbourne one inch from the path which he thought was just and honourable. Of course (as again Mr. Newman more than once insists) he was not a modern thinker, equipped with all the latest social theories and packed with the statistics of the present schools of political economy. This author very wisely considers his subject as an intimate part of the Regency and Early Victorian age, and he does not theorise and sentimentalise from the viewpoint of to-day. He does not waste paper and ink in wondering why Lord Melbourne did not do what Mr. Ramsay MacDonald might do and think a hundred years later.

Mr. Newman, being a fine artist, prefers to place his subject matter before himself—by no means an inevitable virtue in modern biography! So he gives us a plentiful number of very helpful quotations from Melbourne himself and his contemporaries. This is the wisest and most respectful manner of biography; it is only the inferior middle men who like to repeat a story in their own words. Mr. Newman must have many temptations to talk himself, for he often puts a whole character, or even a period of history, into a line or two of terse words. His intellectual thought and literary craftsmanship have combined in the production of a biography that is delightful reading, for it is a tragical story and romance, and yet with scientific history as its firm basis.

Since Mr. Newman is so conscientious in giving us all the necessary facts, it is hardly necessary to dispute some of his conclusions. For he so fairly allows us to judge for ourselves. But there are one or two suggestions that are a little alarming. For example, he appears to believe that Canning was a great statesman, and that he was Melbourne's master in statesmanship. He writes that Canning "conquered all obstacles by sheer brain power." One would have thought that a moment's study of the facts would have convinced so intelligent a writer as Mr. Newman that Canning's chief characteristic was trivial intrigue and flashy rhetoric. Again Mr. Newman apparently fails to see that Peel (here resembling Canning) was successful mainly because he represented the worst side of the money-grubbing heartless plutocracy of his day. On the low plane of efficiency in administration and parliamentary handling Peel may be a representative figure. But he cannot be an ideal for any but the worshippers of an age which built the Crystal Palace. One is sure that it is only by an oversight that Mr. Newman sometimes gives the impression of imagining that Mr. Huskisson and his Free Trade fancies were on the line of true reform. This author is too thoughtful to be misled by any such conventional ideas of pedantic orthodoxy.

GOOD ENTERTAINMENT.*

If the title proper of this little book promises blithesomeness and mirth, linked with good comradeship, the sub-title prepares us at the same time for something rather less jovial. And certainly a little such preparation is not out of the way for the amazing sequence of incidents and predicaments which confronted and befell the writer and his companion Longshanks in the accomplishment of their self-appointed task of girdling London. If the curious phraseology of the book strikes one at first as a trifle laboured, that impression quickly dies away and one is caught irresistibly in the spell of its quaint and symbolic imagery. As pilgrims of old they started forth, leaving their last fivepence ha'penny with the Father Guardian at Chilworth Friary on behalf of the needy poor, and with only one great-coat between them, which they shared in inclement weather (true Longshanks possessed a top-hat at one stage of the journey, but of its ignoble uses we will leave the book itself to relate) they took the road in the approved spirit of preparedness for what might be in store.

* "Joyous Pilgrimage. Being the Chronicle of a Strange Journey." By R. Francis Foster. 7s. 6d. (Elkin Mathews & Marrot.)

The writer with a commendable humility lays all the laurels on Longshanks's head. It was the eloquence of the latter which carried them round many a tight corner, in fact on one occasion so inspired did it become that it was only brought to an end by the familiar "Time, gentlemen. please !" of the landlord. It was Longshanks's philosophy too, which declared that "a man cast bread upon the waters that it may return to him buttered." He also maintained that "the millionaire is an unconscious participator with the saint in the doctrine that to give is to recoup oneself a hundredfold." Sweet indeed are the uses of adversity which bring such delectable recompense as the picture of Longshanks quarrelling with a sweep to whom he offered a first lesson in Latin in return for a ride in his cart, only to be answered by a flourish of the broom in his face, and again the same buoyant individual imprisoned in the village stocks after satisfying a natural curiosity. There were many occasions we would prefer to read about than share, and dilemmas no less fantastically conceived than expressed, in fact this pair of vagabonds seemed to act as magnets for any knavery that happened to be afoot and they dealt with all and sundry in the most spirited manner imaginable. Of the free eats and drinks too that were manœuvred and the conversations that were their natural accompaniment, this mere hint will have to serve. Suffice it to say that Longshanks's wit and ingenuity, combined with the author's racy and whimsical interlarding of history (with a difference) provide most refreshing entertainment, so quaintly are they blended with the mediæval atmosphere which casts a glamour over the familiar scenes.

HAMMERSMITH HOY.

What a delightful title !* And what a neat label for the Lyric, Hammersmith ! It is a major achievement of Sir Thomas's that when I think of Beecham I think of bills and not pills, and of Sir Nigel's that when I think of Hammersmith, I think of the fortunes of Nigel, and not of the sordidness of the Broadway and the sad magnificence of the Thames.

* "Hammersmith Hoy." By Nigel Playfair. 21s. (Faber & Faber.)

The Lyric floats in other waters, though the earthly end of its gang-plank is in a Hammersmith slum, and the airs which fill its delicate sails are from another century—the eighteenth. It is a hoy, no doubt, as Playfair defines that happy vehicle, quoting, I trust, though I am not learned enough to vouch for it, from Doctor Johnson's dictionary: "A hoy," he says, "is a small sailing ship capable of carrying a modest freight for a short distance."

Sir Nigel Playfair.
From a drawing by H. A. Perry.

Prettily put ! Though, unless we are to judge the works of art by crude mass and volume, the modesty must be referred altogether to the skipper of the hoy. And as for short distances—well, "The Beggar's Opera" ran for 1,463 performances, and only "Chu Chin Chow" (2,238) and "Charley's Aunt" (1,466) ran for more. Yet Playfair rightly regards his venture as tiny. It is an exquisite miniature: a miniature; as Playfair says himself, of what a National Theatre—that is to say, the National Theatre—might be and do.

The bigger half of the book—178 pages out of 301—is pre-Hammersmith. If there were no Lyric dénouement those 178 pages would make a delightful autobiography, especially for a reader like me who is almost as much a Victorian as Playfair is.

For, make no mistake about it, Nigel Playfair is the Compleat Victorian. He is as Victorian as Punch, and Gilbert, and antimacassars, and croquet, and Mr. Gladstone, and "Alice in Wonderland," and the middle-classes, and comfort, and Old Brown Sherry. I always guessed as much from his looks and his works, and now I know.

I mean this review to be mainly about the man-of-the-theatre, and so I shall skip the sedately whimsical story of his boyhood, and discover him at Oxford, diligently doing nothing except preparing to be an actor. (He was marked for the Bar.) He says that he never attended any lectures, but got through the Honours School of Modern History by cramming Little Arthur's History of England and the article on Napoleon in the Encyclopædia Britannica. For him Oxford meant the O.U.D.S., not until later called the "Owds," a pronunciation to which Playfair succumbs "with considerable distaste." One of his fellow players was "Ponsonby, now Under-Secretary. He was certainly very funny as Launce."

Some of his happiest days at Oxford were spent in the preparation and performance in Worcester College Gardens of a version made by him of "Alice in Wonderland" and "Through the Looking Glass." But more important, in the shaping of Playfair, is it that he fell under the influence of Max Beerbohm—the writer; the man he knew but slightly then. There is a family likeness between these two, with their elegant precision and outrageously logical whimsicality

The only interesting thing about his career at the Bar is that he spent a year in the chambers of Alfred Lyttelton with an Oxford friend of his, Plum Warner. As at Oxford, he thought of nothing but the stage, and he became a well-known acting member of such famous amateur companies as the Old Stagers and the Windsor Strollers.

This is important. Good amateur acting has something which in general professional acting lacks. But Playfair never lost that something, and for all the finished technique of the Lyric, Hammersmith, you find that something there.

Arthur Bourchier, who had been a great man with the Strollers and the Old Stagers, had much to do with Playfair's final leap on to the stage. While he was yet moaning at the Bar, he staged a play of Nigel's and Philip Carr's: "Shock-headed Peter"; and gave Playfair his first job, an engagement of forty weeks. Asked what salary he wanted, Playfair suggested £5 a week. Bourchier replied: "It's curious, Nigel, that you should have said that. Because it's exactly what I think you're worth to me. . . . But I shan't give it you. I feel that you are the sort of man who will one day drive the coach, and the sooner you learn the value of economy the better. You shall have four." That is the only one of the many excellent stage stories in the book which I shall tell you: this is a review, not the sack of the city.

The two significant facts about his pre-war stage career are that he played in Philip Carr's Elizabethan and Restoration revivals, and that he was on the original committee of the Stage Society. The original membership of the Stage Society was a queer mixture of Fabian intellectuals, long-haired æsthetes, and persons interested in the drama. Often the mixture was in one person; but Playfair was for the drama neat.

And then, just after the Armistice, Playfair assumed the management of the Lyric. The story of how he did it is exciting and romantic, and does credit to Arnold Bennett's heart and Sir Nigel's head. They got the Lyric for a song—and then sang it. I am not going to tell you about that, and how, with the luck of all good captains, Playfair got the help of Lovat Fraser, Frederic Austin, Frederick Ranalow, and the rest. You must read it for yourself. There is nothing in English stage history more miraculous than the way they made eighteenth century ballad-opera and prose comedy the London fashion in a suburban house which the great Mulholland wouldn't touch at £500 a year.

Yet I am more interested at the moment in trying to find out why Playfair was just the man for the job. It takes this book to tell me, and I can't put it into a few words. Here is a hint: His neatness of mind, his precision, his primness, is all a cosy and comic mask for Puck. And Puck wanted to play pranks with the drama. So far as modern England was concerned, eighteenth century drama was fresh material which he could do what he liked with. There was much in that period that appealed to him: He liked the elegant formality of its manners, he liked to be sedately shocked by its elegant indelicacies. But I think the main thing was that eighteenth century plays were comparatively unspoilt by modern stage-directions. And so he staged "The Beggar's Opera," and played his tricks. Quite right, too! Every fresh production of a play is a new creation. Colley Cibber, Barry Jackson and those other fellows go too far, but the devout Shakespearean gets nowhere.

THREE POETS, OFFERING OUT OF THREE AGES.*

Soon after 500 B.C., on an island one quarter the size of the Isle of Wight, Bacchylides was writing odes in celebration of the victories of his fellow-islanders and others—odes which, in A.D. 1929, Dr. A. S. Way translates into English. These odes will not find a very large audience waiting for them; the sap has gone out of them for us; though we too celebrate in our public prints the national heroes of games. Our Olympia goes by the name of Wimbledon, which Bacchylides might have found cacophonous. His little island, Ceos, sent Lachon to Olympia to run in the Boys' Footrace in 452 B.C. When Lachon came back, Bacchylides had a welcome ready for him, verses to be sung in his honour, and ending (in Dr. Way's translation) in this fashion:

> "And now by the Song-queen's grace—
> Yea, of her with whose voice heaven rings—
> O thou whose feet in Olympia's race
> Were like to the wild wind's wings,
> A song for the victory won
> By thee, Aristomene's son,
> Is the honour-meed of the triumphing speed
> That to Keos new glory brings."

Dr. Way likens Bacchylides to Longfellow in power of genius. I should say that the attribution is hardly justified by this book of translations. Scholars may quarrel over him, but the rest of us will coolly let him drop. He is so remote that he seems to have nothing whatever to say to us; his gods, his circumstances and his ceremonies have no bearing upon ours.

With Mr. Andrew's modernised version of "Sir Gawain and the Green Knight," a poem written in the fourteenth century, we feel on far more familiar ground. This is natural, for, though Sir Gawain is an old invention, he is ours; his story was written for people in this island, written to appeal to the romantic and moral-minded man which an Englishman still is. We have always loved magic and a rich display; we have always been hero worshippers, humane and humorous, idolising strength of sinew and purpose, and asking for happy endings and poetic justice. English tragedy is our kind of drama, invented by our optimism. Cheerfulness keeps breaking in. All this could be exemplified from "Sir Gawain," which is an excellent story, also, and so modern (mystery, courage, sex-interest, the triumph of virtue) that I would seriously recommend it for the basis of a film play. The Germans could do it enchantingly.

The poem has long been known as a masterpiece, but in its original form it could only be familiar to students, because of its difficult vocabulary. It is written in the alliterative verse which was the forerunner of rhyme (but upon a basis more metrical than Piers Plowman) and is divided into stanzas, the last four lines of which are rhymed. Mr. Andrew has skilfully kept all these features in his modern version. His version is easy enough for anyone to read with pleasure, though it still preserves the charm and quaintness of its original. There can be no doubt at all about the artistic greatness of the poem. Its natural descriptions are wonderfully terse and vivid, and are, of course, almost unique. The mediæval poets nearly always kept to the lively friendliness of spring and summer in their descriptions of nature; they were afraid of the unknown, and did not generally express, if they saw, the beauty of the bareness of winter and rough weather. This poet does not shrink from it. I heartily recommend this modern version of the Green Knight to all who love fine poetry and rich and coloured adventure.

The poet of the Green Knight is unknown, only his work survives. Two centuries later the credit of being a poet was every courtier's ambition, and then arose that tradition for perfect, finely polished verse for which the Elizabethan age is famous. If I may borrow an expression from Professor Grierson, the writing of poetry was, to most of Sir Walter Ralegh's contemporaries, a display of virtuosity. Love was their theme, but artistic ambition was their urge to write. When the Elizabethan did use poetry for an outlet for his personal philosophy, he proved himself to be infected with the dark disillusion and unhappiness that touched all thinking men at the Renaissance.

Ralegh had the reputation of a great court poet, but he seems to have been afflicted with sincerity, and most of his poetry was never printed, and has long ago disappeared. Perhaps he himself destroyed it. So here we have the very contrary of the Green Knight—the poet surviving in name and fame, and most of the work irretrievably lost. For Ralegh's reputation was enormous, yet this, the definitive edition, representing years of patient searching, contains no more than thirty-four poems that can be ascribed to him with any certainty, and only one of which it can be said, "Here is the text as Ralegh left it." That one, the last book of the Ocean to Cynthia, is a long poem printed from Ralegh's own handwriting; but it is obviously an unfinished draft, and to be made at all comprehensible, needs very careful editing and repunctuation. Small as it is, this collection shows Ralegh's reputation to have been well founded. His best is very high among English lyrics, direct, pitifully beautiful, sensitively responding to life while sadly resenting the tragedy of age and decay and death. Ralegh was a man of brilliant powers condemned to waste his powers on the catching and keeping of captious court favour. He felt his genius going to waste, and the years of his life (never very certain) fast running away to no purpose. The well-known epitaph was, it appears, simply the last verse of a love poem in the usual extravagant Elizabethan mode. He began with artificiality, and ended with this:

* "The Odes of Bacchylides in English Verse." By Arthur S. Way. 10s. 6d. (Macmillan.)—"Sir Gawain and the Green Knight." A Modern Version. By S. O. Andrew. 4s. (Dent.)—"The Poems of Sir Walter Ralegh." Edited by A. M. C. Latham. 10s. (Constable.)

> "Even such is Time, that takes in trust
> Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
> And pays us but with age and dust;
> Who in the dark and silent grave,
> When we have wandered all our ways,
> Shuts up the story of our days."

What he added later, when he sent this out from the Tower as his own epitaph, is a significant comment upon the brave and melancholy loneliness endured by the great spirits of those doubting times:

> "But from this earth, this grave, this dust,
> My God shall raise me up, I trust."

All Ralegh and his poems are in the eight lines of this epitaph.

FRANK KENDON.

A GARDEN MISCELLANY.

Until recently, if you had been cataloguing the work of Mr. Coulson Kernahan, you might have described him as a novelist, writer of essays in criticism, author of short stories, or of that strikingly popular series of allegories, which began with "God and the Ant" and were finally gathered into one volume under the title of "Visions." But a year or so ago he started to make a reputation as a writer of nature studies and fantasies with "The Garden of God," which is now in a second edition, and he has just followed this new success with "Begging the Moon's Pardon,"* another book in a somewhat similar kind.

It is a book that you would say has grown spontaneously out of his love of the open air, of flowers and gardens, of dogs and cats—indeed, of all those things of earth and sky that he speaks of in "A Nature-Lover's Note-Book," where he says:

> I find no day common. On the contrary, such compelling and fascinating mystery and marvel do I newly find in each new day that I feel sometimes as if, even in heaven itself –
> O Earth! is Heaven more fair!
> —I could wish nothing better, when I go hence, than, with heaven's new and spiritual vision, to return to old earth. My hope is that, hereafter, I may be permitted to continue in loving comradeship with, and lovingly to study, my fellows, men and women, and my fellow living creatures of every kind, whether on earth, in the water, or in the air, and that I still may have sight of child-faces, fields, flowers, sky and cloud, and the great trees."

These are what he writes of here with a knowledge, intuition, sympathy and brooding thought and fancy of one who has given his heart to such themes. He begins with a whimsical sketch concerning the old superstition which says it is unlucky to have a first sight of the new moon through glass, and follows it with a delightful study of butterflies and "the Buddleia," which "takes its name from a certain Adam Buddle," a botanist of whose identity he admits he has no information. A feather fallen from a smaller sulphur-crested cockatoo furnishes him with a subject for a charming essay on the beauty of this gossamer miracle and the thoughts that rise from the handling of it.

There are essays as charming on a Sussex garden, on trees, on "A Fool and his Flowers," a homily on certain types of human beings, a lively, amusing story of a cat, "Skindles, M.P.", and another sketch in which the characters of the author's own cat and his dog are humorously and faithfully drawn and contrasted. Mr. Kernahan writes always with the insight and sensitive fancy and feeling of a poet; with a quick eye for natural beauty, and a broad human-kindness for everything that makes up the motley life of the world, for all the loveliness that grows and "beneath the moon decays." If you are a nature lover you will read this book with unalloyed pleasure; if you are not, it will help to make you one.

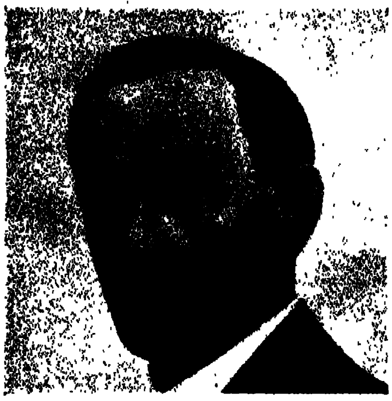
INDIA'S MIGHTY PAST.*

"This book will be of advantage to both Indians and Europeans," says in his foreword the Marquis of Zetland, than whom no one in Great Britain more appreciates the soul of India. It gives a very good idea of the history of the country and its civilisation from the earliest times till the death of Aurangzebe, the great Moghul Emperor, at the beginning of the eighteenth century. The contribution to Indian civilisation of the Aryans and Dravidians, of the Hindus and Mohammedans, of Delhi and the provinces is also made clear. It is from the Dravidians that Indians learnt sculpture, iconography, and the worship of the Goddess that is the Female Energy of the Universe. The Mohammedans—who adopted Indian manners and customs soon after settling down in the country—enriched the Indian arts and sciences. The book is written eloquently and yet without exaggeration. The author admits that Indian civilisation has its blots, like other civilisations ancient and modern.

Certain points are made clear by the author which are often forgotten by the average man. For example, there were empires in ancient India which were as large, if not larger than the British Empire in India to-day. Asoka was master of India from the Punjab to Mysore, as well as of Baluchistan and Afghanistan. Kanishka's empire included not only most of India, all Baluchistan and Afghanistan, but also Yarkand and Khotan. Then again the Hindus made continual progress in all departments of life and knowledge until the Mohammedans came; they then ceased to progress because they adopted self-defence and self-preservation as their ideals. The author contends that there were really no foreign masters of India until the Mohammedans came; because all previous invaders were absorbed by the Hindus. The Mohammedans retained their non-Indian religion, but in most other respects they also were Hinduised.



The ancient Hindu kings were not absolute rulers; they had to take advice of their Council and do reverence to the Brahmins who were their superiors in caste. It has been supposed that Indians did not have any alphabet till the eighth century before Christ, when they borrowed it from the Phœnicians; their culture till then was oral. But this has proved to be incorrect, since on the coins and other articles found at Mohenjodaro and Harappa—which are at least of 3,000 B.C.—there is a good deal of writing. The Indian drama, Mr. Shah contends, is of indigenous origin and not borrowed from the Greeks, as some Western scholars have tried to make out. Its prologue and its mixture of dance and music, which are not to be found in the Greek drama, support the author's contention.

Mr. Shah shows how highly developed was the culture of the ancient Indians from the fact that a gentleman was expected to be proficient in seventy-two arts and a lady in sixty-four arts. He argues that the bell-shaped capitals of the pillars of Asoka's palace at Pataliputra were not an imitation of the Persian capitals of the period, as some Western archæologists believe. They show rather that there was at that time a common Asiatic art stretching from India to Asia Minor. He is not quite correct however when he says that Greek sculpture is not creative but merely imitative. He forgets that the archaic Greek sculpture—that preceding Pheidias—was creative.

* "The Splendour That Was Ind." By K. T. Shah. £2 10s. (Bombay: Taraporevalla. London: Kegan Paul.)

In the chapter on art the author shows how the Mohammedans were influenced by the Hindus. The ceiling and the pillars of the mosque of Qutbuddin, at Delhi, and the mosques at Ahmedabad for example, are Hindu both in construction and decoration. The domes of the Mohammedan buildings in India are also of the Hindu type; they rest on and are surmounted by lotus leaves which the Hindus have employed in their art from time immemorial. The domes of the Indo-Saracenic buildings have also as finials the Hindu kalasha (water-pot), and not the spike as in other parts of the Moslem world.

Mr. Dan Griffiths, whose new book, "Human Nature," has just been published by Messrs. Daniel.

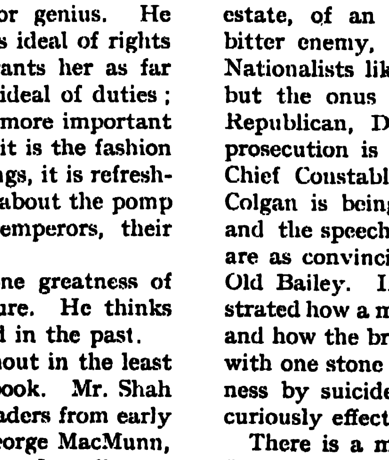
In the chapter on industry and commerce the author shows how centuries before the Christian era Indians knew how to make iron and steel. Also from early times they had commercial relations with other parts of Asia, Europe and Africa. And they carried their goods in their own ships and did not allow the Phœnicians to act as their carriers.

In the chapter on the social system Mr. Shah shows the good side of the caste system. He says that it is elastic and adaptable, and allows the individual within its fold full opportunities to display his talent or genius. He disapproves of the modern Indian woman's ideal of rights (borrowed by her from the West); he wants her as far as possible to stick to her ancient Indian ideal of duties; because he argues that the race should be more important than the individual. In these days, when it is the fashion to run down the pomp and splendour of kings, it is refreshing to find Mr. Shah write enthusiastically about the pomp and splendour of the courts of Indian emperors, their camps, dresses, etc.

The author, though proud of the bygone greatness of his country, is not despondent of its future. He thinks that it will still do things as great as it did in the past.

A few mistakes may be pointed out without in the least wishing to detract from the merits of the book. Mr. Shah says that the Khyber Pass was used by invaders from early times. This however is not true, as Sir George MacMunn, in his book on Afghanistan, has pointed out. It really was not used by any invader before Nadir Shah in the eighteenth century. Then again, Mohammud of Ghazni did not invade India twenty-four times, as the author seems to think, but twelve times. The proof-reading, one regrets to have to point out also, has not been careful enough.

The book has been very well got up, and the half-tone and coloured illustrations add greatly to its beauty. It should be read by every lover of India and by every student of human history. It is popular without being superficial, thorough without being dull.



VASUDEO B. METTA.

ALL CONCERNED WITH CRIME.

Crime and the Great War are filling the fiction market. The field of criminality, once covered by expert detectives of fiction, is now being patrolled by amateur investigators. In some cases the obtuse Watson has taken the place of the alert Holmes. For example, Professor Henry Poggioli, Ph.D., the chief figure of "Clues of the Caribees,"[1] is not over-endowed with intelligence, though esteemed highly as a sleuth-hound. Sometimes he is quite baffled; at others he happens on leading clues by accident. Truth to tell, Mr. T. S. Stribling, the meritorious author of "Birthright," "Red Sand" and "Fombombo," is not altogether happy in his new medium as chronicler of evil doings and uncertain retributions. His professor has an American degree as a psychologist, and he reasons out his cases instead of working on them. The scenes of his operations are the Dutch West Indies, Haiti, Martinique and Port of Spain. The most dramatic story of the collection is "A Passage to Benares," in which Poggioli insists on sleeping in a Hindu temple, with the most unforeseen and unfortunate result.

Forsaking red-haired curates and hidden treasure in the Emerald Isle, George A. Birmingham is dreadfully sinister in "Wild Justice."[2] There is still some humour in his simple cut-and-thrust dialogue, but the thread of his new novel unrolls in the shadow of the rope. It is a story this, not of Irish playboys, but of Celtic assassins—figures walking through blood to merciless revenge. The Mellany murder concerns the killing, on Lord Benton's English estate, of an Irish Republican, Seumas Sweeney. His bitter enemy, the Loyalist O'Callaghan, who hates Irish Nationalists like poison, is the first man to be suspected, but the onus is slowly but surely attached to another Republican, Diarmuid Colgan. The main agent of his prosecution is still another Irish exile, Colonel Devenish, Chief Constable of the county. The chapters in which Colgan is being tried for his life are intensely dramatic, and the speeches of counsel for the Crown and the defence are as convincing as any that have been delivered at the Old Bailey. In the climax of the narrative it is demonstrated how a man is hanged for a murder he did not commit, and how the brain which devised the killing of two enemies with one stone makes a little slip and expiates the carelessness by suicide. In this new medium Canon Hannay is curiously effective.

There is a much greater paraphernalia of terror in Mr. J. Lindsay Hamilton's crime story, "The Gorgon."[3] On the dust-cover we see three puny human beings transfixed with terror at the sight of a threatening giant of the most horrific appearance. The Gorgon is our old friend, the anonymous director of a nefarious organisation which strikes down its victims at his nod. Mr. Hamilton surrounds the evil genius with every attribute of terror, and yet he does not succeed in inspiring the fear that is implicit in Canon Hannay's book. Mr. Hamilton, however, can claim that he veils the identity of his master-crook with considerable skill, although several hints are given, especially in the early part of the story, which can be availed of by alertly wily readers.

Mr. J. Lewis May.
Author of "The Path through the Wood" (Geoffrey Bles).

There is another mysterious unknown in Mr. Selwyn Jepson's "I Met Murder."[4] Here the havoc is wholesale. At a dinner at Eastblyth Manor a shot comes out of the void and whizzes past the head of the host, John Arden. Hamish Page, the vulgar, brutal profiteer, is distinctly uneasy. He has some reason to be, for very shortly thereafter at his new residence, Blyth Towers, he is discovered in his bedroom by the valet who brings his morning tea, with a bullet through his brain. At this juncture Sergeant Grice is joined by George Jupp, the Home Office criminologist. George is a small man about fifty, of that pre-eminently English type which always looks thin and miserable when there is an east wind blowing. His colouring as to hair and eyes is indeterminate, and he has a permanent mildly aggrieved air. While suspicion is gathering about Anita Skinner, news comes of the finding of Lady Codrington's body on the heath by Brooker's Mill. The Rev. Lionel Lake is implicated. All question of Anita's guilt is summarily removed by the finding of her body at the Towers with a small, clean bullet wound in her forehead. The main burden of suspicion then falls on Professor Skinner and his assistant, Blake. Then Skinner is found dead in the Drive. It is at this stage of the book that the reader gets a very violent shock and Mr. Jupp comes into his own as a heaven-born detective.

The operations of a cold-blooded poisoner are always associated with a certain amount of interest. In Mr. Horace Newte's "House Sinister,"[5] Vanda Wincuelin, going as holiday companion to a young girl, Ida Dalmon, is much more favourably impressed by Ida's mother than by her father. Edgar Dalmon was short and thick-set, with curly ginger-coloured hair, with eyes which very curiously appeared to have neither pupils nor whites, and eyelids which appeared to be hooded. He had however a soothing and appealing voice, and had obviously other fascinating qualities, as his wife adored him. On the other hand, his sister-in-law, Edith Wakeford, was distinctly afraid of him, and she died shortly after making her will, and exhibiting rather suspicious symptoms in her last illness. Mr. Dalmon was greatly taken by his daughter's governess; so he turned his deadly attentions to his wife. She died also in a highly suspicious manner, of tetanus. Under what must have been an overpowering obsession of compulsion, Vanda in a heartlessly short space became the second Mrs. Dalmon. The reality of the marriage was so distasteful that Vanda, fighting against her dreadful bridegroom, was helped in the nick of time by young Dr. Edward Westmacott, her true lover. Dalmon went mad and died in three weeks. He was really too hot-blooded for cold-blooded success.

"TUCK."*

The altruism which induced an epicure to be an unpaid Chairman of Quarter Sessions for twenty-five years was worth a post-Arthurian knighthood, but not the liking which Sir William Hardman has won by his serial medley of history, gossip and personalia. Edward Dundas Holroyd was lucky to receive for more than a decade the equivalent of a professional journalist's résumé of his country's doings, plus humorous enrichments occasionally beyond the transcriptive courage of admirable Mr. Ellis.

The present volume covers the period April, 1865–April, 1868, leaving hope for a successor, as the letters to Holroyd continued to August, 1871. Mr. Ellis has richly added to the value and interest of what by itself would be more than readable. For instance his notes on Adah Menken, illustrated with a "spoony" photograph of herself and Swinburne, are almost lavishly instructive, and one may cite his commentary on the marriage of Prince Christian to Princess Helena, and on the Prophet Baxter as further evidence of success in annotation.

Mr. Ellis is not a Victorian, though she was ruling when he was born; otherwise he would not have written his very entertaining remarks on John Brown, the rugged royal servant whose feet are depicted in caricature on Queen Victoria's mantelpiece. If Catherine of Russia had had a John Brown he would have acquired a magnificence which would have overlaid the sober colour of his name, and it is fair to remember that Queen Victoria's favour left him a servant who could be sneered at as a "lackey."

The old Toryism was like a window-tax: it excluded light, but it tended to increase the charm of a friendship; it required no philanthropic worrying or struggle to transmute a bore, a slave, a man out of work, into a neighbour to be loved as oneself. A Hardman does not force the pace of affection; his heart is in his giving. As "Tuck" and "Robin" he and Meredith are friends on whom I look with artistic pleasure. "Tuck" set the humorousness of Meredith alight, and Hardman, in extolling and quoting Meredith's poetry, and in ecstasising over "The Shaving of Shagpat," helped to mitigate the chill cast on Meredith by the shadow of Dickens. However, Hardman was not Meredithian enough for the ultimate antics of that style, for in 1866 he remarked: "Meredith writes so much better when he has not time to finish, rewrite and (as Anthony Trollope says) twist his work to curl-papers."

A letter by Meredith written on January 31st, 1868, curiously exemplifies the exuberance of an artist contemplating with a sort of inverted snobbery a book fated to have many readers, however insipid its trickle of royal fact.

"Have you read England's Book? It sent me up Box Hill dancing a Tupper-jig. I swear by gosh, the God of the Loyal, it is a Book! And I like the Book better than the people who go retching in praise of it. Yet they also are interesting to the studious and, well-trained in the matter of belching, might let off their loyalty in regiments with applause."

Meredith, then editing the Fortnightly, had rashly selected as reviewer of "Leaves from the Journal of Our Life in the Highlands" a gentleman who handled that unpretentious little volume with staggering solemnity and, conjuring up a fluffy throng to share in that solemnity, Meredith demands: "Shall such a people live? . . . May thine and mine live in the Age of the final Eradication of Humbug. But then will thou and I be flying particles on the breath of the South-west."

In the slang of Demos, the eradication of Humbug is "some job"; and would have been even in Hardman's case. In 1866 he writes that Swinburne's "Poems and Ballads" "contains some passages worthy to rank among the noblest in our language, while three parts of it are the foulest beastliness." Obviously if the offending volume had been so proportioned it would have met the legal fate of "Ulysses" and "The Rainbow." Truth to tell, its morbid erotism is not in the least aphrodisiac in effect. The worst aspect of the book is its black frown at the gods. One would have thought that a "Pantagruelist" like Hardman would have dismissed the erotism as merely fantastically fervent; but no! he is British and Victorian malgré lui, so he must lash it with a puritanical tail. An envelope of stupidity, by which cant hides its viciousness from the soul, seems to assist success in positions of authority where much gab and no originality are required. Certainly Hardman's attitude to democracy, to political offenders and to the flotsam of vagabondage is repulsively unimaginative. Nor can his appreciation of President Lincoln's stercoraceous humour diminish one's disgust at his carefully draped satisfaction at the death of that statesman. Lincoln's theatre-going on his fatal Good Friday was "too much" for Hardman's "stomach," and no doubt it showed indifference to episcopalian opinion, but it may be remarked that some Nonconformists view the first Good Friday as much more notable for its victory than for its pain, and would not (I knew a Primitive Methodist minister who did not) object to playing cricket on that day.

The most interesting event in Hardman's personal life recorded in this volume is the litigation resulting from a bell-ringing church clock which drew from Shirley Brooks the remark: "Rabelais is supposed to have meant England by the 'Ringing Island,' and the mad love of making a damned row has always been upon us." Hardman's grievance was just. To have one's nocturnal drowsiness ding-donged at every quarter of an hour would be tormenting; yet in 1866 this able lawyer had so miscalculated his right that he lost his case and had to pay costs. "The wretched snobs celebrated their victory by a band of music accompanied by a man or men ringing bells." No wonder Hardman exploded in three big "D's"! His reader will be ungrateful for much amusement if he does not sympathise. W. H. CHESSON.

THE BETTER SIDE OF WAR.*

There is little doubt that the day of the ultra-realistic War book is passing. War books continue, but those which, to use the words of the editor, "apparently cannot achieve effects without overloading their pages with crude details of abhorrent sights and obscenities of dialogue," are giving place to better, more artistic and, when all is said and done, truer conceptions of the tragedy and the horror of those years of madness.

Two such prove worthy companions to, say, H. M. Tomlinson's "All Our Yesterdays" and Richard Blaker's "Medal Without Bar." The more graphic, and therefore the more enthralling at first glance, is by Coningsby Dawson. The more poignant and more sensitive is by Vernon Bartlett. Each is a craftsman; each is stirred and driven by the futility of all the carnage, the loss, the suffering, the sacrifice; each is seared by the blundering and the essential insensitiveness of the Machine which recks nothing of the individual.

It is of the individual that each writes; not the coarse, semi-bestialised creature made popular by the Continental school of war novelist, but the man who came from farm or factory, cottage or villa, from your street or mine. Listen to Mr. Dawson telling of artillery drivers:

"I remember a march on this same road when the drivers were so frozen that they had to be lifted out of their saddles; no one had the strength to unfasten a bit till he had thawed his fingers between the horse's back and the saddle-blanket. Yet there wasn't one man who quit when we limped into our muddy standings. Every gunner and driver went to work on the horses, grooming them with a will and trying to make them comfortable before he thought of himself. . . . I think the Lord of Compassion, when the final reckoning comes, will remember kindnesses even to horses. When He judges those drivers He'll not forget the bitter cold of that winter's march and what it meant to stand grooming in the snow and sleet when you were bitten to the bone and almost crying with misery."

Can one wonder that the broad-minded officers talk of the individual magnanimity of each Tommy's sacrifice and the unimaginative callousness with which it was accepted? "We ask too much when we treat them as feudal slaves, and expect them to act like crusaders."

Mr. Bartlett has a grimmer theme than Mr. Dawson. We are given an introductory glimpse of the childhood of the hero, his hopes and aspirations, the hopes and faith of his mother. He goes to war, is sent out on an unnecessary raid—herein lies one actual example of the blundering against which both authors write bitterly and trenchantly—is wounded, and lies long hours in a shell-hole in No Man's Land, dying. His mind hovers from present to past, past to present, and gropes out into the future as he lies there, sinking, sinking. In his tortured musings, moralisings and self-examinings we learn much and feel more. Then comes the end, though not in the shell-hole.

Had it not been that the publishers tell us beforehand that the hero dies, we would not have betrayed the fact. The knowledge detracts from the natural suspense so cleverly built up by the author. Yet that is a small matter in a work of this nature. For it is one of those books which memory will not allow us to be finished with when once it is read and laid aside.

HENRY ARTHUR JONES.†

In her preface Mrs. Thorne disclaims any attempt to offer a critical study of her father's work as a dramatist, because that has been done by many "far better qualified" for such a task. But indeed so far as the present volume is concerned, such an attempt has been rendered unnecessary by Max Beerbohm's inimitable introductory letter. In recalling his criticisms in the Saturday Review he maintains that he was right in admiring the plays of

† "The Life and Letters of Henry Arthur Jones." By Doris Arthur Jones. 25s. (Gollancz.)

Henry Arthur Jones "more, on the whole, than any other English dramatic work of that time"; and then gives his reasons in sentences which are a balanced appreciation of his friend's outstanding qualities:

"No playwright was more essentially 'of the theatre' than he; none had a keener sense of what the theatre is for and isn't for—of the effects that can be made there and not elsewhere, and of the effects that can be made much better elsewhere than there. None had in greater measure the gift for easy, quick, pointed dialogue. None had humour so robust and genial. And none, I think, knew nearly so much about the hearts and minds of human beings."

Equally illuminating is Max Beerbohm's insistence upon the quality which enabled the dramatist to win his many triumphs on the stage: "great vitality, eager concentration." That is in perfect harmony with the citation Mrs. Thorne has happily made from one of the finest of her father's unacted plays: "Endurance, not enjoyment, is man's pass-key through this world." Hardly otherwise is it possible to explain how the son of a small farmer, who never had a day's schooling after the age of twelve, who began working in a draper's shop at that age, who then became a warehouseman and commercial traveller, and had reached his thirtieth year before success rewarded his labours, took foremost rank among Victorian dramatists. Mrs. Thorne has summed up all this in a passage which should be a beacon to all aspiring souls:

"Though he started writing when he was twelve, Henry Arthur had to wait sixteen years before his first play was produced. From the beginning right up to the end of his life he was to remain undaunted by failure, to find resources within his own nature of courage, patience and endurance, which gave him strength at the commencement of his career to conquer and overcome sixteen years of barren work, and when he had won recognition, to ignore and triumph over defeat by renewed effort. He felt his failures keenly, but he would not allow them to dishearten him."

George Bernard Shaw and Henry Arthur Jones, in the early nineties.
From "The Life and Letters of Henry Arthur Jones," by Doris Arthur Jones (Gollancz).

Although the dramatist's daughter has rigidly kept to her disavowal of criticism, she has wisely included among her appendices the elaborate reply to a questionaire on dramatic technique which her father wrote in 1923. In his lucid answers to many questions bearing upon every aspect of the writing of a play, he laid bare the working of his mind in a manner invaluable for the guidance of every playwright. In one passage too he gave perhaps the most vital clue to his own success: "I have kept a close watch on all the men and women I have met. I have listened to every conversation that has fallen within my earshot. I have thrown all my observations and experiences into a common melting-pot, and have drawn from it fresh specimens and types of humanity that are new and consistent individuals compounded out of the massed material."

It is with the tangible results of the vitality and technique of Henry Arthur Jones that this affectionate but judicial biography is chiefly concerned. After giving due attention to prentice efforts, the narrative becomes fully detailed with the great triumph of "The Silver King," thenceforward to present an absorbing account of the successes and failures of the forty-one years between 1882 and 1923. As to the failures, although Mrs. Thorne does not stress the fact, she does, by reproducing her father's striking farewell message, indicate that they were mainly of his own seeking. That is, such plays as "The Crusaders," "The Tempter" and "Michael and His Lost Angel" were deliberate attempts to utilise his vogue with playgoers to persuade them to appreciate the best in drama. His successes of course are blazoned in the history of the Victorian drama; and among them is that comedy, "The Liars," which has taken its place permanently among the greatest comedies in the English language. As to his own preference, Mrs. Thorne records that a month or two before he died he said: "If I were to have a volume of plays to go into eternity with, and if—supposing I go up that way—I see Peter, the ones I'd tell him I'd have would be 'Michael and His Lost Angel,' 'The Tempter,' 'The Liars' and 'The Case of Rebellious Susan.'" In the choice of the first he could count upon the suffrage of Bernard Shaw, who averred that the "melancholy truth" of that failure was that "the English stage got a good play, and was completely and ignominiously beaten by it."

That hearty verdict is a reminder of the notable friendship of the two dramatists. It began in the early nineties, and knew no break on Shaw's side. To G. B. S. his friend was "first, and eminently first among the surviving fittest of his own generation of playwrights"; and among the many attractive illustrations of the biography, one of the most interesting is a snapshot of the two friends standing by their bicycles. Henry Arthur Jones was rich in notable friendships with most of the famous men of his time, but that which glows with the greatest colour in these pages is his intimacy with Bernard Shaw. The War was to make a gulf between them, but on Shaw's side the old kindliness never changed. The rift was honourable to both men; to Henry Arthur because it had its roots in his passionate patriotism; to Bernard Shaw because he regarded all his friend's criticisms as "the top dressing of denunciatory rhetoric." "Wells and I," he added in the tender letter he sent Mrs. Thorne after her father's death, "were the only part of the world that was too foolish and cruel for him to suffer gladly."

Biographies of the theatre are apt to be ephemeral productions—published to-day and "remaindered" in a few months. But it will be singular if this does not prove to be a notable exception. The portraiture of the man is so vivid, there is such a wealth of interesting detail, and the letters of the subject and his friends are so replete with discussions of great themes, that the book may easily take an honourable place among the notable biographies of English literature.

THE POETRY OF SCIENCE.*

M. Maeterlinck has now produced a sequel to his little book on "The Life of Space" which we reviewed in these columns a year ago. Having in his "Life of the Bee" given us a study of the mystery and majesty of the infinitely little, he turned his thoughts, in "The Life of Space," to the infinitely great; and now again, in his new volume, he allows his imagination to wander through the dizzy amplitudes of the universe. He is a poet at play among the stars, and only those readers will be disappointed who expect the poet to be a scientist or a consistent philosopher, deducing from his observations and musings a single unified theory. This is indeed a somewhat baffling book, fascinating yet difficult to read; for just as we fancy that he is about to develop a logical line of argument, the writer becomes discursive and, flying off at a tangent, proceeds to elaborate some alternative point of view.

* "The Magic of the Stars." By Maurice Maeterlinck. Translated by Alfred Sutro. 6s. (Allen & Unwin.)

If however we accept Mr. Maeterlinck frankly as a poet, there is both pleasure and profit to be derived from his excursions into space. In the first part of his book he pays tribute to some of the greatest astronomers of the last forty years, during which period, as he reminds us, more knowledge about the universe has been accumulated than during the whole preceding period of history. He then succinctly summarises the findings of recent astronomical research; and not only does he show a complete mastery of the facts, but he gives dramatic vitality to those facts in a manner of which only a poet is capable. He makes figures and distances live—in such a way that the less steady-headed among his readers will find their brains spinning and will feel inclined to close the book. It is to be hoped however that such readers will persevere; for it is really for their solace and sustenance that the book is designed.

It is the whole underlying motif of M. Maeterlinck's discursions that "the infinite, with its immensities, its unfathomable secrets, loses its terrors when surveyed by the spirit"; for it is in spirit, rather than in matter, that he conceives the essence of the universe to lie:

"This much is certain: if one single mass could be formed, one vast, overwhelming mass, of all the matter contained in the ever-revolving universe; and if that stupendous sphere were launched into the vibrating, energy-laden ether; one might safely declare, considering the immense voids of interstellar space, that the sphere would lie as inconspicuous in the infinite as a grain of sand in all the deserts and all the oceans of our earth. If truly the universe be in its essence material, we can only marvel at the insignificant part its prime or perhaps unique element is given to play."

Thus M. Maeterlinck argues from his contemplation of the nature of the electron, and his whole book is really a sermon—rather than a treatise—upon the same text, which he amplifies with suggestions and illustrations drawn from his study of all the latest researches into the properties of radiation, electricity, gravitation, space-time and so forth. His arguments, as we have said, fit into no logical scheme. How indeed could they be expected to do so, since, as M. Maeterlinck himself reminds us again and again, there is still infinitely more to be learned about the universe than has already been discovered? It is perhaps the pivotal merit of M. Maeterlinck's book that it is calculated to drive vitally home to even the dullest mind the fact that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in the average philosophy, and that, in the light of present data, a mechanistic theory of the universe is untenable. As for the future—M. Maeterlinck admits the possibility that further knowledge may cause a return to the mechanistic point of view. But he deems that possibility remote. With a poet's intuition and a poet's eloquence, he expresses his conviction that every fresh discovery will but demonstrate more clearly the spiritual nature of the universe, driving men back "to the idea of God, the idea we find in the first sagas of the Rig-Veda; an idea we have never surpassed, and probably never shall."

GILBERT THOMAS.

MODERN ENGLISH TEACHING.*

The author is a man of culture and has had over thirty years' experience as an inspector of schools. His ideas (as one would naturally expect) are sane and sound—never revolutionary. Mr. Davidson is not violently opposed to modern tendencies, but he evidently thinks that the pendulum has swung too far. He puts up a defence for recitation, reading aloud, dictation, and the teaching of grammar. In fact he suggests that children should be asked to write in imitation of a given style—an exercise which is useless except for purposes of parody.

* "Modern English Teaching." By E. F. Davidson, M.A. 2s. 6d. (Collins.)

The author is of opinion that too much attention is given to expression and too little to understanding what is written or spoken. He advocates word-study, dictionary-drill, and the intensive study of short passages of literature. But if a reader suddenly wonders what is meant by and asks whether the "quality" is "strained like coffee" or "strained like a tight-rope" (what does the line mean ?), the fault is probably due to expression. Limitations of vocabulary or wandering attention on the part of the scholar may be responsible for his failure to grasp the meaning; but may it not be due to carelessness and lack of lucidity in the writer or speaker? And is a teacher right in directing the attention to words rather than to the ideas which shine through the words?

"The quality of mercy is not strained,"

Would it not be better to regard language as a transparent medium, both in reading and in writing, and to follow the advice of the Duchess in "Alice in Wonderland" to "take care of the sense and the sounds will take care of themselves"? Does the sculptor think of marble or of the goddess whom he is liberating? Does the astronomer remember the telescope when he is gazing at a new nebula?

The chapter of Composition is excellent, and there is some useful advice on the choice of books for the school library. Mr. Davidson is to be commended for his courage in attacking the ideal of "inspiring a genuine love of literature" in the young. Only one person in a hundred is capable of appreciating the beauties of a passage of fine flexible prose, but all young scholars should be trained to grasp the meaning of a simple message or a few written instructions. Still, the surest way to appreciate the value of a piece of good writing is to try to write. Literature does not exist solely for "imitation": it is a whetstone as well as a touchstone. R. W.

OLD-TIMER AND NEW-COMER.*

Sir Arthur Pinero may be said to embody the history of the modern theatre. We look back to the dim eighties and find controversy raging around his innovations and experiments, and he himself declaring "The drama is not stationary, but progressive." He humanised farce and brought it to that rich border country between its own legitimate province and the more sedate realms of comedy. He followed Ibsen in tragedies wherein character and the inexorable past wove a web of fatal circumstances. He toyed with the drama of social ideas. Always he has been a conscientious craftsman and essentially a man of the theatre since the period of the middle seventies, when he was acting with Irving, the Wyndhams and the Bancrofts.

Now, fifty years after, his "Dandy Dick" is enjoying London success, and he presents us with another volume containing a tragedy, a "sedate farce" and a delightful preface. With this last, which defends Sir Arthur's own practice in the matter of stage directions, and incidentally abuses the existence of "that modern excrescence of the theatre—the producer," many will quarrel. Indeed it is written in the vein of defence from imaginary opponents. My own chief quarrel with it is for its brevity; one would willingly have heard more from this "old theatrical hand," as Sir Arthur calls himself.

The two plays reveal the dramatist faithful to his creed of experiment and alive to current tendencies. "Dr. Harmer's Holidays," for example, uses the fluid technique of nine scenes instead of the rigid three acts; and as some of those scenes are pure mime, we have a hint of the expressionist method of stagecraft. The story is one of a young doctor whose divided personality dictates a normal life of kindness and ultra-respectability cut through by an abnormal streak which sends him to the lowest degradations of the underworld for his diversion. The story, we are told, is based on an actual instance of an old murder case where the victim was proved to have been such a character. To say that it is convincingly worked out is only to say that the hand of Sir Arthur Pinero has not lost its cunning. He holds our interest in and sympathy for the protagonist from the first moments in his pleasant consulting-room to the last sordid wordless picture of Harmer's murdered body. The failure of the play lies in the lack of universality of the theme. It has proved a snare in Pinero's work before, and even his best known pieces, such as "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," seem upon reflection rather particular instances than general principles.

The farce is highly diverting if we will treat it as such. A serious writer, persuaded to exploit his boy and girl for sentimental copy and eventually driven to build up a huge fictitious personality as the "Child-Man" who adores and understands the young; the egoistical monsters into which his models grow; the ultimate revolt from their domination and that of the myth; these things are well chosen elements of farce, and the author carries it off with a high hand. Once again his catch is a rare bird and not everybody's pigeon. That is one fault; another is that occasionally we suspect the author of trying to point a moral against charlatanism in art and literature; and farces, even sedate farces, must have no dealings with moralising.

If Sir Arthur comes with fifty years' experience and more than thirty published plays, Mr. James Bridie with his first volume interests us as a new-comer. "The Switchback" has been produced by Sir Barry Jackson at Birmingham; "The Pardoner's Tale" is a one-act Grand Guignol; "The Sunlight Sonata," a morality play, with a very good idea somewhat confusedly worked out. Truth to comfess, I do not find Mr. Bridie matured enough either for presentation or publication. His ideas are dramatic and show a sense of the theatre, but there is no conviction in the characterisation. In "The Switchback"—the story of a country doctor whose researches are exploited by a newspaper owner and a financier to his own ultimate undoing, for he is struck off the Medical Register and the cure is found to be fallacious—we have a good idea; and if any one of the characters had been controlled from within instead of being shifted about by the author, it could have been a fine play. As it is we are mentally saying all the time "I don't believe it." There are good lines and good ideas; but no characterisation. Mr. Bridie tells us that the doctor's wife ran away with the financier; she did not, she was not that sort. He says the doctor returned to his native village and took to whisky; impossible! That he then forgave his wife and went off to Palmyra; stuff and nonsense! If Mr. Bridie will cease to bully his characters into the framework of a preconceived story he will make a considerable playwright. For the dramatist there is no truer guidance than that of Novalis when he says: "Character is Fate." The man who imagines himself sole controller of the shears, though he have as many ideas as Mr. Bridie, will never write a great play.

DESERT ISLANDS.*

The foundation of this big book is a long and interesting lecture on Islands, chiefly Robinson Crusoe's, delivered by Mr. de la Mare to many fortunate audiences. As a sample of the rambling manner of the book, we have this opening for the preface:

"Authors of the eighteenth century delighted in copious titles. These had one single merit—they saved the reader further trouble. Thus: 'Desert Islands: being the Voyage of a Hulk, called by courtesy a Lecture, that was launched under the Auspices of The Royal Society of Literature of London many years ago, namely, in 1920, was afterwards frequently in Dock again for Repair and then refitted for Farther Adventurings, and so at length became laden with an unconscionable Cargo of Odds and Ends and Flotsam and Jetsam, much of it borrow'd from other Vessels infinitely more Seaworthy than itself, and the most of that concern'd with what are known as ISLANDS, some of them Real, some of them Allegorical, and the rest purely Fabulous; together with a rambling Discourse concerning a certain very Famous Man of Letters, viz. DANIEL DEFOE, and his Elective Affinity, ROBINSON CRUSOE: which, being concocted in a most Unmethodical Fashion, is now presented to a World already groaning under an intolerable Burden of Printed Matter by its Humble Servant the Author, and dedicated to his son, DICK, MDCCCCXXX.'"

* "Desert Islands." By Walter de la Mare. With illustrations by Rex Whistler. 21s. (Faber & Faber.)

If I had realised what a hole in my review this copious title would make, I might have hesitated to quote it. But it is, as a matter of fact, equally a warning to the wrong kind of reader and a promise to the right kind. For the unmethodical accretion of curious facts and stray passages from old and new authors—the mind drawing them together being Mr. de la Mare's—around the theme described, is just what will appeal to anybody capable of reading at leisure with the grave pleasure of one who sips a rare liqueur.

It is quite impossible here to indicate the extraordinary range of literary references in this volume. One might of course guess that Mr. H. M. Tomlinson is quoted, and also Mr. John Masefield, but Professor L. P. Jacks and Professor A. S. Eddington also have a place which they fill without need for apology. One might hope to see something from Mr. E. H. Viziak's "Medusa," but only if one had read that magnificent but recent romance of the sea. While not surprised to come across the kind of authors edited by the Hakluyt Society, Thomas Hood, George Borrow, Swift, Miss Rose Macaulay, Robert Browning—and a score of others justifiably represented—might escape our expectation.

So too once it is realised that these "Desert Islands" are spiritual ones as well as earthly, De Quincey's "Opium Eater" will be expected, but an astonishing account of the effects of hashish drugging contributed by Mr. J. Redwood Anderson could never have been anticipated, although it is certainly one of the most interesting and, because hitherto unpublished, the most valuable of the items in Mr. de la Mare's literary cornucopiæa.

The one thing which I regard as an unforgivable shortcoming in the book, considering its aimless sequences of subjects, is the absence of an index. It must also be admitted that occasionally Mr. de la Mare's comments on the treasure trove which he has thrown at our feet are not in his usual fine prose. But as the book grows on one by a second reading, the quantity of true de la Mare reflections and curious sidelights on literature and life easily swamp the little lapses which, even to mention in a brief review, is to over-emphasise.

GIVE UP YOUR LOVERS. By Louis Golding. 7s. 6d. (Heinemann.)

What a charming, uncommon story this is, and with what skill Mr. Golding has carried through the little problem he presents! The book is no tract, but a novel simply and finely written. Still the question is there: Is the union of Jew and Gentile a good union or a bad one? Mr. Golding does not give an answer, and the story must be read to realise all that love between a man and woman of such entirely different religious beliefs may mean. The picture of the convent boarding school is very well drawn; and then there is the contrast of the synagogue; also the Jewish father and the Christian mother, and the strange but beautiful friendship of the lonely boy, who has lost his own mother, for the mother of the girl he loves. Avrom Farber, the degenerate Jew, is perhaps the best drawn of all the characters. One seems to see the horrible creature as he strangled the cat in all the fury of his hate, because the animal, with the unerring instinct of its kind, always raced away from him. The book closes with the preparation and the celebration of a Jewish wedding between Avrom and little Hannah, the sister of Philip, the hero of the book. One wonders what tragedy awaits this fascinated child wedded to the half crazy monster.

A MAN OF MANNERS. By Philip Hughes. 7s. 6d. (Hutchinson.)

A young, innocent girl cast friendless upon the world is not altogether a new theme in fiction, but Mr. Philip Hughes gives a certain freshness to it by making his simple, credulous and pretty little Dorothy fall into the clutches of a handsome rogue, actually marry him and believe in his honesty despite all evidence to the contrary. Even the author appears to feel that he somewhat strains our credulity for he says, " One cannot help wondering why so astute a girl as Dorothy—and in some directions she was most astute—should have shown such confidence in Basil when so many exterior circumstances . . . tended to disturb it." The explanation was that Dorothy had been brought up to assume that all the world was honest, and, her astuteness being indeed a very inconspicuous quality, it took her a long time to discover the error. Her disastrous marriage landing her, very unjustly, in the divorce court, she is set free at last to find love and happiness at the end of a present-day romance of London life that will appeal to all who enjoyed Mr. Hughes's earlier novel, " Together," now is in its eleventh impression.

BROTHER LUTHER. By Walter von Molo. Translated by Eric Sutton. 7s. 6d. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

It is no bad thing perhaps, whatever opinions we may hold respecting an age-old controversy, to be taken back to those stirring times again, to note the surroundings, see the great figures that were fated to mould the future, and look with clearer eyes upon the ambitions, the faults, the convictions, the fierce adherence to one side or the other in that period of alternating tyranny and courage. In " Brother Luther " we get a vivid account of one week in the sixteenth century, when Luther was struggling for Reformation. Rome, France and Germany pulled first one way, then the other. The young Emperor was mysterious ; the Pope's manner was arrogant ; priests and soldiers were eager and determined to carry out their work ; and Luther himself, a strong, honest figure, surrounded by enemies and friends, faced authority and refused to withdraw the " heretical " words he had written. Intrigue is rife here and passionate and sincere devotion to the old faith and to the new by one adherent and another ; with " the people," in reality, waiting to be guided. The style of the telling of this reconstructed chronicle is vigorous, and implies a good translator.

MURDER ON THE MARSH. By John Ferguson. 7s. 6d. (John Lane.)

This, like all of Mr. Ferguson's, is a capital mystery story. We have only one complaint. Sherlock Holmes's Dr. Watson has become a convention in the detective tale, and should now be banished from it. The journalist, Godfrey Chance, who goes about with Francis McNab, in " Murder on the Marsh," and serves as a foil to his astuteness, is sometimes, especially at the outset, more irritatingly dull, simple, slower in the uptake than any moderately successful journalist is likely to have been. Otherwise Mr. Ferguson has designed a story of a strange and sentimental kind whose mystery is insoluble until the reticent McNab gathers all its strands together at last and cleverly unmasks the man who contrived murder—first of the ailing, eerily haunted Mr. Cardew, then of the enterprising young policeman, Hackett, as soon as he made a discovery and before he could communicate it. There is some good character sketching in the book, and thrills enough to satisfy anyone in search of excitement, and no situation more thrilling than that in which Chance and the detective sit in the darkened bedroom waiting for the mysterious assailant who is expected to come in at the open window. Excellent entertainment, but in future please kill all Godfrey Chances, Mr. Ferguson !

ABOUT ENGLISH POETRY. By G. F. Bradby. 2s. 6d. (Oxford Press.)

A good many inquiries into the nature of poetry have been published lately, and the authors of some of them have seemed almost desperately anxious to look at their subject from a new point of view. Mr. Bradby is not one of these, and it is possible that his little book will not appeal very much to those who endorse the views of Mr. Robert Graves and Miss Laura Ridding. But less sophisticated folk will find much of interest and value in it. His aim, Mr. Bradby says, has been " to discuss quite briefly some of the many interesting questions which arise in connection with the study of Poetry " and " not so much to maintain a thesis, as to start the reader on a voyage of discovery for himself." But even those who have been long on that endless voyage will find him a stimulating companion, for he has the gift of explaining these reactions to poetry which it is so often difficult to put into words : he can tell us the why and the wherefore of our enjoyment. The question " What is poetry ? "—the essential quality which distinguishes it from prose—he answers by defining it as " an emotional and metrical appeal to the understanding, which awakens in us, in some form or other, a consciousness of beauty." On the basis of " this admittedly loose definition, as a working hypothesis," he proceeds to examine the various qualities which go to the making of fine poetry—the particular beauties of significance, restraint, rhythm and melody, and the magic of words. The examples which he chooses for analysis are nearly all famous and familiar passages, and he enhances our delight in them by making us understand it better. One favourite device of his is to show why a poet used certain words or groups of words by substituting others, equivalent in literal meaning, and exhibiting the inferiority of the result. Mr. Bradby's book will be of special value to those whose difficult task it is to instruct others in the appreciation of literature, but, as we have said, no one can read it without profit.

BALZAC, THE MAN AND THE LOVER. By Francis Gribble. 21s. (Nash & Grayson.)

There is much material in Mr. Gribble's book on Balzac that will be unfamiliar to English readers. That an uncle of his, Louis Balssa (as the name was written until the novelist's father corrected it), was guillotined for murder was only recently discovered in the archives of the Albi law courts and revealed in the Revue Universelle. The victim was one Cécile Soulie, a girl of spotted reputation, and the evidence wraps in mystery Balssa's share, if he had any, in the crime. The executed man may have suffered from a local prejudice and indeed doubt extends to the fact of Balzac being his nephew. But it is about Balzac the lover that Mr. Gribble is most curious, and his book is dominated by the purpose of "tracing the course of Balzac's sentimental education—of exhibiting the 'creative evolution' of the Romantic who became a Realist and the Realist who remained a Romantic." There were two women supreme in Balzac's life, Madame de Berny, who retained an abiding place in his heart, and Madame Hanska, who never quite ousted the other from it, though he loved her and ultimately was married to her. Mme. de Girardin, the Marquise de Castries, Mme. Marbourg, and the rest, when not mixed up with his financial needs and social aspirations, were "literary loves," required to keep his hand in if he were to sustain the reputation of the man who understood women. With Mme. Berny and Mme. Hanska it was different, and in regard to the latter Mr. Gribble's thesis commits him to a view of the lady which we must think unduly harsh. "Love had come, in the end, to be more to Balzac than fame . . . but the woman he married was not the woman he had loved." She was a shallow, selfish and self-centred woman: the woman he had loved had been no more than a figment of his imagination. It may have been so; but to support this tragedy of lost illusions, Mr. Gribble seems to subscribe to stories that are unbelievable of his wife's scandalous behaviour at the moment of the novelist's death. We suspect the mordancy of Octave Mirbeau's pen, and require more substantial corroboration than it gets from other sources. It is mostly with the Lover that this book is concerned, though incidentally it throws some light on the Man, independent of his sentimental history. But about the Writer—who after all alone now interests us—Mr. Gribble is deliberately silent.

DAYS ON DARTMOOR. By C. W. Pilkington-Rogers. 7s. 6d. (Methuen)

Mr. Rogers's conversation with a tin-worker makes one rather chary of accepting information at second-hand, but what he tells us of Dartmoor is principally from his own personal experience, covering a period of over twenty-five years. This is not a guide-book (a thing he abhors) but it serves a useful purpose in indicating many of the pitfalls which waylay the visitor and preserving him from sharing the author's fate when much laborious walking merely led him to a cowshed. It opens up many delightful out-of-the-way tracks, discourses in gossiping vein on the physical features, activities past and present (Hey Tor sent its granite for the arches of London Bridge), and in no unmistakable way reflects Mr. Rogers's sensitive responsiveness to the moor's elusive allurement. There is an interesting chapter on dolmens, menhirs and other neolithic remains but, despite contentions to the contrary, the author stoutly maintains "there is no evidence that Druidical worship ever prevailed on Dartmoor."

THE WORLD OF SELF AND SPIRIT. By Edmond Holmes. 5s. (Cobden-Sanderson.)

Frankly we cannot quite understand Mr. Holmes's mystical creed and paradoxical philosophy, and cannot quite decide whether our inability to understand them is due to deficiency or excess of light—to defects in his exposition, or to debility in our intelligence. When he says that "It is only by transcending self, whenever an opportunity of transcendence presents itself, that we can realise little by little that self can be indefinitely transcended," and that "self-identity is established not by self-consistency but by self-contradiction and self-transcendence," he seems to us to be not only mystical, but misty, and to use the words "self" and "transcendence" in two senses neither very clear. Yet his little book is so full of patches of luminous wisdom that one is prepared to believe that one's failure to understand the whole of it is due to one's own lack of philosophic grip. The first chapter on the "Logic of Becoming" and the meaning of reality is both interesting and lucid, and its analysis of the Law of Contradiction is admirable. The distinction drawn in that connexion between true contradictories and correlated polar opposites is particularly trenchant and instructive. Acute too is the discussion of Freedom in Chapter IV, applying the distinction, where it is maintained that Freedom and Necessity are not contradictories, but polar opposites mutually dependent, not mutually exclusive. The main message of the book seems to be that the ego is real, that it itself is the sole generator of reality, and that the evolution—an epigenetic evolution of the ego is the goal and purpose of conscious existence. "I have no shadow of a doubt," he writes, "as to the intrinsic reality of the object of my self-awareness. The whole phenomenal world may be no more than a phantasmagoria. But the inner world, the soul, the spirit, the world of self is real beyond all reality. It is the source and goal of its own being. It shines by its own light." Mr. Holmes has a good literary style; he is sane and sincere, often wise and acute, but he is apt to be hazy and does not seem to have always found quite the right terms to make his theses clear.

THE MEDWAY RIVER AND VALLEY. By William Coles Finch. 10s. 6d. (Daniel)

We are already indebted to Mr. Coles Finch for several delightful nature books and at least one book dealing with the county of Kent, where his home has been for many years. His latest, handsomely produced volume is a mine of interest to historians, geologists, archæologists, and to any who would know their England. Like all our important rivers, the Medway has played its part in the story of the British people, and Mr. Coles Finch has searched old archives and gone to various authorities to present in full the record of this neighbour of the Thames which has figured so largely in many epoch-making events. The landscape of the Medway valley, the character of its people, its association with smuggling and the signs of the smuggling days still to be discovered, the Dutch invasion, literary and artistic connections, and many other aspects claim the author's interest and are illustrated with over a hundred very fine photographs, reproductions from old prints, etc., which give the book a unique value. If you know Kent, "The Medway River and Valley" will make you know it and love it more intimately; if you do not know it, you will be eager to come for yourself and explore the places of "indescribable beauty" and high romance that lie in "The Flower Garden of England." We regret that under two illustrations from this book reproduced in our Christmas Art Supplement the name of Mr. Jonathan Cape, instead of that of Messrs. C. W. Daniel, was given as publisher.

THE PATH THROUGH THE WOOD. By J. Lewis May. 7s. 6d. (Geoffrey Bles.)

Mr. Lewis May, known for an admirable life of Newman and his sympathetic translations from Anatole France, has had the happy inspiration of setting down, for his own pleasure and ours, his memories of childhood and youth. He has attempted no complete or continuous autobiography: each of his forty-odd sketches, none of which is more than half a dozen pages long and some of them only two or three, is detached and self-contained. But the net result is the revelation of a personality of great charm and subtle understanding. There are pictures of school days in London and holidays in North Devon, and the latter will appeal especially to those who love rivers and the sea and boats. And there are pictures of the legendary literary world of the nineties, seen from its very centre, for Mr. May was privileged to be a daily inmate of the Bodley Head in its great days. Nothing is better in this book than the contrasting portraits, perfect in tact, sympathy and humour, of the two famous publishers of Vigo Street, the enterprising and social Lane and the timid, reclusive Elkin Mathews. But portraiture is a gift of Mr. May's; and so is landscape.

DRAWINGS AND PAINTINGS. By Joan Manning-Sanders. With an Introduction by R. H. Wilenski. 21s. (Faber & Faber)

There have been so many youths with beautiful pasts that we have grown suspicious about infant prodigies. Our popular press, daily and weekly, is so avid of sensation that any policeman, postman or plumber who gets a work accepted by the Royal Academy is fairly certain of obtaining wide publicity. A masterpiece by a real painter is far less likely to attract popular attention. The present writer remembers that after Sir James Guthrie—the Raeburn of our day—had been elected President of the Royal Scottish Academy, he declined to allow a critic to write a magazine article on his portraits and other paintings. "It would be premature to do anything of the kind now, thank you," said this most distinguished Scottish painter. But apparently it is not premature to publish a whole book about the pictures and drawings of a young girl still in her teens. Miss Joan Manning-Sanders has some gift and has shown some talent for painting, but not more than that possessed by a round score of other young artists of her own age. She now needs application far more than advertising, and the best that a well-wisher can hope is that a promising talent may not be killed by too much kindness.

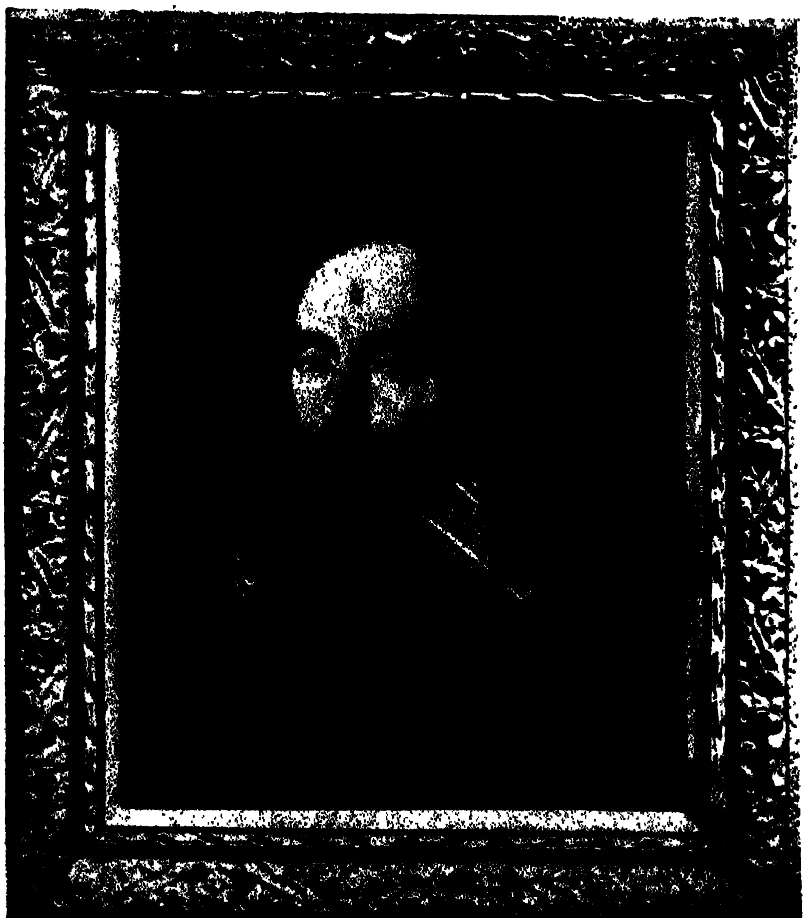
The Collector

"Let not the collector, therefore, ever, unless in some urgent and necessary circumstances, part with any of his treasures."—BURTON

THE VALUE OF WRAPPERS.

AN essential feature of book-collecting nowadays is the saving of wrappers. A first edition of a scarce book, or even of any book that has some importance but possesses no wrapper, is not nearly so valuable as one that has a wrapper, and one that is in good condition. There are plenty of instances of this, but one that happens to come to my mind at the moment is Tomlinson's "Old Junk." This was Tomlinson's second book, published by Andrew Melrose in 1918. It was really a war product, and we are not therefore very justified in despising the way the book was made. The volume is printed on atrocious paper, and is not easy to come across. The chances are that most of the copies, which were not many as editions go nowadays, have fallen to pieces. In spite of the fact that it came out when good paper was hard to get or only obtainable at a high price, "Old Junk" had a coloured wrapper. My copy, which I have just taken from the shelves behind me, is fortunately an extraordinarily good copy, and the wrapper is perfect. It has an additional jacket wrapped round it—a precaution I always take with scarce items. A really first-class copy of this, with a perfect dust-wrapper, would I suppose be worth four or five pounds at least at the moment. I have seen indifferent copies, without a wrapper, marked at £3. So you see what a difference a jacket makes. By the way, in my copy is inserted a cutting from that clever "Mr. London" feature that Mr. Hannen Swaffer made famous in the Daily Graphic. He told us, in the paragraph in question, that Mr. Wells once said: "If you counted on the fingers of one hand the present-day authors whose works would live, Tomlinson would be one of them." That is undoubtedly true, and his books are enhancing in value very rapidly. "Sea and the Jungle" is changing hands at £40 to £50, and if a copy had the author's autograph in it, it would command many pounds more. I have just seen such a copy in Messrs. Elkin Mathews's new list, marked at £60. And this is not a dear copy.

The coloured wrapper really began its career in America. Before that it was but a plain printed affair and, back of that, publishers just wrapped their books in glascine paper. We soon adopted the fashion of the coloured jacket, as it was called in U.S.A. In Australia, by the way, it is sometimes called a shirt. We usually call it a wrapper now, but the catalogues describe it, and correctly so, as a dust-wrapper; for after all that is what it really is; it is intended to keep the dust from the book. But some people have curious ideas about wrappers. Many won't have them at any price, stripping them off, and throwing them away, immediately the book comes into their hands. The other day I was showing a relation my books, a large proportion of which have the wrappers intact. On the spine—that is the shelf-back—of any number of them, is printed the price.



"I wonder that you keep the wrappers on," he said.

"Why?" I asked.

"It looks so purse-proud—those prices showing!"

Now did you ever come across an attitude of mind that was so utterly provincial? I was nonplussed—tongue-tied. And I had thought I was known as a collector!

Another instance of the value of the wrapper is associated with Mr. Galsworthy's "Silver Spoon." The ordinary edition has a plain, printed wrapper, but the first few copies were issued with a spoon printed on it. It was a silver and green wrapper, but Mr. Galsworthy did not like it; so it was immediately cancelled. The few copies that were circulated with the original wrapper fetch something like £4, but the other edition is much less costly. There are a number of instances of this kind.

An early seventeenth century portrait, believed to be Shakespeare, known as "The Welcombe portrait of the Poet."

From Messrs Ellis's Spring Catalogue of Choice and Rare Books, No. 261.

The importance of the wrapper for book-collectors is so especially realised by some that, in rebinding a book, the jacket and cloth covers have been retained. But of course in doing this, the first edition value has become much lessened. A volume that has been rebound in some other style is rarely as valuable as when it was in the original cover. In the past collectors did not pay much attention to the wrapper; now it is understood how important a part it plays in the value of the book. After all said and done, it seems to me incorrect to throw away a wrapper, whether it is on a first edition or not. The wrapper, even though we detest it, is really a part of the volume. There are those who even collect wrappers. I have heard of one or two, but it is not general.

QUESTIONS FROM A FRIEND.

The one thing about book-collecting that makes of it a garland that binds all of us together in friendship, is its human aspect. I have yet to find a true book-collector who is without sympathy for a brother of the cult. So when a question comes to us, from someone in another part of the country, it gives us more than a little pleasure to try and answer it.

The happy burden of this little note is the result of a kindly letter that came to us the other day from that delectable county of Dorset, where we have often dallied in fancy with the spirit of Thomas Hardy. We hope there will be others who will help us over the stiles; for we must go questing with them. We would be sorry souls an we had no spirit of sympathy and help in us. That is not our way. And when there comes with the letter a precious word of encouraging congratulation for our modest efforts, the task is at once a delight.

From time to time we shall, perhaps with some venturing, try to suggest those authors whose books are worth noting. We shall not always be correct. Years may pass, must pass in some cases, before our trumpeting is justified. As to Brett Young, friend of Dorset, there are those who think "Black Roses" is worth while; and we know of others who have cried fie upon it. At least the author is a man with inner vision, and much correctitude in his manner and his writing. If I started out to make me a collection of his first editions, I would surely have his goods and his bads. I have his "Black Roses" upon my shelves.

Naturally if we collect books only for capital appreciation—an ugly term, I agree—we shall do our level best to avoid the "bads." We must let our experience help us in our judgment, and we must arrive at our judgment by way of our experience.

That other author, Stephen Hudson, may well become valuable. And if you have stayed your mind upon him you have indeed a true literary sense. I remember the intellectual thrill, even though it was mixed with a soupçon of the tragic, that was mine when I read "Richard Kurt" in 1919. Some of his other books are "Elinor Colhouse" (1921), "Prince Hempseed"

(1923), "Tony" (1924), "Myrtle" (1925). As to "A True Story," while the component parts appeared in separate volumes, and are I suppose the first printing of them, the gathered volume is the thing to possess. I don't think I would bother about those other parts. Take as an instance Mr. Coppard's "Adam and Eve and Pinch Me." The stories that appear in this most precious volume were first printed in the old Westminster Gazette, Pearson's Magazine, Voices and the English Review; but these have no value, whereas "Adam and Eve and Pinch Me"—which is the title of the sixth story in the book—is commanding the high price of ten or more pounds. Richard Aldington said that, although "A True Story" is five hundred pages long, "I should not have minded if it had been twice as long."

As to Mottram, if you have not a first edition of "The Spanish Farm," I fear it might well cost you £8 to £10. The later books of this author are not so high-priced. This brings me to the desire to reiterate the advice, that it were unwise to begin collecting—unless there are great riches available—when first editions are commanding high prices. Let us find our way to the instinct to collect an author when he or she is nobody's child. Our harvesting will then indeed be a plentiful one. First editions of all the famous War novels will be valuable possessions some day—that is if such collecting has its attraction for you.

Mr. Francis Brett Young.

ON THE LISTS.

Where shall we start?

There is a delightful list of Pegasus Books that were exhibited by the famous House of Bumpus. A goodly list this. "In short," says the Pegasus, "the firm conceives its function to be that of a merchant of ideas, which in that case centre round the history of the arts, and the appreciation and practice of all matters pertaining to the making of books." You will discover the ideas in the list for the seeking. Then there lies, cheek by jowl with the Pegasus list, two from my good friends, Messrs. Foyle. One is an intelligently edited "Foylibra," full of helpful hints about book-collecting and other things, as well as a most useful list of current publications, and a well arranged catalogue issued by Department No. 17, dealing with Fine and Applied Arts and Collecting. Of course I turned at once to the collecting section; for of such is the kingdom of bibliophiles; and there indeed I found myself more than content during a rainy hour that kept me prisoner in my quiet library.

In the Vardu Bookshop Spring Catalogue of Modern First Editions I spent some happy moments. I like this list. A very readable one too. There was an item, "St. Hercules," of Martin Armstrong's. Do you know his work? Some day I must write about him. And some precious volumes by Norman Douglas. I'd like to be with him, these joyous spring days, in Italy. I see there are some eight books by Maurice Hewlett. Last night, or rather early this morning, when the grey cloud of dawn began to withdraw itself from my bedroom, I spent an hour with one of the Hewlett books noted in this list—"The Little Iliad." Hewlett is going up. Some day his books will be very valuable. They are already near it. I am only speaking commercially. Before I mastered my sleeplessness, I took more than a little pleasure from List No. 32, of First Editions of English Books of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries, of Messrs. Davis & Orioli. A well arranged list this. It is no use trying to detail this catalogue. There are over seven hundred entries. Better write for it. Full of good items. Their address is in Museum Street, London. The same antiquarian bookseller sent us a good list of books about fifteenth and sixteenth century printing, and woodcut books; famous presses, and no end of other fascinating books about subjects that one would expect to find down the side streets of life; such as gastronomy and wine, and early herbals Quite a number of lists and sheets came along the other morning from Messrs. Émile Hazan & Cie, of 8 Rue de Tournon, Paris vi. They are offering the "Contes de Perrault" in a magnificent edition, illustrated by Lucien Boucher. There is a very limited edition, on Japan paper, at a cost of 800 francs. The French are making some very fine limited editions, and some of them are finding their way over here. But to return to our own people. There dropped into our letter box this p.m. a number of other lists. An interesting one came from Rawling Brothers, of Cheltenham. Once, while lounging happily in a bookshop in Cheltenham, seeking for certain long-wished-for treasures, I wondered if there were many other towns that presented so alluring an environment for the book hunter. Another excellent list is Mr. Harold Halewood's Catalogue 49 of Early Editions. Mr. Halewood, of Preston, had sent me his list a long while before the "Collector" was started. They are always readable, and always hard to resist. I like the quotation at the head of the list from the sayings of that prince of collector-buyers, Dr. Rosenbach: "Rare books are a safe investment; the stock can never go down." True enough for Mr. Halewood. His stock is always plentiful. There are some worth-while American books in this list, and a precious item for £50. It is Keats's "Endymion." A Moxon edition of 1873, being "Master James M.

Barrie's School Prize for 6th Latin Class Verse Translation." This is something I have never before come across.

Mr. C. E. Hewitt, of Brixton Road, has sent me a list (No. 5) of a varied character. With it came a reprint of an article entitled "The Book Hall," from the Brixton Free Press. It describes Mr. Hewitt's bookshop. Having given a reading to the list, I turned my attention to a catalogue sent out by "The Sign of the Huntsman," which is located at Southborough, near Tunbridge Wells. The attraction here was the listed books and manuscripts from the library of Austin Dobson. . . . These dots mean that I stayed my writing, and meandered for a while with the lovely music of his "Proverbs in Porcelain." But I am back again at my task of catalogue surveying. The list is of the exquisite order. There are two hundred first editions; there are books of as far back as the sixteenth century; there is Americana. And there was a good and friendly mind at the birth of this list. I have never been to Southborough, but one of these days I shall hide myself in a fictitious name, and go a-nesting with a pseudonym, and mayhap I shall come honestly by a fair owning of a longed-for book. In this way I have wandered round the pleasant shelves inside and outside of the International Bookshop, so attractively kept in that well-trod by-way, St. Martin's Court. Sometimes I have watched the light in the eyes of a collector as he almost glued his nose to the window. The list before me is a short one, as it is admitted; but still a very readable one. You will find in it books by H. E. Bates, Martin Armstrong, William Gerhardi, Richard Hughes, Percy Lubbock, Charles Morgan, T. F. Powys and Virginia Woolf. All to be surely collected, and all to be very valuable one of these days.

There was that notable illustrated catalogue of the Myers House, that I have been closely studying again. I just wanted to run off with the presentation copy of Hardy's "Dynasts." Laid in it, there is a most interesting and important Hardy letter relating to the work, together with a humorous letter from Dr. Stopford A. Brooke. This is of course a first edition—and it costs £750. Next to it comes a First Colonial Edition of "Jude the Obscure," with an interesting autograph letter from Hardy to his intimate friend, Mr. Crackenthorpe. In J. W. Browne & Son's Addison House Book Catalogue there is, as they say, "An entrancing feast of Good Things for Literary Antiquarians, Connoisseurs, Student Collectors, Lovers of Literature and Discriminating People." Such a note as that is very seductive. And when you get inside the list—there they are, all in happy medley. I marked such as—Early Bibles; Eighteenth Century Literature, and Dr. Johnson and his Circle; Old Coloured Items and Illustrated Books of the Victorian Era—and goodness knows what else. Browne's hail from Rugby.

Mr. Henry H. Bates's No. 1 White Hail Catalogue starts a good career in its nice set-out. That is half the battle for success. And English catalogues are in most cases most admirably arranged. Here we have books for all purses, and moderately priced first editions, and one or two interesting French MSS. I had collected personally the following lists, all of which should be sent for ere they go out of print, for they are among the best of antiquarian lists: H. Gray & Co., including first and rare editions of the works of Oscar Wilde; Ingpen & Stonehill, English books from 1830–1930; the Salamander Book Shop Ltd., early printed books on Medicine, Science, Botany and so forth; Catalogue Nine of Modern First Editions from the Mill House Press; and Rare and Valuable Books, Fine Bindings, Authors' MSS., Autograph Letters and First Editions, 1650–1930, offered by Major Hartley Clark.

Notable catalogues came to me direct from Mr. William Brown, Messrs. Ellis, Messrs. Heffer, Messrs. Maggs, Messrs. Elkin Mathews and Mr. Miller. In the latter catalogue are many first editions, cheap books and autograph letters. The list from Maggs is devoted especially to engravings, etchings and drawings by early and modern masters, while Mr. Brown's catalogue includes works on art subjects, and first and fine editions of modern authors. Heffer's is just one of their valuable lists of a great many notable works on the Fine Arts and English Literature; and Messrs. Ellis's catalogue is devoted to all classes of books, and describes simply but impressively as "Literature: Æschylus, Boccaccio, Brontë (C.), Defoe, Dryden, Johnson, Smollett." A further catalogue from Messrs. Ellis (No. 261) contains a list of nearly three hundred choice and rare books and particulars of an extraordinarily interesting portrait reputed to be of Shakespeare. This was formerly in the possession of Sir George Otto Trevelyan, and is priced at £350. This portrait is among the illustrations in the catalogue and we reproduce it on another page. Then there is the latest list from Elkin Mathews. I am always lured to read their catalogues from beginning to end, and this latest one kept me too long. They always print them well, and arrange them well, and fill them with good things. There are nearly eight hundred entries, and if I began to enumerate, or rather to write about the many, many excellent ones among these, I should run over into the next number! (N.P.: it is List No. 30.)

THE MARKET.

"Frescoes from Buried Temples," variations upon ethical themes by James Guthrie, with poems by Gordon Bottomley, is a Pear Tree Press work, hailing from Flansham, near Bognor. The whole edition consists of fifty-five copies. Every copy is numbered and signed by artist and author, and the price is £12 12s. We believe a few copies may still be had. Other books from this press are the Felpham Edition of Blake's "Songs of Innocence" and James Guthrie's "Book of Spiritual Drawings."

Although a rather soiled copy of A. E. Housman's "Shropshire Lad" was sold for £28 recently, really good copies still command £60 to £70. But prices are generally keeping low. A moderately priced copy of "The Little Minister" brought—first edition of course —in the three vols., with the sixteen pages of Cassells' advertisements at the end of volume one—£32.

Mr. J. G. Wilson, of Messrs. J. & E. Bumpus, gave a very interesting address recently on Limited Editions. In the course of it he dealt trenchantly with the many vexing aspects of limited editions, and especially with that very troublesome one of a bookseller not being able to get enough copies to fill his orders. Mr. Wilson said: "If there is any solution to this problem of the limited edition, it is surely that the publisher may announce his book to the trade, closing his list by a given date, and print only the aggregate number asked for." That is sound—only the publication might not then be a limited edition, although it might well be a signed edition. If several hundred copies were made, as might well be the case, the book would have no "collecting" value. But we see no objection to this. Messrs. Cape decided to follow this plan with the signed limited edition of Henry Williamson's "The Village Book." They printed sufficient copies to fill all orders received up to a certain date.

Here are some prices paid at auction for first editions of some notable works: Fanny Burney's "Evelina," £4,000; Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," £540; Jane Austen's "Sense and Sensibility," £205; Fielding's "Tom Jones," £65; Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," first edition of the Second Part, £300; Dickens's "Pickwick Papers," in the original nineteen–twenty parts, with most of the wrappers and advertisements, £580; Dodgson's "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," £180; Galsworthy's "From the Four Winds," £58; Galsworthy's "Jocelyn," £50; Milton's "Lycidas," £1,020; Second Folio Shakespeare, £560; Montaigne's "Essayes," £450; Lawrence's "Seven Pillars of Wisdom," £150; Pope's "Poems," with author's inscription, £300; Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle," £65; Sir Launcelot Greaves," £120; "Humphry Clinker," £60; a copy of the early issue of the first edition of Swift's "Gulliver's Travels," £220; and a Kelmscott "Chaucer," £290. It will interest readers to know that Fanny Burney's "Evelina" was published in three volumes in 1778 at 9s. A nice appreciation! Few readers in those days of "Evelina: or a Young Lady's Entrance into the World" could have thought when they paid their nine shillings for a copy, that we sophisticated people of the twentieth century would think well enough of it to pay £4,000 for a copy at auction. Only—it is going to America.

SELLING OUR "FIRSTS."

Someone has written to inquire how he can dispose of a fine copy of Mr. Galsworthy's "Forsyte Saga." I am not sure, first of all, which edition it is—the Limited or the regular edition. It is much easier to sell the former than it is the latter. Only a limited number of the Limited Edition was made, and there is always a ready market for it. The number actually printed was 265, and all were signed by Mr. Galsworthy. But it would be unwise to sell this, or the ordinary edition now, because not only the prices of the first edition of Mr. Galsworthy's works have depreciated, but the prices of all first editions are on the low side. I should be surprised if as much as £25 could be secured for the Limited Edition at the moment, and not more than £10 for the ordinary edition, whereas a few months since the former was fetching £50, and the regular edition £25. But do not let this concern you. The market will rise again before long, and certainly Mr. Galsworthy's books will appreciate in first edition values.

The same general word applies to "Caravan," "To Let" and "Swan Song" and all the other works by Mr. Galsworthy. Hence, now is the time to buy. Nowadays 30s. would be a fair price for "Caravan," but a Limited Edition might well cost £15 to £20, although a copy was sold at auction some months since for something like £12, I think, speaking from memory. Ten to twelve shillings would be quite enough for the regular edition of "Swan Song." I saw a copy of the Limited Edition in an American catalogue that reached me last week, for $85.00—roughly £17. There were 525 copies printed and signed by the author.

As to "To Let," here we have a more expensive item, and I don't think I should hesitate to buy at £3 10s., because I believe it, in common with all the other books by Mr. Galsworthy, will go up in price before many months have passed. "To Let" is a rather scarce volume and not always to be found in a catalogue. Once it went up to a very high price. In a record that I have kept in my own copy, I find that it was once priced at £8 10s. It was published in 1921, and printed on rather poor paper. With it, says the author on the reverse of the title page, "The Forsyte Saga" comes to an end.

The Society of Scribes and Illuminators is holding an exhibition of modern illuminated manuscripts at Messrs. Davis & Orioli's bookshop, 30, Museum Street, W.C.1. The exhibition opened on Wednesday, May 21st, and closes on June 4th.

Catalogues received too late for review this month from Albin Michael (Paris), Hellen & Sergent (Paris), Buchandlung Gustav Fock (Leipzig), Librairie du Nord (Brussels), Martin Breslauer (Berlin), André Plicque (Paris), Jules Meynial (Paris).

The First Edition Club has on exhibition, at its premises in Bedford Square, an interesting collection illustrating the tendencies of modern French book production. The exhibition is open to members only.

The Liverpool First Edition Club is holding a members' exhibition of finely printed books from modern presses, at the Basnett Gallery, Liverpool. An artistically printed catalogue shows that the exhibition is rich in interesting items produced by the presses, British and foreign, that specialise in the production of beautifully printed books. In an admirable introduction to the catalogue Mr. Eric Gill rightly claims that such an exhibition is "to be looked at as an exhibition of works of art, of things made by responsible and disinterested workmen, and the things exhibited are to be judged rationally. . . . Finely printed books are rare; they are not therefore curios." The rarest books on show are "The Book of Ruth"; and "Æsop's Fables," from the Lanston Monotype, of which the copies were distributed privately; and one of the most valuable is perhaps the "Special Bible," printed for Professor Lyon Blease, and valued at £75. We have not space to go into details, but it is evident from the programme that it is an exhibition worth going to Liverpool to see.

The 1929 issue of "Book Prices Current" (£1 12s. 6d; Elliot Stock) is just to hand. This carefully compiled annual is the most indispensable of reference books for the collector, and we shall deal with it fully next month.

"Fire and water, wind and land, I desire to have under my hand and bond"

From "The Old Book A Mediæval Anthology Edited and Illuminated by Dorothy Hartley Introduction by George Saintsbury. To be published in a limited edition of 1,300 copies, for England and America, by Mr Alfred Knopf

Some of the rare items in a recent sale of books at Messrs. Hodgsons were from the library of Mr Edwin Wilkins Field, who inherited certain of them from Crabb Robinson There were for instance Blake's copy of Wordsworth's Poems, with critical notes in Blake's handwriting, Coleridge's copy of Kant's "Vermischte Schriften," with ten pages of his notes on the flyleaves, and Leigh Hunt's Foscolo's discourse on Dante, with his copious marginal notes The sale took place too late in May for us to report upon it this month

Mr Frank Hollings's catalogue (164) of One Hundred Choice Books contains, I note among other desirable things, a first edition of "Jane Eyre" (£750), Barrie's "Little Minister (£120), Bunyan's "Mr Badman' (£300), Galsworthy's Jocelyn" (£130), Hardy's "Tess" (£250), Johnson's Rasselas (£170), and a number of other rare books at lower prices This is another catalogue to write for, so too is Mr Hollings's No 165 catalogue of books from private presses and rare first editions, and, for chess players, his catalogue of new and old chess books

There is a large collection of Galsworthy first editions at prices ranging from 15s. to £100 in the new catalogue of Messrs. Dawson; an equally large Shaw selection, and several firsts of Wells, Masefield, Yeats and other moderns, with a most tempting list of limited editions and books from private presses

Messrs Duckworth have just issued, in a limited edition of 275 copies, Oscar Wilde's "Letters to the Sphinx," and will issue during June limited editions of Edith Sitwell's Collected Poems, and of Sacheverell Sitwell's "Dr Donne and Gargantua"

From Mr Thomas Thorp comes a copious catalogue of books and bookplates (including a large collection of Trollope first editions), and a catalogue (No 137) of rare and important books in which there are, among other good things, four pages of Dickens's first editions, one of Kipling's, a number of Kelmscott and Nonesuch Press books, and some Shakespeare items to which I would call particular attention

I gather from various correspondents that the interest in grangerising is by no means declining Boswell's Johnson, Forster's Life of Dickens Lockhart's of Scott—most good biographies lend themselves well to extra illustrating, says one correspondent, but it is difficult to find all the illustrations needed I am afraid I cannot assist him beyond suggesting that he should pay a visit to the Court Bookshop in Bloomsbury which specialises in the sort of pictures the grangeriser requires

THE COLLECTOR AND HIS CATALOGUES.

Few items contribute so liberally to the bookman's education as the bookseller's catalogue To the bookman living in the metropolis or in one of the great industrial centres it is helpful enough but to the collector in the country town or the remote village it is absolutely indispensable Cut off, as the latter generally is from contact with the more important bookshops, his knowledge of bookish matters would be seriously impaired but for the regluar circulation of dealers' lists

Book catalogues serve many purposes Primarily they supply information regarding current prices, so that, by judicious comparison, the buyer is able to purchase in the most favourable market As a barometer they are invaluable, furnishing as they do all the fluctuations in the market One is able to note that Galsworthy is "up," or that Wells is "down", the gradual extinction of Scott, or the resurrection of Tennyson Filed for reference (for most bookmen keep their catalogues—or at least a selection of them), they constitute no mean bibliography, for the better class catalogue usually supplies quite full collations of the rarer books—or if the collation is omitted, space is generally sufficient to quote the reference number of the item in one of the standard bibliographies Lastly (for though most attractive it is their least useful office), they are often of rare beauty in themselves, and furnish such delightful extracts—here a facsimile of some early title page, there a reproduction of some fine typographical work—that to destroy them is, humanly speaking, almost impossible

Booksellers are almost as varied as their lists The only thing they have in common is the appeal to send a post card for inclusion on their mailing list. My own experience prompts me to divide them into three categories. The first class comprises a few of the old established and more conservative houses. Their undertaking to forward you catalogues regularly is meant. Whether you make purchases or not you will receive their lists; with this type of firm, too, the very smallest order will be executed with the same courtesy and promptitude as the largest. One such firm has sent me regular lists for at least the last ten years.

The second, and by far the largest class, consists of the dealers who have entered the business since the "first edition" craze became so marked. Few of them are bookmen or scholars in the same sense that distinguishes members of the first category. The invitation to ask for their lists is no sincere one, or at least only up to a point. It should be qualified by the statement that "if we don't receive an order quickly you will cease to receive our catalogues," for you will soon find, to your chagrin, that unless you cement the acquaintance with a cheque, this class has no use for you.

Placed in the third category are the very few firms who send a first batch of catalogues with the intimation that a further supply will only be forwarded on receipt of an annual sum. Much as I dislike this method, it is greatly preferable to class two. At any rate there is no misunderstanding. But the attitude of both classes is wrong. Class two presumably argues that if no purchase ensues, catalogues are not worth sending. My submission is that the argument is false. To begin with, most collectors are (or will soon develop into) specialists, and for such it may mean months of patient catalogue study before the item they seek comes to light. To cease the supply almost immediately seems very much like cutting off the nose to spite the face. Further, even assuming that no order ensues, is the assumption that the catalogue does no good sound? I think not. Every bookman has a circle of friends with like tastes, and if the recipient does not place an order, it frequently falls out that one of his friends does so. The objection to paying for catalogues is mainly on the ground that the "genus" catalogue has ever been a gift. One never dreams of paying for information concerning vacuum cleaners or garden produce; why should one pay for information in regard to books? Ironically enough too, it often seems that the catalogues which are sent only after a deposit has been made, are greatly inferior to the ones which come gratis. So much for catalogues then!

The hardened collector of course does not believe everything the dealer sets down in cold print. For the guidance of the undiscerning it might fairly be stated here that there is hardly any catalogue published which does not contain at least one bad error. To confirm this I submit two extracts from recent lists.

No. 1 is from a house of established repute. Yet the catalogue quotes an item as below:

> GOLDSMITH (O.). The Vicar of Wakefield. With 32 illustrations by W. Mulready, R.A., FIRST EDITION with these illustrations, 8vo, morocco, g.e., 30s. 1855

"The first edition with these illustrations"! The statement will evoke chuckles from a student of the "Vicar of Wakefield," for he well knows that the Mulready illustrations were first published exactly twelve years earlier—in 1843. Yet the item might well deceive the unlearned in bibliographical matters.

No. 2 is also from a well-known bookseller (who has taken the precaution to set the entry in heavy type). It reads:

> ROGERS (SAMUEL) Poems. First Edition. With woodcuts by Luke Clennell. Fcap. 8vo, orig. bds., fresh back strip, uncut. Very scarce. Cadell, 1812. £2

It only proves that to booksellers (as to the rest of mankind) a little knowledge is a very dangerous commodity. To begin with, the title is incorrect. It should read "The Pleasures of Memory with other Poems," a new edition. What the bookseller has in mind is that the "first edition" with the Clennel cuts is valuable. So it is, and will no doubt appreciate. Only—it was published in 1810, not 1812. The 1812 is the second edition and worth about 5s. Probably the information was gleaned from Austin Dobson's essay contributed to Andrew Lang's "The Library" of 1881, where the 1810 edition is mentioned. Austin Dobson, in his appreciation of the book, makes a singular error. He states that the 1810 issue is known to collectors as the "Firebrand" edition. Since, however, the "Firebrand" cut did not appear in this issue the statement is obviously incorrect. It was omitted from the second edition of "The Library" published in 1892. I have a copy of this 1810 edition before me as I write. It is a large paper copy, and I know of few things more attractive than the delightful little pen-and-ink sketches of Stothard, so admirably translated to the wood by Luke Clennell.

Nearly every book list you pick up will blandly assure you that 1895 marks the date of the first illustrated edition of Du Maurier's "Trilby." To be fair I used to think so too, but having recently handled a copy with the familiar illustrations complete, but with a New York imprint, and the date 1894, I now know better.

In conclusion, I do not want it to appear that I have a grudge against booksellers. That would be untrue, for I have many close personal friends amongst them, and have generally received very fair treatment at their hands; but I do suggest that they do not always appear to cultivate the friendly atmosphere between themselves and their customers that obtains in most other businesses. If I can be proved wrong I shall be only too happy to admit my error.

H. T. Kirby.

We sent extracts from Mr. Kirby's interesting article to a number of booksellers, and print below a first instalment of the replies received.

Our practice has been to send catalogues to any address when requested to do so, and to keep on sending them, sometimes for years, until it is evident that the recipient is not a buyer of books; so that we think we belong to the first class of booksellers in your classification. In answer to your second question, we do not think that your contributor has any reason for feeling dissatisfied with those whom he calls the second and third classes of booksellers. The purpose of catalogues is to sell books, and, as catalogues cost a good deal of money to produce, it would surely be unreasonable for a collector to expect to receive them unless he makes at least some purchases.

A. W. Evans, for Elkin Mathews, Ltd. (London).

My custom is to issue a catalogue each month. These are sent to possible buyers, and should I not receive an order for twelve months, his name is struck off my mailing list. If, however, an order is received, he remains on my mailing list for a further two years, and is then put with what I call the Poor Buyers List, and gets an occasional catalogue, i.e., any copies that are left over after dispatching same to my regular clients. G. H. Last (Bromley, Kent).

My practice is to send catalogues when requested, and to place the applicant's name on my mailing list; if no order is received for three years, the name is removed from my list. P. M. Barnard (Tunbridge Wells).

Our custom is to issue one catalogue a year which we send regularly to a list of addresses which we have collected from time to time, regardless of whether the catalogue brings a return or not. We print on the envelope a request "If undelivered please return to George Over (Rugby) Ltd., 22, Market Place, Rugby," and when the returned envelopes are received we remove the name from the list.

G. E. Over (Rugby).

In reply to your interesting inquiry, we would say that we always send out our catalogues regularly whether purchases are made or not—and we find it pays!

Capell (London).

We have a regular mailing-list of about 2,000 names, all of whom receive our catalogues five or six times a year. As each catalogue costs us roughly fourpence, and one penny postage, we are making a present to these people of over two shillings a year each. Out of this list never more than a hundred people order books, and always the same people. Very occasionally a stray new order turns up, but generally for an insignificant book of some isolated interest. This year we were offered a list of 4,000 new names of self-styled book collectors. We sent them our catalogues, and we received about twenty orders, i.e. one for every two hundred names, and in every case for very small items. In sending this new list we enclosed slips, asking the recipients to notify us if they wished to receive further issues. Only some fifty people were sufficiently interested to reply. While we have no objection to sending our catalogues to scholars who are genuinely interested in old books, and in the information which a carefully-produced catalogue always affords, even if they are not purchasers, we are of opinion that the trade, in their own interests, should take some steps to insure that such catalogues, representing many months of bibliographical research, should not get into the hands of persons who idly toss them into the waste-paper basket without a glance. After twenty years' experience we are sadly convinced that the majority of requests for catalogues are lightly made by people who are at best catalogue collectors, but not book collectors.

Davis & Orioli (London).

All catalogues issued by us are sent to all our customers, where we have their address, irrespective of whether they buy or not, and new customers are treated in the same way. We only discontinue sending when the customer himself asks us to. A customer not seeing any book in one list that he requires may quite possibly require several out of a subsequent list, and as one usually sends out about seven or eight times as many catalogues as there are books in the list you can see that everyone cannot buy.

P. A. Cruden, The Little Bookshop (London).

My usual policy is to allow any applicant a certain number of catalogues and if that is not successful to discontinue sending them. I usually allow a period of two years. If a customer (?) does not order a book in that time then he is merely seeking for cheap information or free reading material! Arthur Rogers (Newcastle-on-Tyne).

There is of course the dealer's point of view in that he does not wish to send catalogues at expense with little hope of resultant business, and it is undeniable that some requests for catalogues are sent out of idle curiosity, or a desire merely to ascertain if anything happens to be included of value on the requestor's shelves. Our rule is to send six or eight catalogues, when, if no business or inquiry results, we cease to send. James Miles (Leeds).

We do not know H. T. Kirby and therefore speak with judicial impartiality, in saying there are also three classes of collectors.

I. Those who buy more or less regularly, to whom we gladly supply lists gratis as issued. Such buyers realise the heavy cost in skilled time, printing, and postage that catalogues involve.

II. Those who order only when they see an obvious and profitable bargain.

III. Those who never order, but need information gratis and at our expense. Such addresses are regularly weeded from register.

There are fourth and fifth classes, the banes of most antiquarian bookmen. These we need not describe.

Shakespeare Press (Stratford-on-Avon).

We send catalogues on application, gratis, and if requested we continue sending them without regard to orders received. Every two or three years our card index of addresses for catalogues is inspected, and those are deleted from which not a single order has been received.

"KIND HUNT."*

By Wilfrid Gibson.

THIS is a difficult world for poets and it takes most of them all their time to look after their own careers, the business of establishing themselves in the public estimation and of maintaining their precarious perch above the heads of the crowd is apt to absorb all their energies; or, rather, to put the matter more fairly, their intense concentration on the production of their poems leaves them little leisure for the consideration of the fate of others. Mr. Blunden, however, besides having been a Blue-coat boy like Leigh Hunt, has a chivalry in common with the subject of his long-expected and eagerly-awaited biography: he, too, has a sincere concern for the reputation of other poets and will spare no labour in their service; but, while Leigh Hunt exercised himself on behalf of neglected or ill-used contemporaries, Mr. Blunden is bent on the rehabilitation of the slighted shades of the lesser and half-forgotten poets of the Romantic Revival. His labours on behalf of John Clare having been crowned with success, he has now turned his attention to a poet of a very different calibre and a man of a very different character; and in this case he is more concerned to justify the character of the man than to rescue the poetry from the oblivion that has fallen on it. Mr. Blunden by no means despises Leigh Hunt's poetry, but we feel that he likes it mainly because he likes the man who wrote it.

Leigh Hunt, author of "Byron and His Contemporaries."

From "Leigh Hunt," by Edmund Blunden (Cobden-Sanderson).

The bad luck that dogged Leigh Hunt all his life did not desert him at the graveside. Through all his days he was the victim of misunderstanding or wilful misrepresentation; and, largely owing to the heedless action of one of his closest and most trusted friends, it would seem that his reputation will never be free from the taint of villainy it received when the innocent poet became the victim of a genius. Charles Dickens, unable to resist the temptation of tricking out one of his most despicable characters with some of the superficial affectations and absurd mannerisms of his friend, the readers of "Bleak House" concluded that the insufferable Skimpole was an authentic portrait of Hunt. How anybody could bring themselves to believe that the amiable, industrious and long-suffering Hunt was truly represented by that sponging waster and heartless scoundrel Harold Skimpole, passes comprehension. As Swinburne wrote in the Quarterly Review:

> "The simple and final reply should have been that indolence was the essential quality of the character and philosophy of Skimpole, and that Leigh Hunt was one of the hardest and steadiest workers on record, throughout a long and chequered life, at the toilsome trade of letters; and therefore to represent him as a heartless and shameless idler would have been as rational an enterprise, as life-like a design after life, as it would be to represent Shelley as a gluttonous, canting hypocrite, or Byron as a loyal and unselfish friend."

Dickens, too, did all that he could to destroy the legend that he had unwittingly created; and to make it plain that he had simply drawn on his friend for the more amusing and harmless characteristics of Skimpole,

* "Leigh Hunt: A Biography." By Edmund Blunden. Cobden-Sanderson. (21s. net.)

And yet that word "harmless" makes me pause. Hunt was no deliberate villain, yet there was undoubtedly something of Skimpole in his character; and I cannot help feeling that Dickens felt in his heart of hearts that some of these "harmless affectations" were not quite so harmless as they seemed. Mr. Blunden records a momentarily harsh, but evidently deeply felt, comment of Keats's on his friend: "Hunt does harm by making fine things petty and beautiful things hateful." And these words read almost like the comment of Dickens himself on one of his own more volatile characters. Dickens loathed æsthetical foppery as much as he loathed ethical foppery, and there was a deal of æsthetical foppery about Leigh Hunt. Dickens knew, too, from bitter experience, how uncertain is the line which divides the "unworldliness" of the impecunious, who live largely at the expense of their friends, from a selfish humbug, and how shadowy that which separates "idealism" from a deliberate shirking of responsibility. It is indeed difficult for the most sympathetic reader to believe that Leigh Hunt could be truly so blind to the realities of life as at times he would appear to have been. And was it for nothing that that soul of integrity, his brother John, turned his back on him in later life?

The truth of the matter is of course that Leigh Hunt was, like the rest of us, a bundle of contradictions. He worked as hard as an ant, and was at the same time a butterfly sipping honey from the flowers of—a very literary—Paradise. He was a man of principle with an incurable carelessness in money matters. He had the stuff of martyrs in him, and yet loved to dally among the roses of Eden. (The plethoric Haydon once said to him—"You would have been burned at the stake for a principle, and would have feared to put your feet in the mud.") He went to prison for his political principles, had his cell decorated like a bower, and forgot to pay the painters. A married man with a difficult wife (whose slackness in money matters was responsible, as Mr. Blunden makes clear, for much of the misrepresentation her husband endured), and a family that brought him grief and trouble, he remained in spirit an adolescent to the end. He knew every misfortune and suffered every indignity that the world has to offer us, and he persisted in regarding life through the spectacles of literature.

Yet there was one thing that he always saw clearly enough, and that was poetry. He was not a great poet, nor even a very good poet, himself; but he recognised a great poet when he saw him. Even foppery, that deadliest of vices because it tends to confuse the real values, could not blind him to the morning star of genius. So let us remember him as the friend and champion of poets, and of poets who had still to win a general recognition. He was indeed virtually the discoverer of Keats, Shelly and Tennyson, and their indefatigable champion to the end; and though, as a youth, he failed at first to appreciate the significance of Coleridge and Wordsworth, when his taste had matured he made noble amends. It was not his fault that the championship of a great poet by a minor poet may temporarily tend to confusion in the minds of the indiscriminating; and the fact that fools regarded Keats at first as nothing more than Leigh Hunt's pet pupil, does not detract from the ungrudging nobility and single-minded generosity of Hunt's intention. Hunt was indeed always the soul of generosity, and, with all his weaknesses, entirely without spiritual or intellectual pride. Like the hero of his best known poem he is most fittingly recorded as "one who loved his fellowmen."

I must not close this short notice without a tribute to the ardour and understanding with which Mr. Blunden has carried out his self-imposed labour of love. This is indeed a model biography, entirely without the superior airs and graces of the smart-Alec school, whose efforts to be amusing at the expense of their forefathers have made the reading of modern biographies the most distasteful job that falls to the lot of the reviewer. How the shade of Hunt must rejoice to have so noble a tribute from a poet, and from such a poet!

CHAUCER.

By Alfred Noyes.

II.

The beautiful edition of the works of Chaucer from the Shakespeare Press is now complete, and Messrs. Blackwell are to be congratulated on a production that will appeal to the reader of poetry as well as to the bibliophile.

In a former article, dealing with the "Canterbury Tales," I described the "Prologue" as Chaucer's greatest achievement; and, for similar reasons, one may say that the greatness of Chaucer elsewhere is to be found in the incidentals rather than in the finished structure and full body of his work. In his "Dream of Fair Women" Tennyson suggests the truth:

> "I read before mine eyelids dropt their shade
> 'The Legend of Good Women,' long ago
> Sung by the morning star of song, who made
> His music heard below,
> "Don Chaucer, the first warbler, whose sweet breath
> Preluded those melodious bursts that fill
> The spacious times of great Elizabeth
> With sounds that echo still."

There is excellent criticism concealed in those lines. Chaucer was, above all things, a maker of preludes—preludes to narrative, preludes to character painting, the first vital touches of portraiture, and preludes to the confident and full-fledged lyricism of the Elizabethans. Tennyson does not tell us how far he read in the "Legend of Good Women" before his eyelids "dropt their shade"; but it is certain that Chaucer's own eyelids drooped long before he had completed his own plan for the poem. Of the nineteen women whose heroic stories he proposed to tell, he has dealt with only nine; and by far the most beautiful part of the work is again the prologue, and the great incidental ballade on Alceste, in which again we seem to hear the Muse of English lyrical poetry, trying over the first notes of the fuller song, and listening with eager ears to her elder sister of France.

The lines that lead up to it are among the most pictorial in English verse; and in themselves are a sufficient answer to the latter-day suggestion that colour must be left to the brush of the painter, and should be ignored by the artist in words. Nothing could be more natural and spontaneous than Chaucer's use of colour, though this is again one of the "incidentals," and a strong case could be made out for him as the greatest master of colour in English poetry up to the arrival of Keats. Colour in poetry is not merely a matter of the direct use of the names of colours. Even more than in painting its beauty depends on what of the decorative quality of Botticelli's "Birth of Venus," is Chaucer's picture of the God of Love walking in a meadow with his Queen :

> "And she was clad in real habite grene,
> A fret of gold she haddè next her heer,
> And upon that a whitè crowne she beer
> With flourouns smalè, and I shall not lye
> For all the world ryght as a daysye

Canterbury Pilgrims at the Tabard Inn, Southwark.
(Corbould.)

> Y-corouned is with whitè levès lyte
> So were the flourouns of hire coroune white." . . .

Swedenborg would have called "correspondences" with the world of the intellect and the spirit. A notable example of this is the passage in "Macbeth" :

> "This my hand will rather
> The multitudinous seas incarnadine
> Making the green one red."

Another example, rising even more clearly into the realms of the spirit and leaving the colour terms completely behind, even while it suggests the colours themselves in their richest life, is the passage in Keats's "Ode on Melancholy" :

> "Then glut thy sorrow on a morning rose,
> Or on the rainbow of the salt sand-wave,
> Or on the wealth of globed peonies ;
> Or if thy mistress some rich anger shows,
> Emprison her soft hand, and let her rave
> And feed deep, deep upon her peerless eyes."

What sullen crimsons, warm snows, dark iridescences of tears are hidden and suggested in the alchemy of that indirect association of peonies and anger, tears, and the rainbow of the salt estranging sea. It is a masterpiece of colour, worthy of Titian.

More direct but not less beautiful, and with something

And what a picture is that of the god, Love himself, clothed in embroidered silk, fretted with red rose leaves and green sprays, the freshest since the world was first begun ; a sun, instead of gold, crowning his golden hair, so that the beholder could scarce look upon the brightness of his face, or see clearly the fiery darts that he carried, between his wings, outspread like the wings of an angel. After him came that radiant throng of women whose names have been his chief praise ; and, round the Flower of his delight they sang "carol-wise" the ballad in which he sets the beauty of the death-conquering spirit, as manifested in Alcestis, above all other .

> 'Hyde, Absalon, thy giltè tresses clere ;
> Ester, ley thou thy mekeness al adoun ;
> Hyde, Jonathas, al thy frendly manere ;
> Penalopee, and Marcia Catoun,
> Make of youre withode no comparysoun ;
> Hyde ye youre beautès, Ysoude and Eleyne ;
> My lady comith, that al this may disteyne."

This beautiful ballade is the pagan complement to the "Invocation" in the "Second Nun's Tale," where Chauçer made the opening lines of the thirty-third canto of the "Paradiso" of Dante an enduring part of our English heritage. There are depths in that Invocation which have never yet been fathomed :

> " Thou mayde and mooder, doghter of thy sone,
> Thou well of mercy, synful soulés cure,
> In whom that God, for bountee, chees to wone,
> Thou humble, and heigh over every creature,
> Thou nobledest so ferforth our nature
> That no dèsdeyn the Makere hadde of kynde
> His sone in blood and flessh to clothe and wynde."

And it contains one superb exception to the rule that Chaucer does not write great single lines,

> " Assembled is in thee magnificence."

There is almost an anticipation of Crashaw here. But this Invocation, too, is incidental, and obviously not written for its setting.

In the " House of Fame," again, the first two parts are almost negligible as poetry, while the third (again opening with an invocation from Dante) is one of the finest examples of Chaucer's satirical power in poetry, and remains (yet again) an unfinished fragment. Nothing more true or more contemptuous has ever been written on that notoriety which is so commonly confounded with the real values of true fame. The good and the wise arrive at the House of Fame and achieve it, often against their will. The worthless arrive, ask for it, and receive it in even fuller measure. Again, the good and the wise arrive, and are driven away into oblivion. And again, the worthless arrive and, by the whim of the goddess, are blown into oblivion too. Caprice rules in that land, and nothing but caprice can be counted upon. It was in the faith that inspired his invocation that Chaucer found his permanent values and the power to defy caprice. He had a fortress in his own spirit, and he walked upon a sure though invisible road to the " land of matters unforgot." It was in this certainty that he was able to say in one of the finest of his minor poems :

> " This wrecchèd worldès transmutacion
> As wele or wo, now poure and now honour,
> Withouten ordre or wys discretion
> Governèd is by Fortunes errour ;
> But nathèles the lak of hir favour
> Ne may not don me singen, though I dye
> 'J'ay tout perdu mon temps et mon labour'
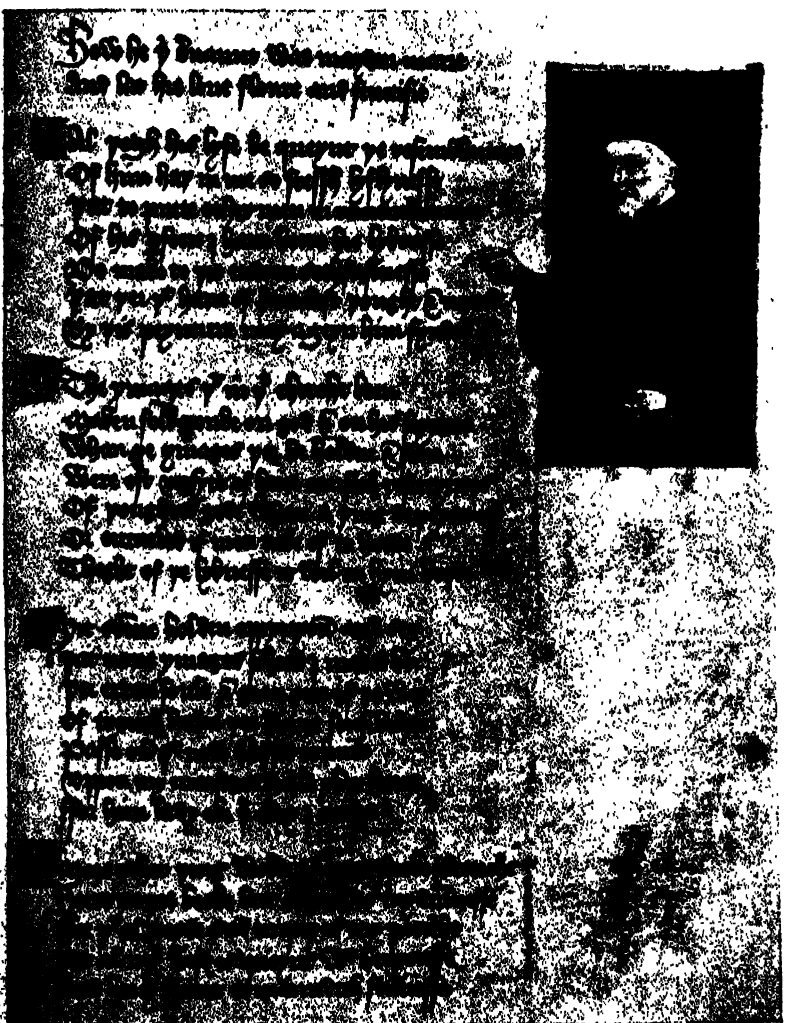
> For fynally, Fortune, I thee defye."



The refrain of his " Balade de Bon Conseyl " is the secret undertone of all his joyous music.

It is only when a man has achieved that nobler carelessness that he enters into the kingdom of real values in life and poetry, or is able, in Chaucer's phrase, to " hold the high way " with a song, and let his ghost lead him into that heavenly Spring of which all earthly springs are but prophetic shadows. It was so that Chaucer, the most joyous of all the pilgrims of eternity, took earthly beauty as his viaticum, and sang back to the birds in the wayside hedgerows :

> " Now welcom, somer, with thy sonnè softe
> That hast this wintre's weders over-shake
> And driven away the longe nyghtès blake ;
> " Saynt Valentyn, that art full hy on lofte
> Thus syngen smalè foulès for thy sake
> Now welcom, somer, with thy sonnè softe
> That hast this wintre's weders over-shake."

This delicious air, anticipating in the little shiver of the additional syllable (the third) of the third line, the full breeze of our later lyric music with its " syllabic equivalences," is yet again only an incident in the " Parlement of Foules," perhaps the most delightful of all the minor poems. But the " Parlement of Foules " is really the exception proving the rule that Chaucer's beauties are incidental. It is an exquisitely finished and joyous work ; and the one to which (outside the prologue to the " Canterbury Tales ") the reader can return most frequently with the fullest pleasure. Human laughter there m i n g l e s with the music of the birds, and his earthly garden is none the less Paradisal in its light and colour and suggestion of the deeper inner tones :

> " A garden saw I ful of blosmy bowès
> Upon a river in a grenè mede,
> There as ther sweetness evermore y now is

The earliest known portrait of Chaucer.

Geoffrey Chaucer.

From a manuscript copy, on vellum, of "The Canterbury Tales," adorned with marginal paintings, in the possession of the Marquis of Stafford.

With flourès white, blewè, yelwe and rede,
And coldè wellè-strèmès, nothyng dede,
That swimmen ful of smalè-fischès lighte
With fynnès rede and scalès silver-brighte.

"On every bough the briddès herde I synge
With voys of aungel in her armonye. . . .

"Of instruments of stringès in acord
Herde I so pleye a ravisshyng sweetnesse
That God, that Maker is of all and Lord,
Ne herde never better, as I gesse ; . . .

"The air of that place so attemprè was
That never was grevaunce of hoot ne cold ;
There wex eek every holsom spice and grass
Ne no man may ther wexè seek nor old,
Yit was there joyè more a thousand fold
Than man can tell ; ne never wolde it nyght,
But any cleer day to any mannès sighte."

It was no more than a dream-land, as he speedily goes on to show ; but, when the song of the birds was over, as he says, he woke, and began to read in other books, and read on always, in the hope that some day he would meet a reality whereby he should fare the better, "and thus to read I will not spare."

It is greatly to be hoped that this beautiful new edition of Chaucer will encourage others to read on also.

THE ENGLISH NOVEL.*

By Hugh I'A. Fausset.

WE live in a formless age and it is natural therefore that fiction should be our most practised and most popular art. For it imposes, or seems to impose, the lightest discipline upon a writer and has indeed become a sort of dumping ground for private confessions, public pamphl teering, psychoanalysis, sexual melodrama and social research. The licence of the modern novelist is however due to the fact that he is living and working in a period of transition not only in human life, but in his particular art. Until late in the nineteenth century the tradition still held, if somewhat precariously in England, that the prime function of a novelist was to tell a story, to unfold a plot, and to reveal characters at least as much by their outward action as their inward thought and sentiments. But gradually, as analysis has eaten into life and Dostoievsky has supplanted Dickens, the novelist has become more and more preoccupied with the inward drama of personality, with mental, emotional and spiritual events which are not necessarily externalised in action and which are unified by their own subtle logic rather than by that of a plot. In thus abandoning however the structural support of an objective narrative many modern novelists have collapsed into formless subjectivism and the surprising acclamation accorded to such a novelist as Mr. R. H. Mottram is doubtless due to the fact that although his treatment of life is superficial and external, he does at least try to be impersonal and objective. In this attempt however he is only following the lead of a number of writers who during the last forty years have acted upon the conception that fiction was not expansive story-telling, but an art, demanding as much austerity as any other art, and that the novel, in Mr. Ford's words, "was a vehicle by means of which every kind of psychological or scientific truth connected with human life and affairs could be very fittingly conveyed." This conception came to England from France. To quote Mr. Ford again : "It was Flaubert who most shiningly practised the doctrine of the novelist as Creator who should have a Creator's aloofness, rendering the world as he sees it, altering no comments, falsifying no issues and carrying the subject—the affair—he has selected for rendering, remorselessly out to its logical conclusions." And Mr. Ford's refreshingly provocative survey of the English novel from the Elizabethan age to the present day is governed by his preference for the novel of aloofness, of which Richardson, who "did have an artistic convention of sorts, did try in some way to render life, did deal almost exclusively in neither very moral nor very immoral personages," was the pioneer. And it is by this standard that he measures the virtues and defects of Defoe, Fielding and Smollett, and considers "Oliver Twist" as "the beginning of the end, the novel becoming the vehicle for the reform of abuses." That he is often prejudiced by his dislike of "Anglo-Saxondom" (possibly this accounts for his neglect of Jane Austen), and that he fails to distinguish between the writer who is inspired by true moral values and who is inflamed or distracted by the moral temper of his day, is certain. Nor does he sufficiently recognise that undue attention to manner, to which the Aloof novelist is often prone, may stultify art just as much as undue attention to matter or morals. But although we may not share all his raptures over the technical efforts of Flaubert, Maupassant, Turgenev, Henry James, Henry Harland and George Moore, his essay is equally valuable for the disagreement and the agreement which it provokes. Above all it is a craftsman's essay, at once experienced and curious of experiment.

Miss Clemence Dane does not share Mr. Ford's dislike for the morals of the English gentleman. Indeed she comes near making him, under the guise of "the Plain Man in the Street," her criterion of value. This "Plain Man" whose interest almost all the great writers of the past have, in her view, won, is borrowed from a statement of belief by Mr. Hugh Walpole, and at the beginning of her essay is located in his nursery. Here Miss Dane finds three main types of child readers—the romantics, who satisfy their sense of wonder on fairy tales or the "Arabian Nights"; the moralists, who are attracted by the Bible and for whom virtue must be crowned and vice be punished; and the realists, who like autobiography and will not have fairies, even on a desert island. And, in her opinion, the typical English novel, which she calls "the traditive novel," has been the result of innumerable responses to the demand for a blend of these three types. Armed with this preconception, she proceeds to survey the English novel from the time of the folk-tale until the present day, and although at times facts in the form of one element of her synthesis put considerable strain upon her theory, she succeeds with much plausibility in preserving it intact until the late War, which "broke in two the life of the nation" and "did exactly the same to the life of literature." Hence on the one hand there is a "pre-war group of writers either revered as 'classic' or derided as Victorian," on the other a group of disintegrators and experimenters whose aim "seems to be to disperse the novel's parts once more, and this in the name of Realism." Hence also the temporary bewilderment or distress of the "Gentle Reader," whom however Miss Dane hastens to comfort by directing to the works of Mr. Hugh Walpole, in which, she assures him, he will find the blend so agreeable to his taste, "the old-fashioned tale with the innovation in idea which modernises it, which turns the traditional into the traditive novel."

Miss Dane's detailed study of Mr. Walpole's novels is charmingly sympathetic, but, like her formula, it lacks real critical penetration. That her appreciation is generous may be suggested by her description of "Harmer John" as "a book so moving that I am half afraid to put down the degree of admiration I feel for it, lest its beauty be cheapened by easy praise." But it is, alas! so much easier to be generous than just.

W. L. COURTNEY.

By Arthur Waugh.

Mrs. Courtney has written a book which no one else could have written;* and only those of us who knew her husband best can appreciate the value and fidelity of her record. Courtney wrote his own autobiography; but, as his wife says, he did not do himself justice. He was trained from boyhood in that decent school of personal reticence, in which many of his pupils would be proud to follow him; he had learnt and taught that among the things which are "not done" in the company of the self-respecting, the very first weaknesses to be subdued are self-praise and the celebration of one's own career. So while "The Passing Hour" contained many intimate and poignant touches relating to its author's youth, and plenty of kindly humour and character, it said almost nothing about the thirty-four years during which Courtney was editor of the Fortnightly Review, and paid no kind of tribute to the wide interests and keen judgment which rendered his editorship one of the most notable achievements in contemporary journalism. That gap in the literary history of our time Mrs. Courtney has now filled with a brief, compact and searching monograph which deserves to be acclaimed as a model of its kind. The portrait is irradiated with sympathy, but it does not disdain the duties of friendly criticism. Unlike most tributes of wifely piety, it presents the figure of a living man, and not a marble statue. It is as sensitive in humour as in interpretation; and it also offers, by way of background, a concise history of the Fortnightly Review, under all its editors, a history which will remain the final authority upon a subject of very real significance.

In calling her book "The Making of an Editor," Mrs. Courtney suggests implicitly that all the rest of her husband's life was a sort of preparation and training for the editorial chair, and that he was particularly happy in finding his natural occupation while still a comparatively young man, and of keeping it unbroken until his death. I think she is right in this. Courtney was certainly more at ease as editor than he can ever have been as schoolmaster or as don. My own recollection of him goes back to 1876, when I was a small boy at a dame-school in Bath. Just below St. Stephen's Church, Lansdown, a tall man with a military moustache was climbing the steep hill, with a schoolboy on either side of him. "That's Courtney," said my companion; "head master of Somersetshire College"; and, as he spoke, Courtney patted the back of one of the boys, who was faltering in the uphill climb. That picture has often recurred to my memory as a sort of allegory. The road was uphill most of the way in Courtney's life; but he was always cheerful and always encouraging to his fellow-climbers.

It was nearly ten years later that I next saw him, when, on my first morning at New College, Oxford, he sent for me to say that he was to be my tutor, and proceeded to lay down a synopsis of my future reading. From that time until the end of his life hardly a month passed without our meeting or exchanging letters; for he left Oxford to join the literary staff of the Daily Telegraph the term after I took my degree; and, when I started life as publisher and journalist, he never missed an opportunity of giving me encouragement and help. It was owing to him that I went to Chapman & Hall as managing director, and that I was enlisted on the reviewing staff of the Daily Telegraph. And as he treated me, so he treated everyone in whom he took an interest. He was the most generous of friends, and the versatility of his interests gathered him friends from all classes of the intellectual community—writers, actors, artists, politicians, philosophers and men of science.

This vivid versatility was his prevailing characteristic; it was also his greatest danger as a schoolmaster and a don. Already at Bath, when he was a head master in his early twenties, parents were beginning to grow a little suspicious of his presence at theatres and dances; while at Oxford there were not wanting grave and reverend frowns when Irving was invited to lecture at the Sheldonian, and Toole brought to the high table in New College Hall! With a few cheery exceptions, Senior Common room considered Courtney too closely identified with undergraduate interests. He was treasurer of the Boat Club, virtual founder of the Dramatic Society, himself an actor, a dancer and a contributor to the London press. When he stood for the Professorship of Logic, the mandarins preferred a man whom they believed to be a more solid candidate. Courtney concluded that the time had come to leave Oxford; and being introduced by Dr. Robson Roose to the proprietor of the Daily Telegraph, he exchanged the dreaming cloisters of New College for the thunders of Peterborough Court.

Portrait by Elliott & Fry

W. L. Courtney.

The quiet humour which plays across Mrs. Courtney's pages is at its best in her description of the circumstances of this astonishing change. She relates how Oxford greeted the news, with a dismay that was apologetic and ashamed; and how Sir Edwin Arnold set the author of the "Life of John Stuart Mill" a task which was to test his ability by "two or three characteristic specimens of his pen"! The subjects chosen were—(1) The Present State of Parties in England. (2) Tulips and Tulip Shows; and the candidate for editorial honours was counselled to employ "three paragraphs—beginning, middle and end—the opening of the leader more or less arranged to catch attention, and the language as refined and correct as possible, but not so as to be above the heads of the million for whom we write." Courtney must have laughed in the sleeve of his gown; but apparently he did not write too high above "the million's" head. For he got the post, and came up to London and its fogs in the January of 1890, to work there for more than thirty-eight years with an energy that never faltered, and a popularity that continually increased. There can be no doubt at all that he was an immense asset to his paper. He was a figurehead with knowledge, he put all the world at its ease; and nobody was happier in smoothing over those difficulties and misunderstandings which are bound to arise in the day's work.

He had been five years in London when Frederic Chapman offered him the editorship of the Fortnightly Review, which had then seen thirty years of life under four different editors, and was now to remain in Courtney's undivided charge for another thirty-four. As his wife very shrewdly says, the Review, when he took it over, was "in no need of stimulation, but it was in considerable need of steadying"; and his was just the hand to give it the support desired. From the very first, the editor's biographer was associated with him as assistant and reader; and though she takes no credit to herself for any of the achievements of Courtney's editorship, the truth slips through the meshes of her reticence every now and then. It was she for instance who first "spotted" the quality of Mr. J. L. Garvin, then an unknown journalist in Newcastle, and in the course of sifting manuscripts she made many another shrewd discovery. But of course the breadth of the interests consulted was due, first and last, to Courtney's own receptivity; he had all the journalist's scent for a good theme, and he always preferred a sound article to a showy name. There was never a taint of snobbery about his choice of contributors; he went for the good thing, whoever wrote it; and the long list of writers who served under his banner may be said to include almost every considerable authority who lent distinction to the thought and policy of the last thirty years.

In the final chapter Mrs. Courtney remarks, with a flash of intimate insight, upon the good fortune which has attended the Fortnightly in "the singular suitability of each editor to his period" . . . "Who better than Morley could have waged the battle for free-thought in the fighting seventies?" But what would Morley "have made of the brilliant, slightly decadent, purely literary period, which Harris so faithfully represented, except perhaps to denounce it?" As for Courtney, "he had not Morley's strength of purpose; he impressed his own personality less upon his contributors—he did not seek so to impress it; but he touched life at many more points, and his sympathies were wider." He represented the newer journalism, opening gates of knowledge and of taste to a fresh and importunate public. He took learning and judgment out into the open; he made them attractive and appealing; he set out to serve the public, and the public rallied round him with a will

CHARLES II AS A MAN OF LETTERS.

By Arthur Bryant.

THE life of Charles II offered few opportunities for the pursuit of letters. For the dark, romantic prince, born in the old Palace of St. James's three hundred years ago, was tossed before he was twelve into a world of battle, exile and poverty, and only returned to a settled existence when his youth was over and his habits formed. Even in his brief and troubled childhood Charles was given little encouragement to read. "Take heed," wrote his first tutor, Newcastle, husband of Lamb's "thrice-noble Margaret Newcastle," "of too much book" It was advice of which Charles had little need, and at the end of his life, Dryden, who knew him well, testified that he understood men better than letters.

> "His conversation, wit and parts,
> His knowledge in the noblest, useful arts
> Were such dead authors could not give.
> . . . . . .
> He drained from all, and all they knew,
> His apprehensions quick, his judgment true,
> That the most learned must with shame confess
> His knowledge more, his reading only less"

Yet if literature be the expression of an acute or beautiful mind, he is not too bold an explorer who would seek for it in Charles. For his sayings, recorded by those who lived with him, have as much the ring of true style as those of Johnson and Sidney Smith. "It is odd," he remarked at a time when some new informer was every day astounding the English public with stories of blood-curdling plots, "how all my friends seem to keep by them some tame rogue"; and when Oates, that most universal villain, offered to pray for him, his simple comment was: "I would not have God mocked." And what could be neater than his portrayal (so loved by Horace Walpole) of a tedious Anglican divine: "That he was a very honest man but a great blockhead; that he had given him a living in Suffolk swarming with nonconformists; that he had gone from house to house and brought them all to church; that he had made him a bishop for his diligence; but what he could have said to the nonconformists he could not imagine, except he believed that his nonsense suited their nonsense"

The truth of the matter is that Charles had a genius for self-expression. His remarks have just that vital touch of personality that marks the master of style. Nor when we turn from his spoken to his written word are we disappointed. The son of the man, who solaced his captivity by reading Shakespeare, had an unconscious gift for literature Unhappily he was lazy and, being a king, had little incentive to overcome that aversion which the lazy man, however gifted, feels to putting pen to paper—"the naturall lazinesse I have towards writting," as Charles calls it. Consequently his letters, other than the official variety written by his secretaries, are rare, and it was but seldom that any of his subjects could boast, as one did in 1670, of "a most gracious letter from his Majesty, all writt with his owne hand."

Yet we all have our intimate moments, and kings are no exception to this rule It is in the letters Charles wrote to those he loved most that we find the writer. The first recorded example was written at the age of nine to his tutor: "My Lord, I would not have you take too much phisik, for it doth allwaies make me worse and I think it will do the like with you I ride every day and am ready to follow any other directions from you Make haste to returne to him that loves you —Charles P." Already, in the childlike lines, there are traces of the man's essential style—the forceful brevity, the quiet mocking humour turning inward to ridicule itself, the warm affection, given so rarely and yet so freely when it was

The penniless years of exile offer few letters, yet there are one or two that prove how staunch was Charles's gaiety "I am just now," he wrote, "beginning this letter in my sister's chamber, where there is such a noise that I never hope to end it and much less to write sense I shall only tell you that we are now thinking how to passe our time, and in the first place of dancing, in which we find two difficultyes, the one for want of the fiddlers, the other for somebody to teach the new dances I have gott my sister to send for Silvius as one that is able to performe both; for the fidledies my Lord Taafe does promise to be their convoy, and in the meantime we must content ourselves with those that make no difference between a hymn and a coranto."

Charles's claim as a writer rests mainly on a series of ninety-eight letters which he wrote to his sister, Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans. In these the true Charles lives, witty, frank and affectionate. For Charles loved his sister as he loved no other creature. To him she was always "My deare, deare sister," and he a "brother that loves you more than he can express." "I assure you," he writes, "there is nothing I love so well as my dearest Minette." To please this sweet princess, for whom Molière wrote and Bossuet preached, Charles painted, in his direct, easy style, the life of the coloured court of vagabonds over which he presided: "We had a designe to have had a masquerade heere, but were not able to goe through with it, not having one man that would make a tolerable entry. I have been perswading the Queene to follow the Queene Mother of France's example and goe in masquerade before the carnavall be done; I beleeve it were worth seeing my Lord St. Albans" (who had a fiery face and was immensely fat) "in such an occasion. My wife hath given a good introduction to such a businesse, for the other day she made my Lord Aubigny and two of her chaplins dance country dances in her bedchamber. I am just now calld for to goe to the Play, soe can say no more." And what could be more delightful than his reference to the seventeenth century plague of long sermons: "We have the same disease of sermons that you complaine of, but I hope you have the same convenience that the rest of the family has of sleeping out most of the time, which is a great ease to those who are bound to hear them." Or the reference to the distinguished French astrologer, who visited him at Newmarket and "lost his money upon confidence that the starrs could tell which horse would winn, for he had the ill luck to foretell three times wrong together, and James beleeved him so much as he lost his money upon the same score." Indeed, Charles's comment on this "profett" reveals the true Philosopher King: "I give little credit to such kinde of cattle, and the lesse you do it the better, for if they could tell anything 'tis inconvenient to know one's fortune beforehand, good or bad, and so, my dearest sister, good night."

King Charles the Second (ob. 1685).
From the original of Sir Peter Lely, in the collection of the Most Noble the Marquis of Hertford.

It has been said that Charles sold England. Yet in matters relating to the sea and trade, he would never allow the least derogation of the dignity and interest of his country, and when he chose could speak in the accents of Elizabeth herself: "There is nobody desires more to have a strict frindship with the King of France than I do, but I will never buy of it upon dishonourable termes, and I thanke God my condition is not so ill, but that I can stand upon my own leggs and beleeve that my frindship is as valuable to my neighbours as theirs is to me." And when war threatened and passions ran high, he could ride the whirlwind with a grace and confidence worthy of Palmerston: "The States keep a great bragging and noise, but I beleeve when it comes to it they will looke twise before they leape. I never saw so greate an appetite to a warre as is in both this towne and country, espetially in the Parlament men, who, I am confident would pawne their estates to maintaine a warre. But all this shall not governe me, for I will looke merely to what is just and best for the honour and good of England, and will be very steady in what I resolve, and if I be forsed to a warre, I shall be ready with as good ships and men as ever was seene and leave the successe to God."

Charles never conquered the aversion to pursuing the art for which he was so well fitted, but in his old age read much and took a considerable interest in literature. He would often talk to Dryden and on one occasion offered that great man his advice. "If I were a poet," he said, and then, with an exquisite courtesy to put his friend at his ease—"and I am sure I am poor enough to be one—I would write such and such a thing." Before he died he dictated to Pepys the story of that miraculous escape which, a hunted fugitive, he had made thirty years before. Let one passage, describing how he crossed a Shropshire river by night with his humble guide, Richard Penderell, suffice. Penderell, fearless till that moment, confessed that he could not swim and was afraid. "So I told him that the river being but a little one, I would undertake to help him over. Upon which we went over some closes to the river side, and I, entering the river first to see whether I could myself go over, found it was but a little above my middle and, thereupon, taking Richard Penderell by the hand, I helped him over." In the direct simplicity of the narrative there is a touch of Bunyan and Mr. Valiant-for-Truth's passage of that other river, even though there are no trumpets on the other side.

LITTLE ISLAND.

A Novel of St. Helena.

By LEONARD COOPER. 7s. 6d. (Hodder & Stoughton)

This novel is an original essay in historical fiction. Napoleon, Sir Hudson Lowe St. Helena and five average days of the life there—that is all. But Mr. Cooper builds up a wonderful picture of the clash between the Emperor and the nerve-racked, over-conscientious Governor, with vivid characterisations of the men around Napoleon: Doctor O'Meara, Generals Bertrand, Gourgaud and Montholon. There are glimpses of captive and jailer at their best and worst, memories of the Emperor's great days, a sad picture of boredom, intrigue, petty jealousies. "Little Island" is a fair and vivid reconstruction of the past. There are many startling moments when Napoleon lives and moves in these pages. Lovers of Napoleon and students of history cannot neglect this moving book.

BUSHMAN BURKE.

By JEAN DEVANNY. 7s. 6d. (Duckworth.)

Taipo of Bushman Burke, as his name indicates, is a native of the wilds, in this case the sub-tropical bush and timber land at the back of Wellington, New Zealand. Coming suddenly into a fortune of £200,000, he journeys to the city to see lawyer Wallace. In a remarkably short space of time he falls in love with Wallace's daughter Flo, and trouble begins The girl is ultra-modern, apparently shallow, and entirely self-centred. Her father even disclaims any affection for her. She has what she would describe as "a hectic time" and "goes the pace" to the fullest extent. After a brief and breezy time Burke marries her, and the book becomes a series of matrimonial episodes. Only two endings seem possible, and the reader's interest is bound to be sustained wondering which of the two it will be.

LITERATURE AND HISTORY.*

By Herbert E. Palmer.

Under review are two books by scholars and specialists in history, the first of them an extended reprint of a book already valued. "Clio, A Muse," by George Macaulay Trevelyan (Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge), is a collection of essays of a very informing character dealing, for the most part, with subjects relative to history. They do not, in the least, invite adverse criticism, though it may be necessary to state that being in style a little too reminiscent of Addison they occasionally create an atmosphere which does not well suit the period dealt with. But in an age (this age) when essays are frequently little more than glorified journalese, meagre in content, careless in construction, and superficial in thought, these essays do strike a note which may be listened to with profit. While every now and again Professor Trevelyan startles us by something penetratingly well said, as when (speaking of Northumberland) he writes: "Like all the greatest things, like the universe itself, this land does not easily yield up the truth, whether its secret heart is of joy or of sorrow. It heightens both till they are fused and the dispute between them loses meaning. The great silence is too profound to be broken with a question."

Two or three of the essays strike me as being very valuable, the one called "The Middle Marches" a masterpiece of insight and information. For it is not only an enchanting essay in topography but gives us, through the telescope of the ballad, a remarkably clear view of the far-receded life of the wild freebooters of the Border Country. The essay called "Poetry and Rebellion" focuses the age of Byron, and should be read by all who have delighted in Maurois's "Life of Byron," for it epitomises and emphasises certain things which Maurois has left a little too straggling. Very few things in Professor Trevelyan's book are challengeable, though when, in his essay "History and Fiction," he writes of Stevenson's "Lodging for the Night" that it gives us "the real character of Villon" one can unhesitatingly say "No." Stevenson's tale succeeds brilliantly as a tale about a scholar thief, a mediæval Ishmaelite and one type of "goliard"; but the picture of him is only half the real Villon, for it omits his virtues and his gloomy ecstasies and genius, leaves them right out of the canvas.

"The European Heritage," by Watson Kirkconnell, is much broader in scope than George Trevelyan's book, and is not so much of the class which constitutes literature as that which helps and disseminates literature, a ministering angel aureoled with selflessness, so that you may call it a "glorified textbook," or anything patronising you like without sullying its clear quality and usefulness or insulting the author who is free from all affectation and pretentiousness. Actually it is a sort of short encyclopædia of literature and art, or, as the writer sub-terms it, "A Synopsis of European Cultural Achievement." It is the sort of book which ought to be in every editor's office and on the shelf of every teacher of literature and history; a book for reference, and yet nevertheless a book to wile away the time, for it is astonishing how so much jostling information about painters, scientists, musicians, poets, dramatists and novelists has been made readable and interesting. But that is because Watson Kirkconnell has avoided the ordinary textbook manner and managed to put glow and vitality into his crowded pages. Moreover, he introduces his sheaves of facts about celebrities by more or less trustworthy information about the beginnings of the race to which they belong, giving us also a short history of the race's development. Here indeed is a book which might be nicknamed "The Cultural Handbook of the League of Nations," assuming, as it does, that national animosities are utterly preposterous. "Ignorance is the mother of Intolerance," says Watson Kirkconnell. "Most of the bitter prejudices which to-day poison the relationship of nation with nation and of race with race spring primarily from lack of knowledge." True indeed, but most nations which go to war fight for land and money and do not trouble themselves about cultural heritage. It is only too easy for the governing classes to hoodwink the masses for the simple reason that the masses are fed on newspapers and cheap sentimental booklets, caring little or nothing about cultural heritage. If every newspaper in Europe would devote a column to this little volume (and they certainly won't do anything so wise or foolish), baptising themselves with its grace, and ever after devoting a page a day to reviews of books and discussions on art and literature with their international relationships, more would be done in the way of putting an end to war than is possible by the mouths of prelates and state orators.

Mr. Watson Kirkconnell's book contains chapters on the Eastern Slavs, the Western Slavs, the Southern Slavs, the Finno-Ugrians, the Jews, the French, the Germans, the Scandinavians, the Italians, the Celts, the English, the Spaniards, and others. One of his best chapters is on the Jews—sympathetic, enthusiastic, critical, condemnatory. "History," he says, "provides no parallel to the long-persisting vitality of the Jewish people coupled with a profound contribution to world-civilisation. Ancient Greek science, philosophy and art were more exaltedly important, but the glory of Hellas was of brief duration compared with the enduring strength of Hebraism. . . . But these incomparable ethics of the later prophets took a long time to develop. A strain of barbaric savagery mingled with religious zeal in many of their earlier leaders. Samuel butchered women and children in the name of God; David's dying words ordered a foul murder that he himself had sworn not to commit; Solomon was a sensual super-polygamist; and many a frenzied psalmist dreamt with horrid joy of the dashing out of alien children's brains against the walls of captured towns." He goes on to tell us how in mediæval times the Jews were thwarted and persecuted, adding most wisely: "The traits of mind and life which to-day make the Jew so frequently disliked are the result not of race but of the organised repression, ignominy and torment wreaked upon them for long centuries by those who professed allegiance to the Prince of Peace and King of Love" Yet these same Jews in the case of their own philosopher Spinoza became the persecutors, expelling this angel of Hebriac light from their synagogues.

But it must not be supposed that Mr. Kirkconnell's book is a jewel heap of perfection. Many essential names have been omitted; and these ought to be inserted in the reprint which is likely to come quickly. Although in the section on modern Irish literature Mr. Kirkconnell includes Yeats, Lord Dunsany, Douglas Hyde and Sir Horace Plunkett, he omits the very important dramatists Synge and Sean O'Casey; he omits the archæologist and story-teller Standish O'Grady and the poet and romantic prose writer James Stephens. He also calls "Æ" by his right name (George Russell) instead of by his generally accepted nom de plume (Æ), which is nearly as bad a mistake as calling George Eliot by her natural name of Marian Evans. And in the two sections on Scottish literature no modern writers are mentioned at all save Stevenson and Barrie.

But these are mere dust motes. Considering its self-imposed limitations of "tip and run," the book is astonishingly comprehensive, one of the finest little volumes of cultural information published for years.

RESULTS OF COMPETITIONS FOR JUNE.

I.—THE PRIZE OF ONE GUINEA for the best original lyric is awarded to Esther Raworth, 6, Pannal Ash Road, Harrogate, Yorks, for the following:

TWO SONGS.

This is all my yearning, this my deep heart's delight—
To hear bird-song at morning
 and the sea-song at night!
Bird-song in the cool dawn when in freshest glory green Tall trees stand lapped in primrose-foam and the drooping hyacinth's sheen;
Pure music from the cherry-bough whose drifts on drifts of snow
Flake down in pearly showers as the thrush flits to and fro;
And the golden flute-like lilting, pouring love's ecstatic pain,
Of the blackbird from the thicket veiled in swirls of sunlit rain—
O Powers that scatter largess, give me for my heart's delight
To hear bird-song at morning and the sea-song at night!

For from far away at twilight, when the land is locked in rest, Comes a strange and luring whisper from the rose and opal west;
Purple waves are plashing softly in a silken, secret tune,
And the low-voiced breezes answer to the same mysterious rune;
And the lone sea-gull crying, wheeling round on flashing wings
In a magic silver circle, vague yet burning longing brings,
And the whole wide heaven is murmuring like a mighty harp of gold,
Breathing wistful peace and guerdon, dreams and hopes yet hardly told!—
O hidden gods of happiness, give me, for soul's delight,
To hear bird-song at morning
 and the sea-song at night!

TO A BUTTERCUP.

Pure cup of gold, what thoughts you bring,
Abrim with dewy dawns of Spring;
You pledge the splendour and the grace
Of rosy Summer's smiling face.

So frail, yet radiant and fair,
The Sun's first kiss you seem to hold,
And pass it on to cheer my path
With your unchanging heart of gold.

So common—yet the loveliest thing;
So rich, because the earth is thine;
For in His planning, wondrous wise,
The lowly flame with fire
 divine.

What living canvases of light
You paint upon our Native Land!
No picture yet has e'er surpassed
Your posy in a baby's hand.

Yet deeper still your beauty thrills,
As Heaven's workmanship I mark;
This miracle within the root—
God's finger fashioned in the dark.

THE PILLAR BOX

(Visited at Sway, Hants, June 9th, 1930).

It stands near a way-side cottage,
This pillar box, small and red,
And the trees in their silence listen
To secrets the years have spread
And all down the Silver Roadway
In visions we come—then pass –
But I think that perchance our mem'ries
Will whisper across the grass

It stands at the old lane's turning,
And I thought as I stood to-day,
With my hand on its unmoved cover,
What wonderful dreams there lay—
In that pillar box small and simple,
That stands in a world apart,
Like a mask that is only veiling
The life in the human heart!

It holds such a power of meaning,
That there in the sunlight gold,
The roar of the world outside us –
The dreams of the cities old—
The hush of the spirit speaking,
The words that are just a prayer,
Were blended in one great chorus—
For something of God stole there.

I thought as the sun grew deeper
And followed us down the lane,
Of the current of thought still flowing
From city and town and plain—
Of the links that could bind so many,
Of letters that came and went,
And all that the vital spirit
Of one of God's workers meant.

For out of the haunts of Nature,
And far from the eyes of man,
The power of a kindred purpose
Can weave out its special plan.
And that letter-box locked up tightly
That stands by a dear old tree,
Held something of haunting magic
That ever will cling to me.

It stands near a way-side cottage,
And over the fair green land,
We think of the hosts of letters
That are posted by some kind hand.
And all down the Silver Roadway,
How often in dreams we'll pass,
And I think that perchance our mem'ries
Will whisper across the grass!

III.—THE PRIZE OF THREE NEW BOOKS for the best example of bathos from any well-known poet of this century is awarded to B. M. Beard, 214, Broadway, Bexleyheath, Kent, for the following:

"But Granchester! ah, Granchester!
There's peace and holy quiet there,
Great clouds along pacific skies,
And men and women with straight eyes,
Lithe children lovelier than a dream,
A bosky wood, a slumbrous stream,
And little kindly winds that creep
Round twilight corners, half asleep.
In Granchester their skins are white,
They bathe by day, they bathe by night;
The women there do all they ought;
The men observe the Rules of Thought;
They love the Good; they worship Truth;
They laugh uproariously in youth;
(And when they get to feeling old,
They up and shoot themselves, I'm told)."

RUPERT BROOKE,
The Old Vicarage, Granchester.

We also select for special commendation the replies by J. A. Jenkins (Liverpool), J. Morton George (Woodford Green), Mrs. May Belben (Wimborne), G. G. Ray (Belfast), Miss Mackechnie (St. Andrews), John E. Woods (Coventry).

Mr. B. L. Jacot, author of "Frogs Don't Grow Feathers." (Just published by Hutchinson).

IV.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the best criticism, in not more than two hundred words, of Hamlet's famous soliloquy, "To Be or Not To Be," is awarded to Captain Wm. Jaggard, "Rose Bank," Stratford-on-Avon, Warwicks, for the following:

HAMLET: YOUTH OF SORROWS.

Oft-quoted, frequently misunderstood, yet never stale; terse, compact as egg, yet patent to all; this immortal meditation is based on Socrates's "Apology," refined by Montaigne, whose "Essayes" nourished Shakespeare. Probably Catullus's "Sparrow elegy" helped. Correct comprehension of this soliloquy provides the key-clue to this greatest play. Here Shakespeare revealed his innermost, as in Biron, Gaunt, Jaques, Prospero, Timon and "Sonnets." Penned at apex of creative genius, this passage exhibits Shakespeare observing, understanding all humanity. Nothing escaped that keen mnemonic record or magical memory. Into thirty-six lines is crammed a lifetime of experience, rounded off with exquisite touch: "Nymph! In thy orisons . . ." One slip occurs in "No traveller returns," seeing Hamlet interviewed his father from Beyond. Discussing death, Hamlet weighed not cowardly suicide to escape wave of cares, or "sea of troubles"; but removal of a crafty, better-dead murderer. Safety lay alone in feigned madness. Conscience worried him. Single-handed, faced by fearful odds, he renounced love, branded his guilty mother, reconstructed murder (French fashion), executed convicted murderer and forfeited life. Who of us, overwhelmed with similar handicaps, could successfully emerge? Queer anomaly! Hamlet, stage character, conferred more celebrity upon Denmark than all its famous natives combined.

We also select for printing:

No one can approach this soliloquy with a perfectly open mind, it is so "full of quotations." Yet one cannot read it unmoved. In that repetition of "to sleep" one can feel Hamlet's aching eyes as he thinks of the peaceful sleep denied him. Remembering the haunted sleep of later days, he cries in horror, "perchance to dream." He sees the endless worry of the future, remorse should he murder his uncle, bitter remorse should he forbear. "Calamity of so long life," he says. Then through his creation speaks the voice of the creator, tortured too, though differently—"the pangs of despised love," as the eyes of the Dark Lady laugh at him, "the insolence of office" as he remembers the bother about theatres and despised players. Surely Shakespeare too looked wistfully at the "bare bodkin" that could end it all, as the hunted stag is given his "quietus." With the wealth and variety of its images, with its haunting conciseness of expression, this speech expresses unforgettably the feelings of the inarticulate who are driven, for the moment, beyond endurance. It is great poetry, deep feeling woven into perfect music, and all the schoolboys of the ages can never make it hackneyed.

V.—THE PRIZE OF HALF A GUINEA for the most terse pathetic passage selected from any modern novel is awarded to Phyllis E. Noble, Bridge House, Lyston, Long Melford, Suffolk, for the following:

"Esteban was trying to make a decision. It had always been Manuel who had made the decisions, and even Manuel had never been forced to make as great a one as this. Esteban went slowly upstairs. The Captain waited for him, and waited so long that presently he ventured half the way up the stairs and listened. At first there was silence; then a series of noises that his imagination was able to identify at once. Esteban had scraped away the plaster about a beam and was adjusting a rope about it. The Captain stood on the stairs trembling. 'Perhaps it's best,' he said to himself. 'Perhaps I should leave him alone. Perhaps it's the only thing possible for him.' Then on hearing another sound he flung himself against the door, fell into the room and caught the boy. 'Go away,' cried Esteban. 'Let me be. Don't come in now.' Esteban fell face downward upon the floor. 'I am alone, alone,' he cried. The Captain stood above him, his great plain face ridged and grey with pain; it was his own old hours he was reliving. He was the awkwardest speaker in the world apart from the lore of the sea, but there are times when it requires a high courage to speak the banal. He could not be sure the figure on the floor was listening, but he said: 'We do what we can. We push on, Esteban, as best we can. It isn't for long, you know. Time keeps going by. You'll be surprised at the way time passes.'"

VI.—The Prize of Half a Guinea for the best hundred-word review is awarded to Phyllis E. Noble, Bridge House, Lyston, Long Melford, Suffolk, for the following:

THE ROCKLITZ. By George R. Preedy.
(John Lane.)

Saxony in the seventeenth century, swayed by the Rocklitz, who ruled the impressionable young Elector with her "golden glance of all imaginable potency." Her brief year of power, the dramatic intrigues of the court, the superstitious fear of witchcraft, the grim secrets of the Koenigsberg, are described with a masterly pen in this magnificent romance. The characters live—so vivid are they indeed that they arouse not only the interest but the emotions; one feels stirred to sympathy or antagonism and sometimes even to shuddering horror—and the whole story is dominated by the enchanting personality of the Rocklitz herself.

THREE DAUGHTERS. By Jane Dashwood.
(John Murray.)

This is a delightful comedy—the story of three girls and their matchmaking mother, spiced with the details of their affluent, well-upholstered life in the late Victorian era. But the serio-comic love affairs, the genial satire at the expense of snobbishness and conventionality do not obscure an undercurrent of sadness, of wistful regret for the passing of youth and the fading of its roseate vision, of tender sympathy with the secret miseries of girlhood. "That life of waiting, hoping, saying nothing, hiding her feelings, keeping everything in," has never been more faithfully portrayed.
